There is another implication to Dewey's and Dakin's analysis, and indeed, to the work of the Foundation for the Study of Cycles as a whole. It is an implication already encountered, but it is best to restate it here: if cycles — particularly economic cycles — are of regular and quantifiable periodicity, then this implies that they are inevitable, and because inevitable, predictable. This in turn would seem to limit the scope of human action and its ability to influence such cycles merely to affecting trends, rather than the cycles themselves. Indeed, citing Schumpeter's Business Cycles once again, they note that when one studies the various economic policies of England, the United States, and Nazi Germany in response to the Great Depression, they noted that of all the various measures each country took, including Hjalmar Schacht's subsidized exports and various systems of marks in Germany,[167] to Roosevelt's New Deal programs in the U.S.A., the rises in prosperity in each country nevertheless "arrived strictly as might have been anticipated by anyone projecting the familiar economic waves of the past."[168] In other words, whatever the trends the respective governmental policies in each nation might have induced, the overall cycle itself was destined to turn precisely when it did, regardless of governmental policy or political action. Financial policy could amplify or damp the overall trend within a cycle, but could never arrest or reverse the cycle itself. And the reason is again clear: the cycle itself was evidence of a deep physics being played out on the stage of aggregate human activity.

Indeed, such policies or actions oftentimes function merely as devices of concealment, cloaking the reality of the inevitability of such cycles by appearing to manipulate the cycle itself by measures that, in fact, manipulate only the trend:

> Devices like the Bretton Woods Economic agreement, or Treasury grants made as political "loans" to foreign nations, may tend for temporary periods to mask this truism — much as the working of the Federal Reserve Act tends to conceal from the general public the fact that we print dollars to meet government deficits. But our > chart says forthrightly, in statistical language, that on the basis of the long-established trend, and in terms of foreign trade handled at a real profit, we should not be too optimistic in looking for such trade to be increased over the prewar volume…. All our chart can tell us is that, failing a revolution of some sort, the pattern as established will presumably prevail.[169]

Note then that, so long as prevailing conditions remain, the cycle itself is basically unaffected. It is when the system again becomes an open system, when changes of a radical nature, such as a technological revolution, occur, that the cycle itself can be directly affected.

But barring this, humans inherently tend to resist the notion that economic cycles and waves may be beyond the ability of man to control. “They accept the need of adjustment to the weather, knowing it is out of man’s control. But they resist passionately any suggestion that changes in the social and economic climate may be beyond the total rule of man’s conscious will.”[170] The only way that mankind could in effect change the inevitability of a given cycle of economic activity is precisely to introduce revolutionary change:

> We now know enough about trend lines to realize that old ones merge into the take-off of new ones only when fundamental, even revolutionary, changes have occurred in the environment and its organization, and perpetuate themselves….
> Remember Pearl’s (fruit fly) bottle. Imagine for a moment that we Americans are the (fruit flies). We are reaching the upper asymptote of our (population growth) curve. The invention of a few new gadgets by industry — indeed, the invention of a whole new industry itself — is a force in no way adequate to change the relationships in our bottle. We must have a whole new bottle.[171]

In other words, we now find the economic inevitability behind the strategy outlined in chapter one; the global elite, in order to maintain any sort of “sustainable growth” — to use one of their favorite catch phrases — must either expand humanity’s “bottle” into outer space in a significant way, or perpetuate regional imbalances and conflicts and wars and the economic growth for some that this inevitably brings, or they must admit the growth of a revolutionary technology which completely changes the nature of the relationships inside the bottle itself. Failing this, they must export and then re-import manufacturing and technology from one region to another, and lower population, in a never-ending shell game, if the bottle-expanders of outer space and radically new technologies are not pursued. In short, the only real way to alter the inevitability of a cycle is to make the bottle an open system, and any open system invariably challenges the very basis of their power, unless, of course, the pursuit of revolutionary technology is one they can monopolize and employ to secure their hegemony.

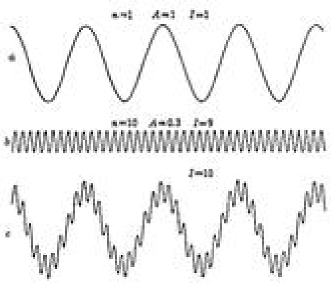
5. Waves, Overlays, and Modulation: The Physics Analogues Employed by Dewey and Dakin, and Their Implications

Dewey and Dakin do much more than just imply a physics connection with all their allusions to closed and open systems, and to deep connections between economic activity and solar cycles and overlays of cycles. They also draw very explicit analogies to physics. We have noted that they draw upon cycles of various length — nine, four, 35, and 54 years to name but a few — but they are open to even more possibilities:

> Now, let us suppose that there are still longer waves in the universe — "Y" waves we may call them. Imagine some of the waves with peaks which come 3 ½ years apart, others with peaks 9 years apart, 18 ½ years apart, 54 years apart, and perhaps much farther spaced. It is not inconceivable that these longer waves could directly or indirectly affect the sun, weather, animals, and human beings, and that just as a red pencil may respond to light waves of only one length, so a particular organism might respond only to Y waves of one particular length.[172]

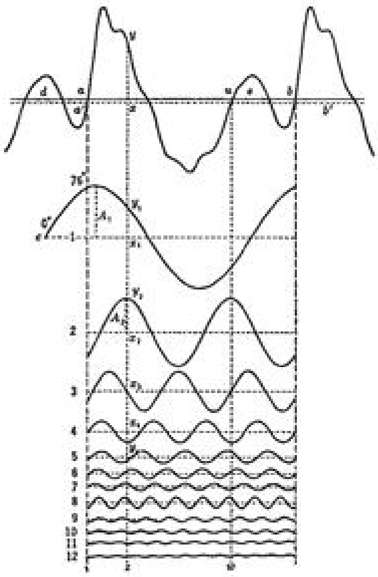
They are, in other words, proposing a kind of "econo-bio-physics," where particular kinds of organisms are transducers, are coupled harmonic oscillators, of waves of cycles of particular wavelengths, much like pipes in a pipe organ respond to different wavelengths and harmonics.

Invoking the analogy of sound, in fact, is not reading too much into their remarks, for they in fact do so by pointing out that the exact physical analogue of their "overlays" of cycles is that of sound waves being modulated together.



Overlay of Two Sound Waves[173]

Again, as with their overlay of the 54- and nine-year cycles, note that the overall characteristic of the lower-frequency, longer-wavelength wave is preserved even with the grafting of the shorter higher frequency sound wave on to it. This process is called modulation, and in this instance, the longer lower frequency wave has become a carrier wave. They extend the wave modulation analogy even further, by pointing our that any wave of a particular wavelength and shape will have an overtone, or harmonic series,[174] which are composed of fractions of that wavelength: one-half, one-third, one-fourth, one-fifth, and so on. They give the following chart of the graph of a sound wave from an organ pipe, and its first 12 overtones, or harmonics:



Harmonic Series of an Organ Pipe[175]

Dewey and Dakin are strongly suggesting, then, that there may be a deeper physics of a wave mechanics involved in the overlay of economic cycles, and that correlations of sunspot activity with, for example, economic cycles of wholesale prices, may have a much deeper basis than merely the influence of the sun upon the weather, and of the weather on agricultural production and prices. In other words, they may both be immediate and manifest results of an underlying and more unified phenomenon.

But they go much further than even this, and in doing so, not only demonstrate that they are thinking in terms of a very deep, and indeed hyper-dimensional, physics, but also reveal some profound implications and questions that will preoccupy us throughout the remainder of this book. It is best to cite them at length in order to understand the full implications and significance of the deep physics connection that they are suggesting, and of its profound implications:

> To that end let us consider in terms of modern psychology and physics a few facts important for our approach to economic science.
> P.D. Ouspensky once asked his readers to make an experiment. Imagine, he said, that you live in two dimensions, instead of three. An easy way to do this is to imagine you are a being like a piece of paper, infinitely thin, living upon a table. You can look neither up nor down, for up and down are in a third dimension. You cannot even think up and down, or conceive it. For you have no thickness, and hence cannot even imagine thickness.
> Now in the center of this tabletop where you live, there is cut a slot. In this slot there revolves a wheel, so hung that half the wheel is always below the table, and half of it above. This wheel is solid and you can see only the edge of it. Let us imagine its edge is painted in four colored segments — black, white, blue, and red. As the wheel revolves, you observe it end-on, you of course do not know that it is a wheel you see. For you are a two-dimensional being, and therefore see only a single line of color along the tabletop. Occasionally, as the wheel slowly revolves, you do see > that line change suddenly in color. Red will suddenly change to black, and black to white, white to blue, and blue to red again.

> Now, if you observe this phenomenon long enough, you will finally decide that when the red comes up, it will eventually cause black; and when the black appears, it will eventually cause blue. You will think you know the causes of the phenomena you observe.
> If a two-dimensional scientist is observing the phenomena, he will eventually discover a "law" in this continuity of event. Using this law, he will be able to predict changes of color accurately. The scientist, by the use of mathematics, might also discover that a third dimension was necessary to account for the real phenomenon he saw in two dimensions only. But neither of you could imagine this third dimension as a sensory reality. Nor could you know the real nature of the causes operating there. The scientist would admit this frankly, saying his law merely described what happened, without explaining it. But you, untrained in such fine distinctions, would speak boldly of a "cause" being followed by an "effect." And each "effect" would in turn become a new cause (in your way of thinking) resulting in a further effect which followed. If you persisted in this belief, you might eventually resent being told that you knew nothing about the real causality.[176]

Clearly, Dewey and Dakin are suggesting that what we call cause and effect are really but artifacts of our "three-dimensionally-conditioned consciousness" grappling with phenomena that have their origins in a hyper-dimensional world of more than three dimensions.

One might therefore add to their analogy of a "hyper-dimensional" world evidencing itself in cycles that our scientist might, by dint of the same sort of mathematical techniques, deduce a very different object — the "wheel" — as the real cause and effect of that which we perceive as a cycle. And this brings them to a vital fact:

> What we call our recognition of "cause" and "effect" is somehow associated with time, and with our perception in time. This is > important to understand, for what we call time is apparently only a mode of perception…. Ouspensky, approaching the problem from a psychological background, goes so far as to suggest that time is the way we experience space in its higher dimensions. That is, the unknown dimensions of space are revealed to us in time.[177]

In other words, not only are Dewey and Dakin suggesting that the sought-after deeper physics underlying their "harmonic overlays" and modulations of cycles might lie in a hyper-dimensional physics, but they are also suggesting that cause/effect thinking such as in the case of the sunspot-wholesale prices overlay cycle is in fact erroneous. It is not solar activity as the ultimate case, with weather modification as the mediate cause, and wholesale agricultural price changes as the final effect, but rather, the solar cycle, the fluctuation of weather, the fluctuation of prices might all be the immediate, though admittedly interrelated, three-dimensional effects of a hyper-dimensional cause.

In such a model, our perceptions of them as "weather" and "solar activity" and even "price fluctuations" and so on, are similar to our perceptions of a beam of light that is split by a prism into its spectral components. In such a model, our three-dimensional reality is the prism refracting the several wave forms into its various constituents that we perceive as separate cycles. Moreover, Ouspensky, whom they cite, is quite clearly suggesting that time itself is not a dimensionless "scalar" entity, but rather an entity of multi-dimensional spaces which three-dimensional reality experiences as a temporal flow. Thus, their analogy of the modulation of waves upon a carrier wave, and of multiple harmonics of that wave, as in the pipe organ example, is meant to couple the notion of hyper-dimensionality to those harmonics of waves. This, as we shall see in the next chapter, is a profound clue.

D. CONCLUSIONS, IMPLICATIONS, AND A SEGUE IN THE FORM OF SIGNIFICANT QUESTIONS

So what may be reasonably concluded about this cursory overview of the cycles research of Edward Dewey and his Foundation for the Study of Cycles? We shall itemize the points covered in this chapter in order to make explicit the full ramifications of their research:

> 1. The discovery of cycles of the same periodicity (or, to employ their own physics analogy, wavelength) in so many areas of cyclic activity with no apparent connection to each other, such as wholesale prices and sunspot activity, implies a deep connection between physics and economics; it implies a kind of "econophysics";
> 2. The regularity of such cycles implied not only their inevitability but also their quantifiability and predictability;
> 3. This in turn implied that governmental policies could only exacerbate or alleviate the overall trend of a cycle, but never reverse or arrest it, so long as the cycle remained a closed system without revolutionary expansion of the system itself, or introduction of radical new "Bottle-expanding" technologies. For this reason, the underlying implied "econophysics" necessitates that the global elite has only three strategies open to it in the eventuality of achieving their goal of a global corporate state:
> a. Regionalized imbalances and controlled wars and conflict in perpetuity, and various forms and degrees of population reduction, so long as the system remains closed in its "bottle";
> b. an opening of the system by expansion of its environment, which practically can only mean a large human presence in outer space;
> c. an opening of the system by a radical change in technology, a necessity if there is to be a large human presence in deep space.[178]

The last two alternatives pose some risk should the elite choose to follow them, for they inevitably carry with them the risk that their own power base can be inevitably challenged from a superior position, or superior technology, or both. Similarly, the first strategy carries the risk that their ability to control and manage such conflict would spiral out of their control.

4. The type of hyper-dimensional physics that their own words imply indicates a deep connection between

a. the harmonics of multiple-wave modulation or combination,

b. time,

c. cause, and

d. effect.[179]

5. This implies the most profound implication of them all: if that physics were sufficiently known and a technology could be devised to tap into it, that selfsame physics would imply a technology to tap into, modify, and control human behavior itself, inclusively of the ability to manipulate aggregate economic behavior.[180] One could, with a sufficient basis in this physics, directly manipulate whole economies and populations.

6. Not surprisingly, then, it was discovered that a large corporation and bank was represented in the Foundation for the Study of Cycles' membership,[181] and individual bankers appear to have utilized some sort of knowledge of such cycles to time their entrance into various markets, or the expansion of their financial empires.[182]

With all these conclusions and implications in mind, including especially their own suggestive analogy to the combination of several waves into one, then a profound question occurs: given the truthfulness of the analogy for the sake of argument, then what is the carrier wave for all these combined waves of cycles? What is the underlying reality, or the deeper physics, that they are suggesting? And for that matter, why does a certain class of the super-wealthy seem to know something about this "econophysics" that the rest of the business and economic world do not? And beyond the fact that some of that class might not know all of it, then why are so many of them apparently involved in the study of it?

The answers to these questions, surprisingly, lie in the mists, sands, texts, pavilions and columns of ancient history and temples, and a well-known and very ancient “pseudo-science”: astrology.

CASES OF INTEREST AND SUPPRESSION

> "The secret at the core of alchemy is an ineffable experience of the real workings of our local cosmological neighborhood."

> — Jay Weidner and Vincent Bridges[183]

Dewey's and Dakin's sound wave analogy for their cyclic waves of economic activity raises the profound question: is there a physics basis to economic cycles? And if so, what is it? Moreover, if their own sound wave analogy is itself more apt than Dewey and Dakin themselves suspected, then what carrier wave modulates all these cycles of waves? As was seen in the previous chapter, the analogy of sound waves and carrier waves was no doubt suggested to Dewey and Dakin by the fact that such waves could be plotted together, or "averaged."

But they were not the only ones to notice that waves of cycles of activity might point to a deeper physics connection. German physicist Dr. Hartmut Müller had considered a similar phenomenon from yet a different point of view, and proposed a theory to account for it: Global Scaling Theory.

Müller begins by noting that the theory is based upon what, for physics, is its primary "sacrament": measurement. But the centrality of measurement in the methodology of physics soon reduced the physicist to playing the role of a kind of "court of arbitration" because his role is now that of deciding "which of the models" adopted by physicists to explain reality "matches the measurements and gets applied."[184] This assessment highlights the cul-de-sac in which physics deadlocked in the twentieth century, for there is no single testable theory valid over the scales or sizes of objects with which physics must deal, for the laws of standard physics operable at the scale of the very large, laws dominated by Einstein's relativity theories since the early twentieth century, are not applicable to the scale of the very small at the level of atoms and subatomic particles, where the laws of quantum mechanics prevail.

In this situation, physics and physicists are reduced, according to Dr. Müller, to being "mere interpreter(s) of models and ideas that got completely out of touch with reality — and this to an ever greater extent."[185] In short, like many other physicists, Dr. Müller is increasingly dissatisfied with the counterintuitive nature of contemporary physical mechanics, whether it be the relativity-dominated theories of the physics of large-scale systems or the quantum mechanical theories of the very small, with their emphasis on statistical probabilistic approaches.[186]

But there was one area in which the concentration on "the sacrament of measurement" did lead to something of major — if unappreciated — significance, and in this one discerns a direct conceptual connection to the work of Dewey and Dakin:

> The need for measurements of the highest precision promoted the development of mathematical statistics which, in turn, made it possible to include precise morphological and sociological data as well as data from evolutionary biology. Ranging from elementary particles to galactic clusters, this scientific database extends at least 55 orders of magnitude.[187]

In other words, a vast database of measurements of all types and kinds of objects now existed, extending over the entire range of objects with which physics had to deal, from subatomic particles to planets, stars, and finally to whole galaxies and clusters of galaxies. With such a vast database of measurements at their disposal, one would think that scientists would have begun to contemplate its significance almost as soon as it had been available, namely in the early decades of the twentieth century.

Yet, notes Müller, this extensive database “did not become the object of an integrated (holistic) scientific investigation until 1982. The treasure lying at their feet was not seen by members of the labour-divided, mega-industrial scientific community.”[188] Given the disenchantment of well-known and famous Russian physicists like Dr. Nikolai Kozyrev with the standard models of relativistic and quantum mechanical theories, it is not surprising that Russian scientists were the first to make a significant breakthrough and contribution toward the rise of Global Scaling Theory, for the first to draw attention to this database and its potential significance was a Russian biologist named Cislenko.

Publishing a scientific paper in Moscow in 1980 entitled “Structure of Flora and Fauna with Regard to Body Size of Organisms,” Cislenko proved that “segments of increased species representation are repeated on the logarithmic line of body sizes in equal intervals (approximately 0.5 units of the decadic logarithm).”[189] In other words, Cislenko had discovered something very similar to Dewey’s and Dakin’s cycles of economic activity: regular, periodic “wavelike” forms in the relative grouping of organic life’s body sizes around certain values or measures of size. There was just one problem: this grouping or “clumping” around certain scales of size “was not explicable from a biological point of view.” For example, what mechanism could account for organisms preferring body sizes of "8-12 centimetres, 33-55 centimetres or 1.5-2.4 meters" and so on?[190]

For Hartmut Müller, however, the biological clumping around certain values in a periodic logarithmic scale pointed clearly to a deeper underlying physics basis for the phenomenon, for there were similar scale-invariant (i.e., applicable across all scales or measures of size) logarithmic distributions evident in the database of physics. Thus, by 1982, Müller was able to prove

> That there exist statistically identical frequency distributions with logarithmic, periodically recurrent maximums for the masses of atoms and atomic radii as well as the rest masses and life-spans of the elementary particles."[191]

Shades of Dewey and Dakin! But that was not all, for very similar patterns were subsequently found for the logarithmic line of the "sizes, orbits, masses and revolution periods of planets, moons, and asteroids."[192] The phenomenon was scale-invariant, and, when graphed, revealed clear periodic "cyclic" types of "waves."

In other words, Dr. Müller was chin to chin with the same type of phenomena as those which confronted Dewey and Dakin, only in this instance the phenomena were purely based on measurement of physical objects — particles and planets — and not economic cycles. Yet the wave forms resulting from them were almost the same. In fact, in a certain sense, they were identical simply because they were waves!

This now puts Dewey's and Dakin's "sound wave analogy" and the question it poses in a whole new light, for it would now appear that we are no longer dealing with merely a conceptual analogy, but an analogy with actual correspondence in the real physical world. So the attendant question of that analogy — i.e., what is the carrier wave for all these diverse cycles? — also emerges into a whole new and vitally important context, and it is one Dr. Müller answers very directly, although he was probably unaware that he was also responding to a question posed by two American economists as a result of their own accumulation of a vast database of measurements.

1. Longitudinal Waves in the Physical Medium

Dr. Müller is a mathematical physicist, and as such was quick to perceive the relationship, since all the discrete measurements had a single unifying and underlying structure. That structure was simply that of a recurrent logarithmic period, i.e., a wave, or better, a harmonic series. It is when one considers the cause of this structure that the questions and implications begin to become evident and to multiply. As Dr. Müller states the case, the cause of this structure appeared to be "the existence of a standing pressure wave in the logarithmic space of the scales/measures" used to measure the phenomena themselves.193 To put this point differently, I cite directly my comments about this observation from my The Giza Death Star Destroyed:

> …(T)he phenomenon of measurement itself, both as a phenomenon of intelligent observation and as a physical function, is scale-invariant, because regardless of the selected unit of measurement, the result still and always possesses a logarithm, a longitudinal standing wave structure.194

Note carefully, however, what Dr. Müller has actually said, and what he has not said. He has said that the phenomenon exists in a kind of "conceptual space." He has not said that the phenomenon exists as a structure in the physical medium itself, although it is clear that he is only a small step away from actually stating that. But as we shall now discover, he himself is inclined to the view that the phenomenon is physical in nature, and derives from a quantized view of the medium itself as a structured set of longitudinal "pressure" waves in that medium.195

As I have stated elsewhere,

> The results of this supposition were astounding, for regardless of the natural system studied, there were areas of "attraction," where any number of very discrete natural phenomena clustered, and "repulsion," areas avoided by natural systems. So pervasive was this phenomenon that the German Institute für Raum-Energie-Foeschung (Institute for Space Energy Research) "was also able > to prove the same phenomenon in demographics," i.e., in areas favored or shunned by urban populations, and in the economics both of nations and private businesses.[196]

Note what is really going on here:

> 1. Müller's standing longitudinal waves in logarithmic space are applicable not only to physical phenomena, but to the same areas of activity as studied by Dewey and Dakin; thus,
> 2. Müller's Global Scaling Theory conclusively indicates that there is indeed a deeper physics to economic activity, to the very cycles of boom and bust as catalogued by Dewey's and Dakin's Foundation for the Study of Cycles; and finally,
> 3. Note that the German Institute for Space Energy Research is sponsoring research not only into this deeper physics, but doing so precisely in relation to a study of the physics of economic and human activity and social organization. It is important for the reader to understand at this juncture that the term "Space Energy" in the German has the same sort of technical meaning or implication as the terms "vacuum" or "zero-point" energy has in English. In short, a German institution recognizes, funds, and researches not only Zero-Point energy, but researches it in the full range of its implications, including social and demographic, presumably for the purpose of engineering all of them to the extent possible.

But let us return for a few more insights from Müller's theory, for there is yet another significant implication that his theory holds.

That implication is gravity, for Müller's standing pressure wave in the medium may indeed be an explanation for the phenomenon of gravity. Simply put, the fact that natural systems "cluster" around the nodal points of these standing waves would indeed be a component or mechanism for the explanation of gravity in Müller's opinion.[197] It is important to understand the basic difference of this explanation from that of Einstein's General Relativity in terms of the order of concepts. For the latter, gravity is simply the curving of space-time that results from the presence of a large mass in local space-time. But Müller's theory is a much less superficial, and much deeper, theory, for both the warping of space-time and the large mass of a star or planet are both themselves the results of a much deeper structure around which both "cluster," and that structure is the structure of longitudinal pressure waves of compression and rarefaction in the physical medium itself. In a sense, the warp or curving of space-time is more fundamental than in Einstein's theory, for in a certain simplistic way of stating it, the warp results not from the presence of a large mass, but rather the converse: the large mass is present because of the underlying warp in the medium and the clustering of such waves around certain nodal points, almost the exact opposite of Einstein's theory.

This already gives one an appreciation of the significance of Global Scaling Theory, for in a certain sense, Einstein's theory is not engineerable, for if one wished to warp space-time within the constraints of General Relativity, a large mass such as a star or planet would have to be present to do so. But the converse is true of Global Scaling theory, for one would not need the presence of a large mass to warp space-time, since that warped structure itself is a longitudinal pressure wave in the physical medium. One could, by warping space-time, create a "virtual mass" or, conversely, an "antigravity hill."

For Dr. Müller, there are two immediate practical applications of this theory. In the first instance, the theory of standing longitudinal waves in the medium opens the possibility of using such waves and modulating them — for they are indeed the mysterious "carrier waves" suggested by Dewey's and Dakin's sonic wave analogy — with information for communications purposes. Such waves would be much faster than ordinary light waves, since objects separated from each other over great distances in normal space can be quite close in the logarithmic space in which these waves move. Secondly, such a modulated "gravity wave" could be demodulated at any location on the Earth, Mars, or even outside the solar system, "at the very same moment in time."[198] The reason is simple enough. Large masses are natural resonators of such waves.[199] And again, the reason is clear, for they tend to cluster around the nodal points or places where such waves interfere, that is, where they intersect. Thus, the building of expensive satellites of space-based communications systems would not only be unnecessary, but in a certain sense, since such satellites are of much less comparative mass than a planet, they would not be cost-effective, since they would be very inefficient as coupled oscillators or receivers of such waves, as compared to a planet with its large mass itself.

If there is a relationship between such longitudinal waves in the medium and gravity, it follows that as relationships of planetary alignments — the day-to-day, month-to-month, and year-to-year geometries of alignments of celestial bodies — will evidence similar relationships to human activity. A simple analogy will serve to illustrate this point. Imagine someone standing on the bank of a still pond, holding a handful of small pebbles. The individual then throws the rocks up, and they land in the pond, creating ripples and eventually, as all these waves cross and interfere with each other, a pattern or grid or template of wave interference is created, specific to that alignment of rocks thrown into the pond. After the pond surface has become smooth again, the individual throws another handful of pebbles into the pond. Again, the ripples will cross and interfere, but the pattern will be different because the rocks will randomly impact the surface of the pond in a different pattern.

The "ripples" are similar to the effects of these longitudinal waves in the physical medium, with one very important difference. In the case of the solar system, for example, the planets orbit the sun at known periodicity; that is, each planet takes a certain amount of time to complete one orbit of the Sun. This fact, the fact that their orbits can be precisely calculated and their positions relative to each other thus predicted, introduces the idea that certain types of alignments can occur with semi-regularity, and the physical effects thus can be predicted if one assembles the requisite database from lengthy observation. That is to say, the planetary alignments themselves are exactly analogous to our "rocks in the pond," for the planets constantly create an overlapping gridwork or template of such longitudinal waves.

a. Planetary Alignments and Signal Propagation

Oddly enough, such observation has been done to a limited extent. In the early 1950s, the RCA company engaged one of its engineers, J.H. Nelson, to study why signal propagation strength and weakness seemed to vary according to periodic cycles. Nelson's answers, after some study, were published in The Electrical Engineer, and are as shocking to “normal” scientific sensibilities now as they were then. The abstracts of these two short articles say it all.

In the abstract to his article “Planetary Position Effect on Short-Wave Signal Quality,” Nelson announces

> A new approach to an as yet unsolved problem is the observance of planetary effects on trans-atlantic [sic] short-wave signals. Correlation over seven years shows that certain planetary arrangements agree well with the behavior of short-wave signals.[200]

In an article written only a few months earlier for the AIEE Winter General Meeting in January of 1952, Nelson spelled it out even more explicitly in the abstract, which stated

> An examination of shortwave radio propagation conditions over the North Atlantic for a five-year period, and the relative position of planets in the solar system, discloses some very interesting correlations. As a result of such correlations, certain planetary relationships are deduced to have specific effect on radio propagation through their influence upon the sun. Further investigation is required to fully explore the effect of planet positions on radio propagation in order that the highly important field of radio weather forecasting may be properly developed.[201]

There are some important factors to observe carefully before we proceed.

First, note that “certain planetary relationships” have an effect on radio signal quality and propagation via some influence they have on the Sun. This highlights that another mechanism other than sheer mass is at work, for as is obvious, the Sun’s mass far outweighs the combined mass of the various planets! In other words, a standard relativistic model could not explain why signal quality varied with planetary positions; some other mechanism was at work than just the gravity-mass relationship posited by standard physical models. That mechanism, according to Nelson, had something to do with the geometries of planetary positions over time.

Secondly, Nelson also obliquely hints that in addition to the Sun’s known effects on terrestrial weather, that there may also be a relationship between planetary positions themselves and terrestrial weather. Were it not for the fact that Nelson was an engineer working for RCA, one might be tempted to conclude that his article was that of some obscure astrologer working anonymously for The Farmers’ Almanac making weather predictions.

But there’s more.

To see what it is, it is necessary to follow Nelson’s exposition closely and carefully. The problem first became evident when RCA erected a telescopic observatory to study sunspot activity:

> At the Central Radio Office of RCA Communications, Inc., in lower Manhattan, an observatory housing a 6-inch refracting telescope is maintained for the observation of sunspots. The purpose of erecting this observatory in 1946 was to develop a method of forecasting radio storms from the study of sunspots. After about one year of experimenting, a forecasting system of short-wave conditions was inaugurated based upon the age, position, classification, and activity of sunspots. Satisfactory results were obtained, but failure of this system from time to time indicated that phenomena other than sunspots needed to be studied.[202]

In other words, some mechanism other than sunspots was involved. But what was it?

Examining various articles by those who had studied the sunspot phenomenon in relationship to their cycles, Nelson quickly discovered something quite odd, and it figured significantly into his own discovery:

> Cyclic variations in sunspot activity have been studied by many solar investigators in the past and attempts were made by some, notably Huntington, Clayton, and Sanford, to connect these variations to planetary influences. The books of these three investigators were studied and their results found sufficiently encouraging to warrant correlating similar planetary > interrelationships with radio signal behavior. However, it was decided to investigate the effects of all the planets from Mercury to Saturn, instead of only the major planets as they had done. The same heliocentric angular relationships of 0, 90, 180, and 270 degrees were used and dates when any two or more planets were separated by one of these angles were recorded.

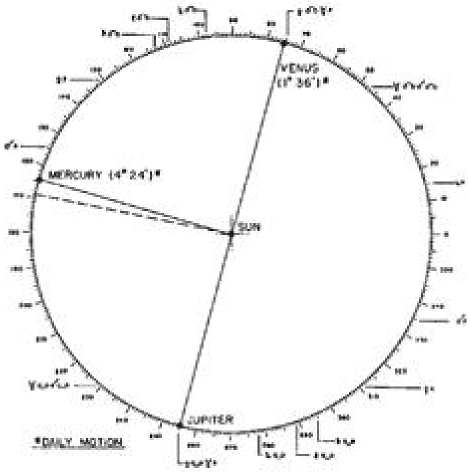
> Investigation quickly showed there was positive correlation between these planetary angles and transatlantic shortwave signal variations. Radio signals showed a tendency to become degraded within a day or two of planetary configurations of the type being studied. However, all configurations did not correspond to signal degradation. Certain configurations showed better correlation than others.[203]

In other words, sunspot cycles themselves were not, as often argued, the cause of signal degradation, but were themselves correlated to planetary alignments; both sunspots and radio propagation effects appeared to be effects of certain planetary geometries in relationship to the sun. And there was another thing as well: the effect on signal propagation appeared after the geometrical alignment, which always occurred when two or more planets were separated by angles of 0, 90, 180, or 270 degrees.

Nelson’s articles chart some of these planetary relationships, and it is worth having a look at them, for a picture is indeed worth a thousand words or a hundred equations.



VENUS
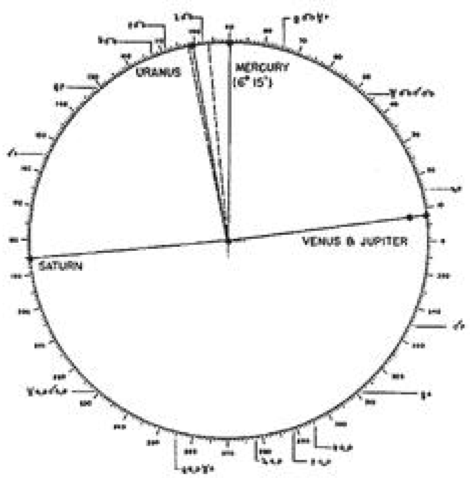
MERCURY (4° 24')*
SUN
JUPITER
*DAILY MOTION

Nelson’s Planetary Alignment Chart for February 23, 1948, which “resulted in severe signal degradation on that day and the one following.”[204]

Note that Venus and Jupiter are separated by 180 degrees, and Mercury by almost 90 degrees from the other two. Yet another alignment that resulted in severe signal degradation was an alignment that occurred from September 20 to 26, 1951:



URANUS
MERCURY
VENUS & JUPITER
SATURN

Nelson’s Planetary Alignments for September 20-26, 1951[205]

Again, observe that Saturn on the one hand, and Venus and Jupiter on the other, are separated by almost 180 degrees, while Uranus and Mercury are within a few degrees of each other and almost at 90-degree angles of separation from the other three planets.

The similarity of these charts to normal astrological charts is, of course, obvious to anyone familiar with them, and it was so in Nelson's day as well, for Time magazine was quick to pick up on one potential implication of the study:

> The ancient pseudo-science of astrology, which attempts to predict the future by the motions of the planets, may have a bit of science in it, after all. This week Radio Corporation of America, no easy prey to superstition, announced in the RCA Review that it is successfully predicting radio reception by a study of planetary motions.206

To put it succinctly, Time was obliquely hinting at a kind of "paleophysics" approach to this ancient "pseudo-science," namely that behind ancient astrological myths and lore there might have once been a very sophisticated physics and science — the product of a Very High Civilization — of which astrology was a considerably declined legacy of civilizations, Egypt and Babylon for example, that were themselves declined legacies of a much earlier and much more sophisticated precursor civilization. And the astrological component, as we shall see momentarily, is more than just suggested or implied.

But we are getting ahead of ourselves.

For the moment, let us now consider carefully the implications of Nelson's remarks:

> 1) Since radio signals are electromagnetic phenomena, and since signal propagation appears to be affected by two or more planets in alignments of 0, 90, 180, or 270 degrees from each other, the implication is that the solar system is not electrically neutral at all, but an electrically dynamic and open system whose dynamism is affected by these alignments. Again, recall the idea that the planetary alignments themselves create a gridwork or lattice or template of longitudinal waves;207

> 2) The common feature of the Sun and the planets is that each is a rotating mass around its own axis of rotation, and as a total system, each planet orbits the Sun. In short, we are dealing with rotating systems within rotating systems;
> 3) The Sun itself is a rotating mass of plasma, a super-hot electrically polarized gas in which nuclear fusion occurs constantly. Moreover, within the Sun's mass of rotating plasma, different layers of plasma north or south of the latitude of its equator rotate in the same direction, but at different velocities. This "differential rotation" as it is known will become a crucial consideration as we proceed.

But what does all this mean?

To answer this question, we must return to examine some aspects of this "deep physics" that I have written and commented about in my previous books. Many of these points can be reprised fairly quickly, but some of them will require a closer look, with new additional material and perspective.

b. The Electrically Dynamic Solar System and Planetary Alignments

As already noted, the RCA studies of J.H. Nelson point to the implication that the solar system is not an electrically neutral system, but a dynamic one whose changes are somehow connected to planetary alignments.[208] In most presentations of the electrically dynamic solar system, it is to be noted that the models used do not seek explanations in a "deeper" physics, but merely posit that in ancient times the planets were much closer together, and as a consequence of the buildup of polarities and charge differentials between planets, large-scale electrical arcs could form between them, much like charge differentials between the atmosphere and the ground form during large thunderstorms, leading eventually to the electrical arcs between these regions that we know as lightning. In this case, the electrically dynamic solar system's understanding of the way planetary alignments affect the system is simply due to the relative closeness of celestial bodies and the relative differences of charge polarities between them. The actual geometrical alignment of planets — as in the example of Nelson’s RCA studies — is not really in view.

c. Plasma Cosmology

Closely allied to the conception of the electrically dynamic solar system is plasma cosmology, which is an attempt to see a deeper physics at work behind the idea of charge differentials forming between planets. With plasma cosmology and physics, we are indeed in the presence of a model with profound implications for that “deeper physics,” as well as a model with profound explanatory power for some ancient texts and mysteries.[209] Accordingly, our review must be more comprehensive.

I first outlined the basics, and the fundamental implications of plasma cosmology for interpretation of ancient texts and monoliths, in The Giza Death Star. The brainchild of Swedish physicist Hannes Alfvén, the conceptual basis of the model was summarized by his student Eric J. Lerner in the following fashion:

> Starting in 1936 Alfvén outlined, in a series of highly original papers, the fundamentals of what he would later term cosmic electrodynamics — the science of the plasma universe. Convinced that electrical forces are involved in the generation of cosmic rays, Alfvén pursued … (a) method of extending laboratory models to the heavens…. He knew how high-energy particles are created in the laboratory — the cyclotron, invented six years earlier, uses electrical fields to accelerate particles and magnetic fields to guide their paths. How, Alfvén asked, would a cosmic, natural cyclotron be possible?
> …But what about the conductor? Space was supposed to be a vacuum, thus incapable of carrying electrical currents. Here, Alfvén again boldly extrapolated from the lab. On earth even extremely rarified gases can carry a current if they have been ionized — that is, if the electrons have been stripped from the atoms…. Alfvén reasoned that such plasma should exist in space as well.[210]

I then commented at length as follows:

> This may not sound too revolutionary, until one notices what is unique about this theory: "certain key variables do not change with scale — electrical resistance, velocity, and energy all remained the same. Other quantities do change: for example, time is scaled as size, so if a process is a million times smaller, it occurs a million times faster."[211] In other words… The principal differential is… time.[212]

Note that idea that time is "the principal differential" or "thing in view," because it will become quite the crucial point in a moment.

The principal insight of the theory is, however, clear: time is the primary differential or "thing in view" while the rest of physical variables — electrical resistance, field strength and so on — remain "scale-invariant," which is a physicist's technical terminology for saying that they behave the same no matter the size or scale of the system to which they are applied.

But there was a further implication:

> Since time is scale-sensitive, and other electromagnetic forces are not, the implication is revolutionary:
> "Equally important, though, is the converse use of these scaling rules. When the magnetic fields and currents of these objects are scaled down, they become incredibly intense — millions of gauss, millions of amperes, well beyond levels achievable in the laboratory. However, by studying cosmic phenomena, Alfvén shows, scientists can learn how fusion devices more powerful than those now in existence will operate. In fact, they might learn how to design such devices from the lessons in the heavens."[213]
> Lerner clearly implies that if the inertial and electromagnetic processes of the heavens are somehow captured…

That is, if one is able to reproduce them by some technological means, then

> "fusion devices more powerful than those in existence will operate." What fusion devices could he be talking about? No tokamak magnetic bottle has ever achieved a stable controlled-fusion reaction, and it is unlikely that Lerner knows about (Philo) Farnsworth's plasmator…214

(And it is even less likely that Lerner knows of the Nazi Bell device!)215

> …the only thing left, then, are the city-busting superbombs that fill French, American, and Russian arsenals.216

Those "city-busting superbombs" are, of course, thermonuclear hydrogen fusion bombs, and their importance to this story will also be seen in a moment.

But that's not all. There were other aspects of Alfvén's plasma cosmology model that he outlined in a 1942 article:

> If a conducting liquid is placed in a constant magnetic field, every motion of the liquid gives rise to an (electromagnetic field) which produces electric currents. Owing to the magnetic field, these currents give mechanical forces which change the state of motion of the liquid. *Thus a kind of combined electromagnetic-hydrodynamic wave is produced which, so far as I know, has as yet attracted no attention.*217

Commenting on this, I noted that such electromagnetic-hydrodynamic waves sounded suspiciously like the "electro-acoustic" or electrical longitudinal waves discovered by Nikola Tesla218 in his high-frequency direct current impulse experiments, and later in his famous Colorado Springs electrical experiments. We shall have much more to say on this subject in a moment.

But there is one final point about Alfvén's plasma cosmology that must be noted, and that is that this concept of the universe

> Exhibits a filamentary and cellular structure. Not only does the universe exhibit "electric layers" of various densities like a fluid, but "cosmic plasmas are often nor homogeneous, but exhibit > filamentary structures which are likely to be associated with currents parallel to the magnetic field…. In the magnetospheres there are thin, rather stable current layers which separate regions of different magnetization, density, temperature, etc. It is necessary that similar phenomena exist also in more distant regions. This is bound to give space a cellular structure (or more correctly, a cell wall structure).”[219]

Before continuing, it is essential that we pause and take stock of what we now have:

1. Alfvén’s cosmology leads to the conception of electromagnetic-hydrodynamic waves which are capable of traveling in vacuum space, i.e., the physical medium itself;

2. The mechanism that attaches to these waves is plasma itself, which exhibits fluid-like properties of less and more dense regions, and thus,

3. Gives space itself a cellular, that is to say, a lattice structure;

4. The phenomenon of plasmas is scale-invariant, since plasma effects can be created in the laboratory which precisely resemble entire galaxies in their structure,[220] a point which may be fully appreciated by a glance at laboratory-generated plasma swirls, and their similarities to whole galaxies:

study of the above phenomena can lead to “fusion devices more powerful than those currently in existence,” i.e., to super-super hydrogen bombs; and finally,

> 5. Time is the principal differential or “thing in view” since it alone varies over the scales which are in view; on small scales it operates faster than on large scales. This is an important point as we shall see in a moment in the work of Dr. Nikolai Kozyrev. However, given that time itself has this dynamic property considered in relationship to the scale of the system under consideration, it is clear that it cannot be the sort of “one-dimensional” or scalar entity that it is in the treatment of so much mathematical physics, particularly in relativity theories.[221] In short, time has a kind of “breadth and depth” similar to space; it is a multi-dimensional phenomenon, so to speak. And with this, we are back to the insights of Ouspensky cited by Dewey and Dakin in the previous chapter.[222]

With this in mind, we now consider the plasma and fusion aspects of the Nazi Bell device, and the postwar “plasma and fusion” research of Nazi scientist Dr. Ronald Richter, for his research was only secondarily about plasmas.

d. Plasma Transduction of the Vacuum or Zero-Point Energy: Dr. Ronald Richter Revisited

In The Nazi International I outlined a case that Dr. Ronald Richter’s postwar fusion project in Argentina was but a continuation of certain aspects of the wartime Nazi Bell project. This case was based in part on the fact that Richter worked for the same company, the Allgemeine Elektricitäts Gemeinschaft, as built the power plant for the Bell device,[223] that while at that company he worked on a project code-named “Charite-Anlage Projekt,” which was one of the code names of the Bell project’s power plant,[224] but most importantly, that the physics involved in Richter’s project and the Bell were so similar. Both the Bell and Richter’s project involved the use of rotating plasma.[225] Both the Bell device and Richter’s project also involved the use of metal drums or cylinders.[226]

But what was the purpose of this rotation of plasma? When queried about this precise point by an Argentine commission sent by President Perón to investigate his project, Richter informed the Argentine scientists that the whole basis of his attempt to control thermonuclear fusion processes was based on a precessional rotation of plasma that was then sharply and abruptly pulsed electrically to produce standing shockwaves within it. These shockwaves would then induce the fusion reaction.[227] Richter was, of course, roundly denounced by scientists of that day, because such assertions flew in the face of the reigning theories.[228]

However, this does not tell the full story, for while Richter's views were being denounced publicly, privately and very secretly the U.S. military was taking a profound interest in what the Austrian Nazi scientist was really trying to do. Contacting Richter and asking him to explain what he was doing, Richter reveals that his project, and hence the entire Nazi Bell project, was only secondarily concerned with nuclear fusion, for that process was seen by them as a gateway to a much more profound, and potentially deadly, physics than mere fusion or even super-super hydrogen bombs. Outlining his research for the Third Reich, Richter informs his American investigators that the shockwave process of fusion was first noticed by him in 1936! His research in Nazi Germany involved:

> Research work and design studies on electric arc furnaces systems, developing new types of plasma analyzing instruments and methods. In 1936, discovery of a plasma shock wave generating process, conception of a completely new type of industrial arc reactor system, based rather on plasma shock wave reactivity than on heat transfer. Development of a basis of operation for testing plasma shock wave conditions by means of plasma-collision-induced nuclear reactions.[229]

If all this sounds a little ahead of the thermonuclear game in the early 1950s, it was. It was about 45 years ahead of that game, for in 1995 an American firm, General Fusion, announced it would try to build a fusion reactor based on the principle of plasma shockwaves![230]

But Richter had apparently seen something else in those early plasma shockwave and fusion experiments in Nazi Germany, something that opened the door to a much deeper physics. “We assume,” Richter stated in his American Paperclip file,

> That highly compressed electron gas (i.e., a plasma) becomes a detector for energy exchange with what we call zero-point energy…in a shockwave-superimposed, turbulence-feedback-controlled plasma zone exists a high probability for cell-like super-pressure conditions…

Shades of Hannes Alfvén’s plasma-cellular structure of space! But note what Richter is saying: such plasmas become “detectors” or even gateways to tap into the energy of the physical medium — the zero-point energy — itself:

> …It seems to be possible (by this means) to ‘extract’ a compression-proportional amount of zero-point energy by means of a magnetic-field-controlled exchange fluctuation between the compressed electron gas and a sort of cell structure in space, representing what we call zero-point energy …. Plasma implosion analysis might turn out to become an approach to a completely new source of energy.[231]

In short, Richter has seen beyond Alfvén’s plasma cosmology, for he is saying in effect that the plasma structure of space itself is a result of zero-point energy fluctuations. And with his “whole new energy source” based on plasma gateways into the zero-point energy, we are back to Eric J. Lerner’s observation that by looking to the heavens and the plasma processes they contain, one might be able to construct fusion devices far more powerful than anything in today’s arsenals, for such devices, in the final analysis, are not fusion devices as such but fusion “gateways” or transducers of something far more powerful and of planet- and star-busting potential.

So what is the connection to the Bell?

It’s very simple.

Recall for a moment that Richter's whole process involved rotation of that plasma such that a precession or "wobble" was induced in it. Inside the Bell, there were two counter-rotating cylinders, in my opinion most likely stacked one on top of the other.[232] Inside these cylinders a highly radioactive compound of mercury, probably doped with high-spin-state nuclear isomers,[233] was spun up to ultra-high speed, on the order of tens if not hundreds of thousands of revolutions per minute. Isomers are in turn high-spin-state atoms whose energy is locked up in the angular momentum of the spinning atom. The purpose of spinning such a material mechanically up to such a high speed is therefore evident, for such action will "cohere" the atoms of the material by inertia, so that they are all spinning in a manner aligned more or less on the same plane of rotation, that of the two cylinders. This material was then electrically pulsed by extremely high voltage direct-current electricity[234] which, pace Richter, arc from the rotating drum itself, through the material, to the center of the device, thus making not only a plasma, but setting up "electro-acoustic" shock waves within it, and these in turn, would transduce the energy and fabric of space-time itself, as the isomeric component of the compound deexcited from its high spin state and released the enormous amounts of energy stored up in its high rotation. By altering the speeds of counter-rotation of the two drums, a differential rotation, a precession or "wobble" of sorts, would be artificially induced in the plasma.

In short, the Nazi scientists had brought the plasma cosmology of the stars and even of the galaxies themselves down to a device as small as a small camping trailer, and were using it to manipulate directly the fabric of the physical medium, of space-time, itself.

But why set up such a differential rotation at all? For that matter, what factors might have led Dr. Richter to assume that a rotating (precessing) and electrically shocked plasma might be a zero-point energy transducer to begin with?

To answer that question, we must, once again, look to the stars, to the work of Russian astrophysicist Dr. Nikolai Kozyrev, and to little-known facts about the earliest hydrogen bomb detonations.

e. Rotating Systems within Rotating Systems: Dr. Nikolai Kozyrev Revisited

To see what the connection of all this — from rotating plasmas to thermonuclear fusion to hydrogen bombs to stars and zero-point energy — really is, we must return to something I wrote way back in The Giza Death Star:

> During the first hydrogen bomb tests, the actual energy yield of the bombs far exceeded those initially calculated. There was an "x" factor, an unknown source of surplus energy that was being tapped. Since hydrogen bombs unleash enormous amounts of destructive energy at the very subatomic level of the nucleus of atoms, we may also surmise, in part, where that energy came from and why, for such weapons literally cause a violent local disturbance in the geometry and fabric of space-time. In short, some as yet inadequately understood laws of harmonics produced the excess energy.[235]

It is not only in the secret research of the Nazis with their Bell device, but in the work of Russian astrophysicist Dr. Nikolai Kozyrev that one begins the final approach to an understanding of where that excess energy came from and how it operates. We already know a part of the answer: it came from the energy of space-time itself.

But that space-time is not a mere void devoid of dynamism, for it contains objects and systems, it contains information, and those objects and that information are undergoing an ever-changing dynamic relationship to each other.

Kozyrev was confronted by a similar problem as the hydrogen bomb, only in his case, the problem was not with hydrogen bombs and their anomalous yields, but with the very Sun itself, and its own highly anomalous energy yield. As I wrote in The Philosophers' Stone: Alchemy and the Secret Research for Exotic Matter:

> The whole principal motivation, by his own reckoning, for his decades-long investigation of torsion, and of the torsion amplifying > and shielding properties of various elements and compounds, was precisely the fact that there were simply not enough neutrinos being emitted by stars for the standard model of stars as gigantic perpetual fusion reactors — essentially perpetual hydrogen bombs — to be true.[236]

In other words, stars, like their man-made counterparts, the hydrogen bomb, were transducing far too much energy than could be accounted for by the process of thermonuclear fusion alone. In fact, in a certain sense, in Kozyrev's view, fusion was not even the primary energy source at work in stars at all, but a secondary effect of something much deeper, just as in the case of Richter's conceptions on plasmas. The connection between the two men's research, however, may not be immediately clear unless one recalls what stars really are: they are rotating balls of plasma. Thus, Richter's and Kozyrev's work are pointing to something significant: rotating plasmas are transducers of the energy of a higher-dimensional space! This is a crucial conceptual link to ancient times and beliefs, and a crucial key to why the international money power, even in ancient times, allied itself so closely with the temple, as we shall see in subsequent chapters.

And the similarity between Kozyrev and Richter is more than just conceptual, for both men and their theories were publicly denounced in the media organs of their respective political blocs, while their projects apparently disappeared into the labyrinth of postwar black projects:

> The more than coincidental attack on Kozyrev in Pravda in 1959 effectively [prevented] him from open publication of his experimen-tal results and theoretical conceptualizations, and the similarly-timed disappearance of discussion of clean fusion bombs in the open Soviet literature [is likewise suspicious]. Let us speculate a bit.
> We have already encountered the fact that the earliest atmospheric hydrogen bomb tests far exceeded their pre-test calculated yields. In other words, just as [Kozyrev maintained was happening] in stars, some other energy source was being tapped into, and transduced by, the thermonuclear detonation itself. And if > we extend this line of speculation, the Russians most likely encountered the same phenomenon in their hydrogen bomb testing. Moreover, in Kozyrev, they had an astrophysicist who thought he knew why stars, also implicating thermonuclear processes, appeared not to be radiating enough neutrinos energy for the thermonuclear model to be true.

> One may reasonably and logically conclude, therefore, that the 1959 Pravda attack on Kozyrev was really a cover story to denounce his work, to de-legitimize it to anyone in the West who may have been paying attention to it, while Kozyrev, and his work, disappeared — as they did — into the highest reaches of classification within the Soviet Union, for his work provided the necessary key to understand why H-bombs were returning such anomalous yields, yields that, moreover, most likely varied with the time of their detonation. Kozyrev knew why: it was because the bomb itself became, for that brief brilliant nanosecond of the initial explosion, a dimensional gateway, a sluice-gate, opening the spillway to a hyper-dimensional cascade of torsion into the reaction itself.[237]

And when one says torsion, one says “rotation,” that is, the geometry of time itself, with its rotating systems within rotating systems within rotating systems, for as Kozyrev throughout his many experiments demonstrated time and time again, the simplest physical phenomena — from hydrogen bomb fusion reactions to the simple inertial properties of gyroscopes and tension balances and scales — varied in their results over time, i.e., in accordance with the position of celestial bodies in relationship to the earth, and to the position on the earth and the season in which an experiment was performed. Kozyrev had in effect demonstrated that time — the geometrical configuration and alignment of systems in space at any given moment — was itself a physical force and factor that gave it breadth and depth and dimensionality. He had given the effects of so many cycles as compiled by Dewey and Dakin, and even the sunspot alignments of RCA’s J.H. Nelson, a name: torsion.

In stressing this geometric aspect of time and its "multi-dimensionality" — its relationship to the ever-changing torsion dynamism of objects in space, their "template" — Kozyrev could not possibly have been blind to what he was actually saying, for he was saying also that there may well be, or have been, long ago, a scientific basis to astrology, a basis now all but forgotten.

And there is one final point in this torsion tale to consider. The Sun, while a rotating plasma, is not a plasma that rotates with uniform velocity, for if one considers various layers of this plasma from its equator north, or south, as many solar physicists know, the plasma rotates at different speeds, i.e., the Sun itself is the largest example in our celestial neighborhood of the phenomenon of differential rotation of a plasma. As such, it is the example par excellence of torsion.

A simple analogy will illustrate this point. In numerous discussions on radio shows I have been asked to illustrate what torsion does to the fabric of space-time, of the physical medium. The example I always use is that of emptying an aluminum soda can, and then wringing it like a dishrag. The analogy is similar to the Bell's two counter-rotating cylinders, for the counter-rotation of the wringing motion will spiral, fold, and pleat the can, which represents space-time. But imagine now that one is wringing the soda can with both hands going the same direction, but with one hand going very much faster than the other: the result will be exactly the same. The can will be spiraled, folded, and pleated.

Thus, the analogy serves to demonstrate an important point both about the Nazi Bell research and about Kozyrev's research, for in both cases the torsion physics in evidence in plasmas was fully rationalized by both parties. Moreover, in stressing this geometric aspect of time and its "multi-dimensionality" — its relationship to the ever-changing dynamism of objects in space — Kozyrev could not possibly have been blind to what he was actually saying, for he was saying that there may well be, or have been, a scientific basis to astrology now all but forgotten.

There was, however, one genius in particular, working at the turn of the nineteenth into the twentieth century, and at the dreadful moment that the deliberate and heavy hand of suppression of this physics and all its implications could clearly be seen and felt, who saw it all with a perspicacity and breathtaking vision, and who inspired the efforts of the Nazis and Soviets to free themselves from that heavy hand:

Nikola Tesla.

B. ALL ROADS LEAD TO TESLA AND MORGAN

One need only consider the conspicuous absence of Tesla's name from standard physics textbooks in order to appreciate the fact of the existence of this hidden physics and its deliberate suppression. It was evident in the public denunciations of Dr. Ronald Richter and Dr. Nikolai Kozyrev, and the quiet shuffling of their projects into classified obscurity and secrecy. But unlike those two geniuses, with Nikola Tesla one was dealing with an entirely different matter, for the man was not only not an obscure scientist and engineer working quietly in his laboratories on secret government projects, but he was a flamboyant and well-known public figure who delighted in large and expensive dinners in New York City's finest restaurants, who literally electrified audiences of the rich and famous — including such notables such as Mark Twain himself — with exhilarating public demonstrations of his inventions, and whose fame, quite literally, spread quickly worldwide with electrifying speed, for he indeed was the sole man responsible for electrifying the world after an equally famous contest with Thomas Edison and his financial backer J.P. Morgan — a contest which Tesla easily and decisively won.

Such a man could not simply be denounced, nor shuffled to the sidelines. Nor could such a man be dealt with by more "active measures" without casting a pall of suspicion over the ultimate perpetrators of the deed.

But why would Tesla pose such a problem to begin with?

1. Colorado Springs

The answer lies in what Tesla discovered during his famous experiments in Colorado Springs in the late nineteenth century, experiments which, to this day, few physicists and engineers really understand, and those few who do question either Tesla's claims, his analysis, or both. The reason for the difficulty in understanding among some scientists, and the questioning attitude and skepticism among others, lies in the nature of what Tesla himself claimed he had been able to do. It is necessary to cite his comments at length:

> Towards the close of 1898 a systematic research, carried on for a number of years with the object of perfecting a method of transmission of electrical energy through the natural medium, led me to recognize three important necessities: First, to develop a transmitter of great power; second, to perfect means for individualizing and isolating the energy transmitted; and third, to ascertain the laws of propagation of currents through the earth and the atmosphere.[238]

The Colorado Springs project was, in other words, the beginning of Tesla's now well-known idea of beaming electrical power itself without wires. This is already a step well beyond radio.

Observe carefully, however, what Tesla states. In order to do this, it was necessary to > 1. construct a kind of transmitter of extraordinary power;

> 2. to render any wireless transmission of power practical, it was necessary to be able to send and receive a multitude of individual signals for the various equipment and localities it was presumably to serve, and thus, a means had to be found to "individualize and isolate" the transmitted energy, much as a radio receiver can tune to various frequencies to receive different signals; and finally, and most importantly,

> 3. Tesla clearly states that the “natural medium” itself is to be the means of propagation of this energy.

But what does he mean by “natural medium”? The interpretation of this one point is crucial to the understanding of what he was really seeking in Colorado Springs, and it is this precise point over which the misunderstandings, arguments, and the skeptical questions, arise.

There are three possible ways to understand Tesla here. The first is to understand by “natural medium” what Tesla later declares in the same context: the atmosphere, and the earth itself. In the first instance, the atmosphere, Tesla is proposing little more than a high-power version of radio. In the second case, however, it is clear that he is proposing something radically different, for the earth itself is to be the transmitter. This interpretation, as we shall discover, is that which clearly will emerge from the rest of Tesla’s remarks.

However, there is one final interpretation, the most radical of them all, that will loom ever larger as we proceed. Tesla, like many physicists and engineers of his day, was an ardent believer in the aether, that is, in the fact that space-time itself was a kind of ultra-fine matter upon which electromagnetic waves, and hence energy and power, could ride. Tesla, however, appears, unlike most physicists and engineers of his time, to have held the view that this aether had fluid-like properties, i.e., that it had the ability to be compressed or rarefied, that is, to be stressed. This will emerge as a clear implication of his Colorado Springs experiments.

To see how, we return to his own remarks, to understand how he intended to utilize the earth itself as the transmitting antenna for electrical power:

> In the middle of June, while preparations for other work were going on, I arranged one of my receiving transformers with the view of determining in a novel manner, experimentally, the electric potential of the globe and studying the periodic and casual fluctuations. This formed part of a plan carefully mapped out in advance. A highly sensitive, self-restorative device, controlling a recording instrument, was included in the secondary circuit, while the primary was connected to the ground and an elevated terminal > of adjustable capacity. The variations of potential gave rise to electric surgings in the primary; these generated secondary currents, which in turn affected the sensitive device and recorder in proportion to their intensity. The earth was found to be, literally, alive with electrical vibrations, and soon I was deeply absorbed in this investigation.[239]

On conclusion of these investigations, having discovered that indeed the earth itself was an electrically dynamic system, Tesla concluded that

> Not only was it practicable to send telegraphic messages to any distance without wires, as I recognized long ago, but also to impress upon the entire globe the faint modulations of the human voice,

(In other words, Tesla was thinking in terms of radio, but with the entire earth as his transmitting antenna!)

> [but] far more still, to transmit power, in unlimited amounts, to any terrestrial distance and almost without any loss.[240]

Tesla then turned to the problem of developing not only a powerful transmitter, but one that could best be used for all these discrete and disparate purposes. And it is precisely here that the misunderstandings begin, for most engineers to this day think that Tesla's "magnifying impulse transmitter" was nothing but a Tesla coil beaming powerful bolts of electricity into the atmosphere.

To see how different was Tesla's system than any other then being considered, one must look closer at what he himself describes happened in Colorado Springs. Noting the typical Colorado thunderstorms which formed over the mountains and then moved quickly over the plains, Tesla begins a lengthy description of the events leading to his discovery of the method of electrically stressing the earth itself:

> I never saw fire balls,[241] but as a compensation for my disappointment I succeeded later in determining the mode of their formation and producing them artificially.

In the latter part of the same month (June) I noticed several times that my instruments were affected stronger by discharges taking place at great distances than by those near by. This puzzled me very much. What was the cause? A number of observations proved that it could not be due to the differences in the intensity of the individual discharges,[242] and I readily ascertained that the phenomenon was not the result of a varying relation between the periods of my receiving circuits and those of terrestrial disturbances….

It was on the third of July — the date I shall never forget — when I obtained the first decisive experimental evidence of a truth of overwhelming importance for the advancement of humanity. A dense mass of strongly charged clouds gathered in the west and towards the evening a violent storm broke loose which, after spending much of its fury in the mountains, was driven away with great velocity over the plains. Heavy and long persisting arcs formed almost in regular time intervals….I was able to handle my instruments quickly and I was prepared. The recording apparatus being properly adjusted, its indications became fainter and fainter with the increasing distance of the storm, until they ceased altogether. I was watching in eager expectation. Surely enough, in a little while the indications again began, grew stronger and stronger and, after passing through a maximum, gradually decreased and ceased once more. Many times, in regularly recurring intervals, the same actions were repeated until the storm which, as evident from simple computations, was moving with nearly constant speed, had retreated to a distance of about three hundred kilometers. Nor did these strange actions stop then, but continued to manifest themselves with undiminished force…. No doubt whatever remained: I was observing stationary waves.

….Impossible as it seemed, this planet, despite its vast extent, behaved like a conductor of limited dimensions .[243]

In other words, Tesla, in Dewey- and Dakin-like fashion, had observed a cycle, and a very interesting one at that, for the cycle he had observed was a "stationary wave," or, in modern parlance, a "standing wave." When the extremely high-voltage static electrical discharges that we call lightning strike the earth, if the resonance is right it literally "thumps" the earth like a kettle drum, sending an impulse all the way around the planet somewhat like a seismic wave from an earthquake. Like all such waves, it will eventually fade and die, then grow again until it returns to the same place and intensity from which it started. And this gave him the idea for the "wireless transmission" of electrical power.

However, nothing could have been farther from Tesla's mind than standard radio. This new circuit is, he noted,

> Essentially, a circuit of very high self-induction and small resistance which in its arrangement, mode of excitation and action, may be said to be the diametrical opposite of a transmitting circuit typical of telegraphy by Hertzian or electromagnetic radiations…. The electromagnetic radiations being reduced to an insignificant quantity, and proper conditions of resonance maintained, the circuit acts like an immense pendulum, storing indefinitely the energy of the primary exciting impulses and impressions upon the earth and its conducting atmosphere uniform harmonic oscillations which, as actual tests have shown, may be pushed so far as to surpass those attained in the natural displays of static electricity.[244]

To unpack what he is saying, one only has to consider the standard radio transmission arrangement, sending out ordinary radio waves. In this arrangement, there is an antenna, connected to the ground. The antenna sends out Hertzian waves into the atmosphere, and the circuit is completed by its connection to the ground. Hertz waves are similar in nature to suspending a jump rope loosely between two people and having one person jerk the rope, sending an "S"-shaped wave slowly to the other end. Most of the energy of the wave is dissipated in the initial "jerking" motion, and accordingly, only a fraction of the energy arrives at the other person, the rest of the energy being dissipated by the up-and-down motion of the wave itself. In this case, the jump rope represents the earth's electrically conductive atmosphere, and the wave in the rope represents the ordinary radio wave.

Recall now what Tesla stated: his circuit parameters were diametrically the opposite of a standard "radio" arrangement, for in this instance, the relationship of ground and transmitter were turned on their heads, the earth, normally the ground in an electrical circuit, became the transmitter and conductive medium, and the atmosphere, normally the conductive medium, became the *ground.*245 Moreover, in this new arrangement, the waves were not Hertzian at all, but impulses; that is to say, they were longitudinal waves of stress, of compression and rarefaction, in the earth itself.

To understand the crucial difference between the two waves, we repeat our jump rope analogy, only this time, we place a yardstick between the two persons. One person pushes or pulses the yardstick repeatedly. Instantaneously, all of the energy of the pulse is transmitted directly to the other person. In this case, the yardstick represents the earth, and the pulses the electro-acoustic longitudinal waves Tesla is sending.

This is, to put it succinctly, a far cry from radio in the standard sense, for Tesla means not only to transmit signals by this means, but electrical power itself, without wires, for the earth itself is the wire.246 Note also what the earth is in this system: it is a highly non-linear medium of almost infinite electrical "resistance" to a standard electrical current. This will assume some importance as we proceed.

In any case, once having envisioned this radically different system, Tesla went on to describe what for all practical purposes amounted to an "internet":

> The results obtained by me have made my scheme of intelligence transmission, for which the name of "World Telegraphy" has been suggested, easily realizable….Thus the entire earth will be converted into a huge brain, as it were, capable of response in every one of its parts.247

In fact, this is an “internet” beyond anything currently imaginable, for it has no need of wires, “gateway computers,” or satellites in order to function. In Tesla’s grand vision, the earth fulfills these functions.

2. Wardenclyffe

When he returned to New York City, Tesla was ready to put the scheme into commercial testing. And this is where Tesla's difficulties began, and where suppression of the physics and engineering his system represented was clearly evident, for needing funds to build a large-scale version of his Colorado Springs experimental apparatus, Tesla, as is now well known, approached the American international banker J. Pierpont Morgan for a loan. Detailing his plan for a global system of "wireless telegraphy," even proposing to send the human voice and actual pictures by its means in a kind of terrestrial radio and television, Morgan advanced Tesla the funds. What Tesla did not reveal to Morgan at this juncture was that he intended to transmit electrical power itself by this means, making even his own stupendously successful system of alternating current — the system now in use worldwide — obsolete! Tesla chose a place on Long Island, purchased land, built a power plant, and a large tower. He called the place and the project "Wardenclyffe."

Unfortunately for Tesla and his plans, however, the Italian physicist and engineer Guigliomo Marconi — using Tesla's own devices and inventions to boot! — beat him to the punch by transmitting the first transatlantic radio signal, using standard radio circuit arrangements and Hertzian "jump rope" electromagnetic waves while Tesla's project was still under construction. Faced with cheaper competition and a deceptively simpler, but much less flexible, system, Morgan threatened to pull the financial plug on the scheme. It was then, faced with the demise of his project, that Tesla revealed his true intentions to Morgan: he planned to beam power itself through the earth to any point on the globe. With this revelation, Morgan did pull the plug, and Tesla's grand project came to an end, and has never since been publicly revived.

a. Weaponizing Wardenclyffe and Suppressing the Scalars: Tesla at Tunguska and Morgan at Mischief

Why would Morgan pull the plug on such a scheme, virtually suppressing it and the physics it represented? After all, it is simply not true merely that he “could not meter” it and hence make money, for he stood to gain a great deal financially off of worldwide royalty and licensing agreements for the system, even though such a system would, admittedly, have been much more difficult to financially monitor and secure. So while pure and simple greed may very likely have been a factor in his deliberations, it probably was not the only one.

What those other modifications may have been were hinted at by Tesla himself, and a curious series of incidents that began when a French ship, the Iena, mysteriously exploded in 1907, as Tesla’s Wardenclyffe project was in its financial death throes. In an op-ed piece written that March to the editor of the New York Times, Tesla hinted at the weaponization potential of his Colorado Springs discoveries and Wardenclyffe project:

> As to projecting wave-energy to any particular region of the globe, I have given a clear description of the means in technical publications. Not only can this be done by the means of my devices, but the spot at which the desired effect is to be produced can be calculated very closely, assuming the accepted terrestrial measurements to be correct. This, of course, is not the case. Up to this day we do not know a diameter of the globe within one thousand feet. My wireless plant will enable me to determine it within fifty feet or less, when it will be possible to rectify many geodetical data and make such calculations as those referred to with greater accuracy.[248]

A year later in 1908, the inventor was less guarded in his words:

> When I spoke of future warfare I meant that it should be conducted by direct application of electrical waves without the use of aerial engines or other implements of destruction. This means, as I pointed out, would be ideal, for not only would the energy of war require no effort for the maintenance of its potentiality, but it would be productive in times of peace. This is not a dream. Even now wireless power plants could be constructed by which any > region of the globe might be rendered uninhabitable without subjecting the population of other parts to serious danger or inconvenience.[249]

These words were published in the New York Times on April 28, 1908. Bear that date in mind, because it will become highly significant in a moment. In any case, it is also clear that Tesla's wireless transmission of power was one and the same technology as a horrible weapon of mass destruction. And this raises an ominous series of questions: Had J.P. Morgan pulled his financial backing of the project not out of greed, but, perhaps motivated by some secret scientific advisor's cautionary warnings, had he pulled his financial backing because he did not wish to see technology with such destructive potential in the private hands of a scientist well known for very odd and eccentric behavior? Were Morgan's motivations ultimately altruistic? Or, conversely, did he want to develop the technology for such purposes secretly himself, and by means of its potential use, establish a world mastery for himself and his own class?

To put it succinctly, as with the presence of the Mitsubishi bank economist in the membership roles of the Foundation for the Study of Cycles, or the peculiar investigations of RCA engineer J.H. Nelson, this is the third clear instance of a major corporation, secure in its own monetary temple, showing a clear interest, first in the development of a deep physics, a radically different physics, and now, the first clear indication of a deliberate act of financial sabotage of the same physics! This pattern will only become more and more acute as we proceed throughout this book.

But in that very same article, Tesla makes clear that he has seen beyond his own system of using the earth itself as an antenna to an even deeper underlying physics, a physics he did not disclose at the time to Morgan but which now, desperate for financial support for his project, he now disclosed publicly in the pages of the New York Times:

> What I said in regard to the greatest achievement of the man of science whose mind is bent upon the mastery of the physical universe, was nothing more than what I stated in one of my unpublished addresses, from which I quote: "According to an > adopted theory, every ponderable atom is differentiated from a tenuous fluid, filling all space merely by spinning motion, as a whirl of water in a calm lake. By being set in movement this fluid, the ether, becomes gross matter. Its movement arrested, the primary substance reverts to its normal state. It appears, then, possible for man through harnessed energy of the medium and suitable agencies for starting and stopping ether whirls to cause matter to form and disappear. At his command, almost without effort on his part, old worlds would vanish and new ones would spring into being. He could alter the size of this planet, control its seasons, adjust its distance from the sun, guide it on its eternal journey along any path he might choose through the depths of the universe. He could make planets collide and produce his suns and stars, his heat and light; he could originate life in all its infinite forms. To cause at will the birth and death of matter would be man's grandest deed, which would give him the mastery of physical creation, make him fulfill his ultimate destiny.[250]

Note now that by "medium" Tesla no longer means simply the earth itself, but the aether. And notably, he views atoms themselves as but vorticular structures — rotating, torsion-based systems — in that aether. If Morgan had any doubts in 1907 about the potentials — both destructive and constructive — of Tesla's system and the physics it embodied, those doubts were clearly dispelled a year later by Tesla himself in The New York Times.

Note also that Tesla, by viewing the physical medium in this torsion-based fashion, has also clearly seen one implication: the aether itself was a transmutative, alchemical information-creating medium, a medium which, as information-creating, was in a state of non-equilibrium and broken symmetry. Thus, with the proper structuring of that "torsion potential," by engineering it, one could literally alter the size and mass of the earth or any other celestial body at will, for those bodies were themselves "whirls in the aether." Small wonder then that he, like Drs. Richter and Kozyrev after him, was creating ball lightning and thereby studying plasmas and electrical shocks, for like them, he has seen the much deeper physics of the physical medium itself, and like them, he has discovered the basic method of manipulating and engineering it through electrical pulses or longitudinal waves, and through rotation. And like them and their Nazi and Communist masters, he has seen the full range of its constructive and destructive implications. In this, and without the slightest exaggeration, his views of physics gave a solid basis to a very ancient pseudo-science: alchemy.

But why is the timing of Tesla's announcement so significant?

One researcher who asked this question was Oliver Nichelson:

> The question remains of whether Tesla demonstrated the weapons application of his power transmission system. Circumstantial evidence found in the chronology of Tesla's work and financial fortunes between 1900 and 1908 points to there having been a test of this weapon.[251]

Recall that Tesla's first veiled hints of the weaponization potential of his wireless power transmission system were stated in 1907 and clearly expressed by April 1908. Roughly two months later, on June 30, 1908, a massive explosion occurred over Tunguska, Russia, in Siberia.

> An explosion estimated to be equivalent to 10-15 megatons of TNT[252] flattened 500,000 acres of pine forest near the Stony Tunguska River in central Siberia. Whole herds of reindeer were destroyed. The explosion was heard over a radius of 620 miles. When an expedition was made to the area in 1927 to find evidence of the meteorite presumed to have caused the blast, no impact crater was found. When the ground was drilled for pieces of nickel, iron, or stone, the main constituents of meteorites, none were found down to a depth of 118 feet.[253]
> Many explanations have been given for the Tunguska event. The officially accepted version is that a 100,000-ton fragment of Encke's Comet, composed mainly of dust and ice, entered the atmosphere at 62,000 m.p.h., heated up, and exploded over the earth's surface creating a fireball and shock wave but no crater. Alternative versions of the disaster see a renegade mini-black hole > or an alien space ship crashing into the earth[254] with the resulting release of energy.[255]

As was already seen, Tesla had two short months earlier spelled out the weaponization potential of his magnifying transmitter device and its underlying deep physics very clearly.

Many years later in 1934, according to a letter unearthed by Tesla biographer Margaret Cheney, the inventor once again wrote J.P. Morgan:

> The flying machine has completely demoralized the world, so much so that in some cities, as London and Paris, people are in mortal fear from aerial bombing. The new means I have perfected affords absolute protection against this and other forms of attack… These new discoveries I have carried out experimentally on a limited scale, created a profound impression.[256]

At this point one might ask, what prompted the letter? Was it spontaneous on Tesla's part? Or a reply to an inquiry from the financier? Whatever lay behind this strange correspondence, occurring years after the financier had severed his connection with Tesla and all but suppressed the Wardenclyffe wireless power transmission project, the correspondence is odd to say the least.

Its implications however, are clear. Tesla's remarks in the New York Times in 1908, the same year as the event, and his letter years later in 1934 to Morgan, point to a circumstantial case that he indeed tested the weaponization potential of his wireless power transmission on a remote wilderness region, a region where there would be sufficient observation of the event from a distance, but no loss of human life. Indeed, in purely legal terms, he had "the motive and the means to cause the Tunguska event. His transmitter could generate energy levels and frequencies capable of releasing the destructive force of 10 megatons, or more, of TNT. And the overlooked genius was desperate."[257]

But as Nichelson also observes, the nature of the Tunguska explosion is also entirely consistent with what would happen with the sudden release of wireless power. No fiery object was reported in the skies at that time by professional or amateur astronomers as would be expected when a 200,000,000-pound object enters the atmosphere at tens of thousands of miles an hour. Also, the first reporters, from the town of Tomsk, to reach the area judged the stories about a body falling from the sky was the result of the imagination of an impressionable people. He noted there was considerable noise coming from the explosion, but no stones fell. The absence of an impact crater can be explained by there having been no material body to impact. An explosion caused by broadcast power would not leave a crater.

In contrast to the ice comet collision theory, reports of upper-atmosphere and magnetic disturbances coming from other parts of the world at the time of and just after the Tunguska event point to massive changes in earth's electrical condition. Baxter and Atkins cite in their study of the explosion, The Fire Came By, that the Times of London editorialized about "slight, but plainly marked, disturbances of…magnets"….

In Berlin, the New York Times of July 3rd reported unusual colors in the evening skies thought to be Northern Lights…Massive glowing "silvery clouds" covered Siberia and northern Europe. A scientist in Holland told of an "undulating mass" moving across the northwest horizon. It seemed to him not to be a cloud, but the "sky itself seemed to undulate." A woman north of London wrote the London Times that on midnight of July 1st the sky glowed so brightly it was possible to read large print inside her house. A meteorological observer in England recounted on the nights of June 30th and July 1st: "A strong orange-yellow light became visible in the north and northeast… causing an undue prolongation of twilight lasting to daybreak on July 1st… There was a complete absence of scintillation or flickering, and no tendency for the > formation of streamers, or a luminous arch, characteristic of auroral phenomena….Twilight on both of these nights was prolonged to daybreak, and there was no real darkness.”

> When Tesla used his high-power transmitter as a directed-energy weapon he drastically altered the normal electrical condition of the earth. By making the electrical charge of the planet vibrate in tune with his transmitter he was able to build up electric fields that affected compasses and caused the upper atmosphere to behave like the gas-filled lamps in his laboratory. He had turned the entire globe into a simple electrical component that he could control.[258]

But was a “simple” wireless transmission of power all that was involved in the explosion? After all, we have already found Drs. Richter and Kozyrev questioning the standard models of thermonuclear fusion, and Tesla himself by 1908, clearly seeing a deeper physics of the medium itself, was involved in his own wireless power transmission principles.

More importantly, flattening an area of 500,000 acres is equivalent to flattening an area of 781.25 square miles, or roughly an area of a square bounded by sides almost 28 miles long! So some other mechanism might be in play, and Tesla has already told us what it might have been: whirls in the aether itself — torsion, rotation.

However, Tesla had foreseen even further political implications for his system, and it is worth citing him at length:

> Through the universal adoption of this system, ideal conditions for the maintenance of law and order will be realized, for then the energy necessary to the enforcement of right and justice will be normally productive, yet (potentially) and in any moment available, for attack and defense. The power transmitted need not be necessarily destructive, for if existence is made to depend upon it, its withdrawal or supply will bring about the same results as those now accomplished by force of arms.

> But when unavoidable, the same agent may be used to destroy property and life. The art is already so far developed that great destructive effects can be produced at any point on the globe, determined beforehand and with great accuracy. In view of this I have not thought it hazardous to predict a few years ago that the wars of the future will not be waged with explosives but with electrical means.[259]

In other words, like the "gods" of extremely ancient times,[260] Tesla saw in his technology of wireless power transmission a means of world mastery and hegemony, whose implied threat of withdrawal of access, or even worse, the implied threat of its destructive weaponized deployment, would coerce compliance to whatever world order as possessed, monopolized, and deployed it. Such statements could hardly have gone unnoticed by Tesla's former financial backer, J.P. Morgan.

But whatever Morgan's interest may have been, foreign nations were most certainly also watching these statements carefully. As Oliver Nichelson notes, the American media carried many stories of "death ray" research being conducted in the wake of Tesla's statements to the New York Times in Russia,[261] France,[262] and Great Britain.[263]

In the last instance, Tesla biographer John J. O'Neill noted in an unpublished chapter to his celebrated biography of the inventor, Prodigal Genius, that when he queried the engineer about his wireless power transmission technology and its weaponization potential, Tesla became very reluctant to speak about it in any detail. But later, Tesla did offer some interesting information:

> Somewhat later I learned the reason for Tesla's reluctance to discuss the details. This came shortly after Stanley Baldwin replaced Neville Chamberlain as Prime Minister of Great Britain [sic].
> Tesla revealed that he had carried on negotiations with Prime Minister Chamberlain for the sale of his ray system to Great Britain for $30,000,000 on the basis of his presentation that the device would provide complete protection for the British Isles > against any enemy approaching by sea or air, and would provide an offensive weapon to which there was no defense. He was convinced, he declared, of the sincerity of Mr. Chamberlain and his intent to adopt the device as it would have prevented the outbreak of the then threatening war, and would have made possible the continuation — under the duress which this weapon would have made possible — of the working agreement involving France, Germany and Britain to maintain the status quo in Europe. When Chamberlain failed, at the Munich conference, to retain this state of European equilibrium it was necessary to get rid of Chamberlain and install a new Prime Minister who could make the effort to shift one corner of the triangle from Germany to Russia. Baldwin found no virtue in Tesla's plan and peremptorily ended negotiations.[264]

However, there is a large looming problem over hovering over these assertions, and that is simply the sequence of historical facts.

Neville Chamberlain remained Prime Minister until the Nazi invasion of the Low Countries and France in May of 1940, and did not, as is alleged, step aside for Stanley Baldwin to return to Britain's premiership after the Munich Conference of 1938. In fact, Chamberlain remained, even after Churchill had replaced him, on Churchill's War Cabinet until his death a few months later from cancer. The entire sequence of events is wrong, for it was Chamberlain who had replaced Baldwin as prime minister in 1937. And in any case, it is unlikely that Chamberlain, who pursued a policy of appeasement with Nazi Germany, would have been interested in a weapon of mass destruction that, had the Germans caught wind of the plan as they inevitably would have, would have exacerbated tensions between the two nations even more.

But need one discard these allegations merely for the presence of this (admittedly whopping) historical mistake?

Perhaps not, for it is possible that O'Neill is simply recording accurately what Tesla told him, and Tesla, then already a very old man, might have not remembered things in their precise sequence, confusing Chamberlain with Baldwin. On this reading, admittedly only a possibility, Tesla's deal was being negotiated with Stanley Baldwin, and the deal was subsequently scrubbed by Chamberlain on his assumption of the premiership and in the interests of appeasement.

All this is mentioned because, of course, there is one country conspicuously absent from the previous roll call of countries involved with "death ray" research in the 1920s: Germany. However, as researcher Oliver Nichelson observes, the Germans were indeed working on such a weapon, for the Chicago Tribune reported the following interesting little story:

> Berlin - That the German Government has an invention of death rays that will bring down airplanes, halt tanks on the battlefields, ruin automobile motors, and spread a curtain of death like the gas clouds of the recent war was the information given to Reichstag members by Herr Wulle, chief of the militarists in that body. It is learned that three inventions have been perfected in Germany for the same purpose and have been patented.265

Self-evidently, such stories abounded in the 1920s in the wake of Tesla's pronouncements, but there are sound reasons to take them seriously, especially in the case of Germany.

Under the terms of the Versailles Treaty, Germany was prohibited from development of heavy artillery over certain calibers, and absolutely prohibited from having tanks or even an air force, and its standing army was limited to a mere 100,000 men. However, the Treaty did not prohibit development of these types of weapons, and thus it is logical to assume that Germany in particular would seek to do a technological end-run around the restrictions of the treaty.266

Even more interesting, however, is the fact that Nichelson reports that one British researcher allegedly involved in the development of such systems, J.H. Hamil, observed that the German system was based "on an entirely different principle" than those in evidence in other reports.267 While Hamil explicitly states that his own "death ray" is based on Tesla's Colorado Springs wireless power transmission experiments,268 it is also interesting that it appears that he misinterpreted the nature of those experiments, for he built a large Tesla coil and was apparently attempting to beam power by its means through the atmosphere, the exact opposite, it will be recalled, of what Tesla was trying to do. This makes his statements all that much more interesting, for by pursuing "an entirely different principle" were the Germans in fact using the earth as the transmitter, and the atmosphere as the ground, as Tesla himself indicated? We will never know, but it is interesting to note that whatever they were doing, it was not the same as what everyone else was doing, according to Hamil.[269]

b. Lt. Col. Tom Bearden on Scalar Resonance

But what is precisely the relationship between Tesla's use of the earth itself as his transmitter, and the far more dangerous idea he himself suggests, that such "standing waves" as he observed at Colorado Springs, could be used as a means of engineering and manipulating the physical medium itself for whatever purpose, constructive or destructive?

The answers to this question are provided in certain suggestive statements Tesla made in a trial transcript during a trial in New York state. Tesla, now in dire financial straits after J.P. Morgan stopped all further backing of the Wardenclyffe wireless power transmission project, had given the deed of his Wardenclyffe property to the owner of a hotel where he resided as security in return for him being allowed to room in the hotel. When Tesla was unable to pay the hotel bill the owner naturally enough foreclosed on the property, winning a judgment against Tesla. Tesla appealed the case, and it is this transcript that contains some interesting descriptions of the Wardenclyffe property by Tesla, and some even more interesting allusions to the physics properties he thought to be behind it. I cite the transcript at length:

By Mr. Hawkins:

Q. Were there any other structures upon the premises other than that brick factory or laboratory which you have just described?

A. (Tesla speaking) Yes sir, there was the structure which in a certain sense was the most important structure, because the power plant was only an accessory to it. That was the tower.

Q. Please describe the tower as to dimensions and material and method of construction and kind of construction?

> Mr. Fordham: We renew our objection, if the Court please. This is entirely immaterial, irrelevant and incompetent until after they have succeeded in establishing their contention that the deed is a mortgage.
> The Referee: I will take it.
> Mr. Fordham: Exception.

A. The tower was 187 feet high from the base to the top. It was built of special timber and it was built in such a way that every stick could be taken out at any time and replaced if it was necessary. The design of the tower was a matter of considerable difficulty. It was made in the shape of an octagon and pyramidal form for strength and was supporting what I have termed in my scientific articles a terminal.

By the Referee:

Q. There was a sort of globe at the top?

A. Yes. That, your Honor, was only the carrying out of a discovery I made that any amount of electricity within reason could be stored provided you make it of a certain shape. Electricians even today do not appreciate that yet. But that construction enabled me to produce with this small plant many times the effect that could be produced by an ordinary plant of a hundred times the size. And this globe, the framework was all specially shaped, that is the girders had to be bent in shape and it weighed about 55 tons.

By Mr. Hawkins:

Q. Of what was it constructed?

A. Of steel, all the girders being specially bent into shape.

Q. Was the tower that supported it entirely constructed of wood or partly of steel?

A. That part alone on top was of steel. The tower was all timbers and of course the timbers were held together by specially-shaped steel plates.

The Referee: Braces?

The Witness: Yes, steel plates. I had to construct it this way for technical reasons.

The Referee: We are not interested in that.

Q. Was the tower enclosed or open?

A. The tower, at the time of the execution of this deed, was open, but I have photographs to show how it looked exactly and how it would have looked finished.

Q. After you delivered the deed was the tower ever enclosed?

A. No, it was just open.

Q. Now the dome or terminal at the top, was that enclosed?

A. No sir.

Q. Never enclosed?

A. Never enclosed, no.

Q. Had that structure ever been completed?

A. The structure so far, if I understand the terms right, yes, the structure was all completed but the accessories were not placed on it yet. For instance that globe there was to be covered with specially pressed plates. These plates —

Q. That had not been done, had it?

A. *That had not been done, although I had it all prepared. I had prepared everything, I had designed and prepared everything, but it was not done.*270

Q. Was the structure of the tower in any manner connected with the brick building or power plant?

A. The tower was separate.

Q. I understand, but was there any connection between them?

A. There were of course two channels. One was for communicating, for bringing into the tower compressed air and water and such things as I might have needed for operations, and the other one was to bring in the electric mains.

By the Referee:

Q. In order to do that there was, as a matter of fact, was there not, a well-like shaft going down right in the middle of the tower into the ground some 50 or 60 feet?

A. Yes. You see the underground work is one of the most expensive parts of the tower. In this system that I have invented it is necessary for the machine to get a grip of the earth, otherwise it cannot shake the earth. It has to have a grip on the earth so that the whole of this globe can quiver*, and to do that it is necessary to carry out a very expensive construction. But I want to say this underground work belongs to the tower.*

By Mr. Hawkins:

Q. Anything that was there, tell us about.

A. There was, as your Honor states, a big shaft about ten by twelve feet, goes about 120 feet and this was first covered with timber and the inside with steel and in the center of this there was a winding stairs going down and in the center of the stairs there was a big shaft again through which the current was to pass, and this shaft was so figured in order to tell exactly where the nodal point is, so that I could calculate every point of distance. For instance I could calculate exactly the size of the earth or the diameter of the earth and measure it exactly within four feet with that machine.

Q. And that was a necessary appurtenance to your tower?

A. Absolutely necessary. And then the real expensive work was to connect that central part with the earth, and there I had special machines rigged up which would push the iron pipes, one length after another, and I pushed these iron pipes, I think 16 of them, 300 feet, and then the current through these pipes takes hold of the earth. Now that was a very expensive part of the work, but it does not show on the tower, but it belongs to the tower.

Q. Tell the Court generally, not in detail, the purpose of that tower and the equipment which you have described in connection with it?

Mr. Fordham: How is that material?
The Referee: I will take it.
Mr. Fordham: We except.

A. Well, the primary purpose of the tower, your Honor, was to telephone, to send the human voice and likeness around the globe.

By the Referee:

Q. Through the instrumentality of the earth.

A. Through the instrumentality of the earth. That was my discovery that I announced in 1893…

By Mr. Hawkins:

Q. The purpose then briefly was for wireless communications to various parts of the world?

A. Yes and the tower was so designed that I could apply to it any amount of power and I was planning to give a demonstration in the transmission of power which I have so perfected that power can be transmitted clear across the globe with a loss of not more than five per cent, and that plant was to serve as a practical demonstration….[271]

Now look what we have:

> 1. At the same approximate time as Tesla is making these statements in a trial, he is making statements for the New York Times that indicate the same technology of wireless power transmission is capable of using its longitudinal waves to manipulate the physical medium — not just the earth — itself, either for constructive or massively destructive purposes;
> 2. In the transcript itself, Tesla is very careful to state that not only is his system for communications purposes, but for the express purpose of the transmission of power in any amount;
> 3. To do this, Tesla also clearly states in the transcripts that the Tower structure at Wardenclyffe also had a deep shaft so that his system could physically and electrically "grip the earth" and "grip the entire globe" and make it "quiver"; and to do this,
> 4. Tesla also clearly implied that it was necessary to have as exact a measurement of the earth's size, of its geometry, as possible.[272] In other words, the geometrical and non-linear properties of the earth itself were essential components to the system.

The reason it was essential may be recalled from our previous remarks with respect to Dr. Harmut Müller's Global Scaling Theory, namely, that longitudinal pressure waves in the medium itself are responsible for the local warping of space-time and the clustering of objects near certain nodal points where such waves overlap. To put it differently, large masses such as planets or stars are the natural and most efficient resonators of these waves:

> (This) scalar coupling of the solar system provides a major check on unrestricted use of … large…strategic scalar EM weapon systems. If significant scalar effects are produced on earth in a "pulse" mode, pulsed disturbance of the earth-sun and earth-moon > system results. Here a danger exists that one or more natural resonances of the coupled systems may be excited. If the feedback stimulation of the Sun is not insignificant, for example, large sunspot activity may result sometime thereafter, say in a day or two. If too much or too sharp stimulation occurs on earth, the coupled resonant response from the sun could be disastrous….

> Accordingly, use of huge scalar (electromagnetic) weapons is a double-edged sword. Unless carefully employed, use of the weapons could cause a terrible backlash to the user as well as the victim, and even accidentally cause the destruction of the earth itself.[273]

In other words, precise knowledge of local celestial geometries, including the earth, is at all times essential in such a system as Tesla envisioned, and this is, perhaps, why he himself ultimately described the implications of his technology for a deeper physics able to engineer the physical medium itself destructively or constructively. And note, in Tesla's vision, it was quite essential that the system itself be physically and electrically rooted to the earth, for the earth indeed was a huge component in a gigantic electrical circuit. Thus, they do greatly err who would maintain that such a system would more practically be deployable on satellites in space, for the whole point of such longitudinal waves of stress in the medium itself is that they are best established by manipulating their natural resonators: whole planets and stars. To say otherwise is entirely to misunderstand the physics.[274] The best place for the deployment of such systems is precisely on the surface of planets.

C. CONCLUSIONS

So at the end of this journey, we have the following things:

1. There clearly exists a physics of open systems in which ever-changing celestial geometries exercise mutual physical influences;
2. This physics points to a deeper physics of the physical medium itself, which is manipulable via longitudinal waves of stress within the medium, which in turn may be accessible via methods of electrical stress in nonlinear mediums such as the earth, or, in the case of stars, rotating plasmas;
3. This physics and the ability to incorporate whole planets as components of a technology clearly existed, and was asserted, as early as the turn of the last century, in the work and words of Nikola Tesla, who noted both its benign and malign implications were both logical and simultaneous entailments of that same physics and system of technology;
4. As the database of physical science expands with increasing measurements over a vast and disparate body of knowledge, correlations between seemingly unrelated systems began to be noticed, and these correlations included cycles of human economic, sociological, and emotional activity, suggesting the possibility of a deep correlation between physics, economics, and celestial geometries;
5. Significant indicators were also found of discrete but definitive corporate and financial interest in the discovery of the principles of these connections between physics and economics, and in the case of Tesla and Morgan, of efforts to privately develop and later suppress its instrumentalities.

It is in those last two points — the deep correlation between physics, economics, and celestial geometries, and the private development and suppression of its instrumentalities — that we discover a host of questions, and a very ancient, indeed, “paleoancient” connection….

THE TEMPLES, THE STARS, AND THE BANKSTERS

"…so it was that the temple that should owe fealty to the gods alone, became a front for the international money creative force of that day and age; connected closely with the trade in precious metals and slaves as it must have been."

THE ANCIENT ROOTS OF A DEEP RELATIONSHIP

> “The determination of the stars to which some of the Egyptian temples, sacred to a known divinity, were directed, opened a way, as I anticipated, to a study of the astronomical basis of parts of the mythology.”
> — J. Norman Lockyear[275]

> “…to put it in the terse language of Bastiat, society implies exchange, and exchange, money.”
> — Alexander Del Mar[276]

Paradoxically, the farther back in history one goes, the closer the relationship between science, magic, and money becomes. Many have commented upon this relationship, but few have understood its significance for the type of physics that it implies. The nature of this relationship, and the conspiratorial implications that it implies, is best exhibited by examining the relationship of gold mining and slavery in ancient Egypt. But it is important to begin at the beginning, in order to see how, and in what manner, the actions of a conspiracy can be glimpsed. From earliest times, the power to “make and issue money and regulate the value thereof ” (to paraphrase the U.S. Constitution) has been recognized to be the sole prerogative of the State, or, in more ancient times, the crown or king.

As the famous nineteenth-century American numismatic scholar Alexander Del Mar aptly put it, “The right to coin money has always been and still remains the surest mark and announcement of sovereignty.”[277]

Indeed, it is because it is a sure “mark and announcement of sovereignty” that one finds the association of the making and regulation of the legal value of money so intertwined not only with the sovereignty of the state or crown, but with the sovereignty of God (or, as the case may be, of the gods) from whom the power of rule in most ancient societies was invariably perceived to derive, and no better exemplar of this complex relationship between the state control of money issuance, of mining, and the close interlock of both with religion can be found than that of ancient Republican and Imperial Rome.

A. TEMPLES AND TRUSTS

1. The Roman Model

As money in ancient times was primarily — though certainly not exclusively — thought to reside in precious metals such as gold, copper, silver, and in some cases even bronze, it inevitably followed that for a state to maintain its sovereignty over the making, issuance, and regulation of the value of money, it had to exercise a strict control over the mining of those metals:

> Therefore, the means necessary to secure and maintain such a money were for the State to monopolize the copper mines, restrict the commerce in copper, strike copper pieces of high artistic merit, in order to defeat counterfeiting, stamp them with the mark of the State, render them the sole legal tenders for the payment of domestic contracts, taxes, fines, and debts, limit their emission until their value (from universal demand for them and their comparative scarcity) rose to more than that of the metal of which they were composed, and maintain such restriction and over-valuation as the permanent policy of the State. For foreign trade or diplomacy a supply of gold and silver, coined and uncoined, could be kept in the treasury.
> There are ample evidences that means of this character were, in fact, employed by the Roman Republic; and, therefore, that such was the system of money it adopted. The copper mines were monopolized by the Roman State, the commerce in copper was regulated, the bronze nummi were issued by the State, which strictly monopolized their fabrication, and the designs were of great beauty, the pieces were stamped “S.C.,” or ex senates consulta….their emission was limited, until the value of the pieces rose to about five times that of the metal they contained, and they steadily and for a lengthy period retained this high over-valuation.[278]

Thus, we have three interconnected ideas at the outset:

1. The power to coin and regulate the value of money by established law was a prerogative solely of the state or crown, and not of any private money- or credit-issuing monopoly;

2. There was no inherent value in “precious metals” as such, but such value had to be artificially created by the state issuing such money by two means:

a. the relative scarcity of precious metal money issued, which made the legal monetary value of money issued exceed the inherent value of the metal in the coin itself; and,

b. the value was further enhanced by the creation or addition of artwork to the coins issued; and,

3. Because the issuance of money was connected to precious metals such as copper, silver, and gold, the state or crown had to maintain a monopoly over the mining and stockpiling of such metals.

a. The Bullion Trust and the Temple

But in ancient Rome, there is a further factor at work, and it is best to allow Del Mar himself to state what it is: “It is impossible to resist the conviction,” he states, “that the superior value of gold in the West was created by means of legal and, perhaps, also sacerdotal ordinances. This method of fixing the ratio may even have originated in the Orient.”[279] In other words, in fixing the value of gold at a ratio of certain units of value — expressed in terms of other metals — per unit of gold, gold’s value as the ultimate precious metal was established largely through religious ordinances. Moreover, Del Mar suggests this practice originated in “the Orient,” which could mean, as far as Rome was concerned, the Middle East or even the East as far away as India. So one now must add, to the above list, a fourth connection:

4) The value of gold was fixed largely by “sacerdotal ordinance,” in other words, there is a deep and profound connection between the issuance of money, its fixation of value in law in terms of > precious metals whose value in turn is defined by ratios per unit of gold on the one hand, and religion on the other. In short, one is in the presence of the deep connection of ancient conceptions of money, and religion, or as I put it in the chapter title, between “temples” and “trusts.”

But why call such a relationship, on the monetary side of things, a trust at all?

Del Mar provides a significant clue in a statement that, on first glance, seems to evidence nothing more than a difference in monetary and metals policies on the part of Occidental and Oriental societies. He states that “The governments of Persia, Assyria, Egypt, Greece and Rome made a profit on the coinage by raising the value of gold, while those of India, China, and perhaps also Japan, made their profit by maintaining, or enhancing, the value of silver.”280 In other words, for the societies of the Occident — Egypt, Assyria (and presumably Babylon), Persia, Greece, and Rome — artificially defined gold as being the metal of highest value in terms of its convertibility into more units of other metals, while, conversely, the governments of the Orient — India and China — pursued the reverse policy, of making silver the highest valued metal in terms of its convertibility into other metals. Thus, trade could be carried out between these two disparate parts of the world; the policies were in a certain sense an inevitable consequence of that trade. However, a closer examination reveals a hidden player, for such trade will inevitably create the rise of an international trading class, one which, moreover, will create its wealth precisely by trade in these precious metals, metals that are easier to transport than finished goods, and which can be exchanged in any place for such goods. In short, what is being created, from earliest times, is an international financial class of “bullion brokers,” or as we would call them now, bankers. A significant question now occurs: Is it possible that, rather than such a class having emerged as a consequence of such governmental policies and trade, that the converse is true? Is it possible that there existed such a class of “international bullion brokers” who created these policies in various parts of the world, policies which would enhance their own power and wealth? If so, then how did they achieve and orchestrate this?

The answer to that question will consume us in the remaining chapters of this book, but in order to answer it, we must once again turn to the unusual fixation of the value of gold and silver in the Occidental cultures: Greece, Egypt, the Mesopotamian civilizations, and Rome. Why was gold — which was much easier and less costly to mine than silver — valued more highly than silver?

Del Mar has already suggested the answer; it was because in some measure, gold was regarded as sacred, as being under the special jurisdiction of the gods:

> The sacerdotal character conferred upon gold, or the coinage of gold, was not a novelty of the Julian constitution (of Rome); rather was it *an ancient myth put to new political use…*A similar belief is to be noticed among the ancient Greeks, whose coinages, except during the republican era, were conducted in the temples and under the supervision of priests. Upon these issues were stamped the symbolism and religion of the State, and as only the priesthood could correctly illustrate these mysteries of their own creation, the coinage — at least that of the more precious pieces — naturally became a prerogative of their order.[281]

But this raises as many questions as it resolves. For example, Del Mar has clearly indicated that the prerogative of the issuance of money and the regulation of its value was seen by ancient societies to reside clearly with the state or crown. Yet, he has now admitted that insofar as one precious metal was concerned, the issuance of money in connection with it was less a prerogative of the state or crown than it was of a religious monopoly.

Additionally, it has already been suggested that the differences in monetary policies between the Occident and Orient could serve in the long run not only to contribute to the rise of an “international class of bullion brokers,” but also that the creation of such policies might even be due to the preexistence of that class, its international extent, and its ability to manipulate the respective policies of Occidental and Oriental governments. And insofar as that ability to manipulate their respective policies is concerned, when it comes to the high sacredness of gold, at least within

Occidental cultures, this implies also the ability to manipulate their religions. Succinctly stated: the bullion trust and the temple are at the minimum allies, and at the maximum, the one has infiltrated and taken over the other. Or in Del Mar's apt observation, one now seen to be pregnant with meaning and significance just beneath its surface, the sacredness of gold "was an ancient myth put to new political use."[282]

b. A Fascinating Tangent: Byzantium, Religion, and the Money Power

A fascinating glimpse into the strength of this association between the money-issuing prerogative of the state or crown on the one hand, and religion on the other, is afforded by the Eastern Roman or Byzantine Empire, whose power and influence throughout Christian Europe during the Middle Ages extended far beyond its ever-shifting borders. That power and influence was due precisely because of the strength of this relationship, and its hold over the cultural imagination of the Christian Middle Ages, because for all their claimed "divine prerogatives," not even the Roman popes understood their power to include the ability to make and issue money and regulate its value. That prerogative was understood to reside still with the Roman emperor in Constantinople. Noting that the very "moment when these people became Christians, or were conquered or brought under the control of the Roman hierarchy, their gold mines began to be abandoned and closed."[283] Various numismatic scholars had long proffered various unsatisfactory explanations. But, states Del Mar,

> All such futile explanations are effectually answered by the common use of Byzantine gold coins throughout Christendom. In England, for example, the exchequer rolls relating to the mediaeval ages, collated by Madox, prove that payments in gold besants[284] were made every day, and that gold coins, as compared with silver ones, were as common then as now. If metal had been wanted for making English gold coins, it was to be had in sufficiency and at once. All that was necessary was to throw the besants into the English melting-pot. As for the feeble suggestion that for five hundred years no Christian princes wished to coin gold so long as the Basileus[285] was willing to coin for them, when the coinage of > gold was the universally recognized mark of sovereignty, and when, also, the profit… was one hundred per cent, it is scarcely worth answering….

> The true reason why gold money was always used but never coined by the princes of the mediaeval empire relates… to that hierarchical constitution of pagan Rome, which afterwards with modifications became the constitution of Christian Rome. Under this constitution, and from the epoch of Julius to that of Alexis, the mining and coinage of gold was a prerogative attached to the office of the sovereign-pontiff, and was, therefore, an article of the Roman constitution and of the Roman religion.[286]

Thus, as Del Mar notes, prior to the Latin Crusade which attacked and successfully occupied Constantinople in 1204, no Christian prince in Europe dared coin his own gold coins prior to that event, but after it, all of them did.[287] And thus, the hidden motivation for the attack of the Christian West on the Christian East in 1204 is revealed: it was to acquire the legal authority, under the Roman constitution, to make and coin gold money. Thereafter, the money-issuing prerogative devolved to the lesser crowned heads of Europe. Prior to that point, however, it would have been sacrilege to give currency to any other (gold coinage); hence no other Christian prince, not even the pope of Rome, nor the sovereign of the Western or Mediaeval 'empire,' attempted to coin gold while the ancient Empire survived."[288] Such monies were, quite literally, viewed as "heretical money."[289]

Hence, we have yet another possible explanation for the preoccupation of the crowned heads of mediaeval Western Europe with alchemy during the Middle Ages.[290] Alchemy's claim was, of course, to be able to take base metals and transform them into gold. Thus, by taking imitation coins of the gold besant, coins that could not be deemed counterfeit, since they were not circulated nor coined by anyone in gold, and transmuting them into gold, an alchemical end run around Byzantium's money monopoly could be achieved.

a. Nubia and Egypt

The connections thus far exhibited between the money-coining prerogative of the state, the international "bullion brokers' trust," the temple, and now alchemy, leads one inexorably further back into history, and to the even tighter relationships between them that are exhibited in Egypt. It is here that one begins to see more clearly the sinister outlines of that international bullion brokers' trust emerging, and of its deep relationship not only to the temple, but to the deeper physics that the temple, and money, portended. Egypt is also significant for another reason, as we shall see, in that it is a symbol of the relationship of the bullion trust to the temple, a relationship that also occurs in other states and civilizations of the period.

Egypt was probably the largest gold-mining and producing state in the ancient world. The reason is simple: the Nile. As Alexander Del Mar puts it, "Gold has been found in nearly every region tributary to the Nile, from the Equator to the First Cataract."[291] But no region was more connected to gold mining than was the region of Nubia, bordering modern-day southern Egypt and the Sudan. The term Nubia itself "appears to have originated in Egypt, where Nob or Nub signifies gold, hence Nubia, the land of gold."[292] Beneath the foothills of Nubia lies a vast gravel-and-sand expanse of desert, washed during the flood season by numerous streams and gullies. This region is known as the Bisharee or Bishara, the Great Nubian Desert.[293] Del Mar notes that

> Next to the mines of the Altai mountains of India, the Bisharee mines of Egypt are probably the oldest in the world; and in view of the Indian origin of the Egyptians, and the distant researches and conquests which have been made by the leading nations for the acquisition of gold, it seems not at all improbable that there existed a close connection between the discovery of the Egyptian mines and the original settlement of the country by Asiatic races.[294]

So rich were the Bisharee mines in antiquity that it is worth having a closer look at them, for it is in that closer look that we shall discern a pattern beginning to emerge.

b. Quartz, Gold, and Slavery

The Bisharee mines, as noted above, are among the oldest known in antiquity, and some of the most extensive. Additionally, the fields, like many gold mines, are also known for their abundant deposits of quartz:

> If conjecture be admitted where dates are… confused, it appears likely that the Bisharee mines were worked as early as the era of Menes, which is variously assigned to from twenty-nine to thirty-nine centuries B.C.; for in the time of that monarch or lawgiver, the Nile was diked, and from the character of this river and its surroundings there could have been no necessity to dike it until mining had surcharged its waters with sediment.
> The supposed antiquity of these mines derives support from the fact that even at the period of Menes gold had been used for money in India; that Menes was an Indian conqueror and lawgiver; that the Indian Code of Manou, still extant, and assigned variously to from the fifteenth to the thirty-first century B.C., is evidently re-compiled from a much-older code, now lost; that commerce between India and Egypt existed from the remotest times mentioned in history or derived from archaeological remains; that an Egyptian expedition to India is attributed to Sesostris, B.C. 2000, and from other considerations.
> However this may be, the Bisharee mines are known to have been worked for quartz so long ago as the twelfth dynasty, which Lepsius assigns to the period B.C. 2830. From the fact, understood by every miner, that quartz is never worked so long as the placers contain the smallest practical quantity of metal, and judging from the experience of Italy, Spain, and Brazil — where extensive placer deposits were worked, as in Egypt, by the hand labour of slaves — the Bisharee places mines were at least two hundred years old > *when the quartz was worked under the twelfth dynasty of the Pharaohs.*295

Note the presence of two new factors that will loom larger and larger as we proceed: first, the presence of precious or semi-precious stones, in this case, quartz, and the working of such mines by slaves.

c. Diodorus Siculus and the Bishara Mines

It is the presence of slaves at the Bisharee mines that affords us our first significant clue into the minds and mentality of the ancient bullion brokers, and why they and their activities were so often associated with temples. It requires a closer look, which is afforded by the classical writer Diodorus Siculus. Del Mar notes that Diodorus visited the mines in 50 B.C. After the visit, he recorded his impressions of the mines:

> On the confines of Egypt and the neighbouring countries there are regions full of gold mines, whence, with the costs and pains of many labourers, much gold is dug. The soil is naturally black, but in the body of the earth there are many veins of shining white quartz, glit-tering will all sorts of bright metals, out of which those appointed to be overseers cause the gold to be dug by the labour of a vast multitude of people. For the kings of Egypt condemn to these mines not only notorious criminals, captives taken in war, persons accused of false dealings, and those with whom the kind is offended, but also all the kindred and relatives of the latter. These are sent to this work, either as a punishment, or that the profit and gain of the king may be increased by their labours.
> There are thus infinite numbers thrown into these mines, all bound in fetters, kept at work night and day, and so strictly surrounded that there is no possibility of their effecting an escape. They are guarded by mercenary soldiers of various barbarous nations, whose language is foreign to them and to each other, so that there are no means either of forming conspiracies or of corrupting those who are set to watch them. They are kept to incessant work by the rod of the overseer, who often lashes them > severely. Not the least care is taken of the bodies of these poor creatures; they have not a rag to cover their nakedness; and whoever sees them must compassionate their melancholy and deplorable condition, for though they may be sick or maimed or lame, no rest nor any intermission of labour is allowed them. Neither the weakness of old age, nor the infirmities of females, excuse any from the work, to which all are driven by blows and cudgels; until, borne down by the intolerable weight of their misery, many fall dead in the midst of their insufferable labours. Deprived of all hope, these miserable creatures expect each day to be worse than the last, and long for death to end their griefs.[296]

While the passage is one to move any decent human being to compassion and pity for the poor wretches condemned to work the mines, there are two things that should be noted.

First, given the antiquity of the mines of Bisharee and the stability of Egyptian society and culture, it is reasonable to assume that the conditions at the mines had not changed throughout the several centuries that they were worked. Thus, secondly, the presence of an international contingent of mercenary guards of the mines might well be a practice dating back for centuries. The reasons for such an international contingent Diodorus makes clear: it was to deny the condemned any opportunity of bribing a sufficient contingent of guards to effect an escape.

But mercenaries might signal something else, and that is a certain collusion between the Egyptian kings and those able to supply such a large and disparate group of mercenaries. To put it succinctly, the mercenary guard contingent subtly implies the existence of an international money power. But implication is not yet proof.

d. Money, Kings, Temples and Counterfeiters

There is, however, another indication that something more than mere coincidence is involved in the use of mercenaries at the Bisharee mines.

Another clue lies in the widespread association of ancient temples with the issuance of precious metal monies:

> The archaic Chinese and Indian, as well as the early Greek coins, were often marked with emblems, which in the former cases are supposed to be, and in the latter case are known to be, religious. The mints were in the temples, and the priests monopolized, or tried to monopolize, the secrets of metallurgy. This custom may have arisen either from the cupidity of the priesthood to reap the profits of coinage, or solicitude on the part of the sovereign to prevent counterfeiting or to render it the more heinous.[297]

This fact, plus the fact of international contingents of mercenaries at Bisharee, has now amassed a significant series of questions:

> 1. Why were ancient mints in temples, especially if, as Del Mar has conceded and as we have already examined, the prerogative of money issuance and value regulation was solely a state or crown prerogative? Part of the answer, of course, lies in the fact that in most ancient cultures, particularly those of the Middle East, the King was in fact also the chief or high priest, and the priesthood itself often fulfilled the function of the state bureaucracy. Nonetheless the question remains, why associate money issuance with temples?
> 2. The widespread practice of this association in such disparate cultures as China, India, and Greece, itself must be explained. Does it lie, once again, merely in the close association of the crown prerogative with the priesthood in ancient societies, or is there something else involved, something perhaps signaled by the presence of international mercenary contingents at Bisharee?

We have already suggested that the peculiar policies of Rome vis-à-vis the Orient in the regulation of gold and silver valuation suggested a certain amount of collusion between the states so affected, a collusion suggesting an international coordination of such policies. Now, we find at the Bisharee mines yet another suggestion of such international collusion in the presence of mercenaries from various cultures. The question is, then, who is doing it, and why?

Part of the answer is suggested by a passing observation made by Del Mar:

> The Egyptians… possessing the most extensive and productive gold mines which are known to have been worked at any certain period of antiquity…furnished to other nations, including the Indians, the material out of which they too could make money.[298]

This is the surest testament of the fact that we are now in the presence of an international bullion brokers' conspiracy, for why would India need Egyptian gold to issue money? Why could the Indian kings and princes not have issued some other money based on some other commodity which it had in abundance, and require its acceptance by law? Such was their prerogative. So why rely on imports of gold? The argument that an internationally recognized medium of exchange was needed falls to the ground, for as already noted, India and China preferred during the Roman era to value silver higher than gold, while the Occident preferred the reverse. Moreover, by diplomatic agreement and treaty, other mechanisms of exchange could have been agreed upon by various heads of state.

In any case, we now have assembled three discrete types of evidence that point to the possible existence of an international money power, or "bullion brokers" as we have called them, in ancient times:

> 1. The unusual bullion policies of Rome vis-à-vis the Orient, which policies were virtual opposites of each other with respect to the relative valuation of silver and gold bullion. Such reciprocal policies could, of course, highly benefit an international money power with bases of operations in both places, for by transferring gold to the east and converting it to silver, and reaping the fees thereof, and then silver to the west and converting again to gold, vast profits could be accumulated;
> 2. The almost universal association of temples with minting, from the Middle East to China and India; and,

3. The presence of an international contingent of mercenaries from various countries and states at one of antiquity's largest gold mines at Bisharee, mines which in turn are worked by slaves and prisoners of war.

There is, however, a distinctly different association of temples in ancient times, besides that of minting and money issuance…

B. TEMPLES AND TEMPLATES: ASTRONOMY, ASTROLOGY, AND THE ALCHEMY OF MONEY

…that association is with time and its measurement, in short, with astrology and astronomy.

Today, of course, it is widely accepted that ancient temples and megalithic sites were oriented to this or that astronomical event or alignment: the solstices, the precession of the equinoxes, and so on. Societies and civilizations such as Sumer and Babylonia were well-known for their strong astronomical and astrological skills, having left literally thousands of clay tablets recording their observations. But until comparatively recently in the nineteenth century, Egypt was the exception to this rule, until a British astronomer, J. Norman Lockyear, demonstrated that the same held true for Egypt’s temples as well, and from the most ancient times. Lockyear’s book The Dawn of Astronomy: A Study of Temple Worship and Mythology of the Ancient Egyptians began a cycle that continues to this day, with alternative Egyptologists such as Andrew Collins, Graham Hancock and Robert Bauval demonstrating the astronomical layouts and alignments of the site most people associate with ancient Egypt: the pyramids and temples of Giza. One might thus well view Lockyear as one of the first modern “paleophysicists,” i.e., a modern scientist looking at ancient myths seriously, and attempting to reconstruct from them an underlying scientific basis.[299]

Lockyear notes that ancient civilizations’ astronomical and astrological records go back almost to the very edges of known antiquity:

> We go back in Egypt for a period, as estimated by various authors, of something like 6,000 or 7,000 years. In Babylonia inscribed tablets carry us into the dim past for a period of certainly 5,000 years; but the so-called “omen” tablets indicate that observations of eclipses and other astronomical phenomena had been made for some thousands of years before this period. In China and India we go back as certainly to more than 4,000 years ago.[300]

Indeed, in Babylon’s case, if one is to take the assertions of the “omen tablets” seriously, these observations comprised a database assiduously compiled for hundreds of thousands of years![301]

Decoding the association of various Egyptian temples to various gods, and the association of the latter in turn with various celestial bodies, Lockyear states his main thesis toward the end of his book, calling it his “working hypothesis”:

> 1. The first civilisation as yet glimpsed, so far as temple building goes, in Northern Egypt, represented by that at Annu or Heliopolis, was a civilisation with a non-equinoctial solar worship, combined with the cult of a northern star.
> 2. Memphis (possibly also Sais, Bubastis, Tanis and other cities with east and west walls) and the great pyramids were built by a new invading race, representing an advance in astronomical thought. The northern stars were worshipped possibly on the meridian, and a star rising in the east was worshipped at each equinox.
> 3. The subsequent blank in Egyptian history was associated with conflicts between these and other races; which were ended by the victory of the representatives of the old worship of Annu, reinforced from the south, as if north-star and south-star cults had combined against the equinoctial cult.
> After these conflicts, east and west pyramid building practically ceased, Memphis takes second place, and Thebes, a southern Annu, so far as the form of solar worship and the cult of Sit are concerned, comes upon the scene as the seat of the twelfth dynasty.
> 4. The subsequent historical events were largely due to conflicts with intruding races from the north-east. The intruders established themselves in cities with east and west walls, and were on each occasion driven out by solstitial worshippers who founded dynasties (eighteenth and twenty-fifth) at Thebes.[302]

We shall not concern ourselves with the lengthy arguments that Lockyear presented in order to arrive at these conclusions, but note only that the various conflicts in Egypt — given Lockyear's astronomical premise for temple orientation — were in a certain sense as much about physics as they were about religion. Given the fact that Babylonian temples were well known to be associated with various deities and celestial bodies, and that Egypt's demonstrably were as well, as Lockyear argued, we now note the peculiar fact that temples, for a reason as yet unknown, were closely associated both with celestial alignments and the minting and issuance of bullion-based monies.

One possible reason for the association, however, is suggested by well-known space anomalies researcher Richard C. Hoagland. We may approach Hoagland's remarks by noting a curious fact observed by Lockyear: "…In Lower Egypt the temples are pointed to rising stars near the north point of the horizon or setting north of west. In Upper Egypt we deal chiefly with temples directed to stars rising in the south-east or setting low in the south-west."[303] The fact that so many ancient temples show evidence both of a profound association with the stars through their astrological alignments, and also of international banking through the prominent association of moneychangers with those temples, is an indicator that at a deep and profound level — perhaps as a legacy of the Very High Civilization from which they sprang — these classical civilizations through their marriage of banking and astrology preserved the dim memory of a lost science that unified physics, economics, and finance.

Hoagland made the following interesting series of observations in 1992 during his presentation of the Mars anomalies evidence during a briefing at the United Nations:

> Or take the Sun itself. For the last several years, scientists have been looking for nuclear particles supposedly coming from the center of the Sun because of its thermonuclear reactions, a kind of 'chained H-bomb' model. But for the last 20 years, they haven't found anywhere near as many of these particles as models would predict; in fact, the Soviets and the Japanese, who have recently brought on line experiments to measure fundamental particles, > have found none. Is it possible that at the very center of our solar system, this incredible blazing ball of gas, around which all the worlds in this system orbit, is in fact fueled from another source? …Well, this opens up remarkable possibilities which, when we look back at our cultures on this planet, and their attention to the Sun, others may have also noticed.

> When we look at the stars, at the sky at night, we're not seeing chained and imprisoned H-bombs, we're seeing portals to another dimension. And the portals are glowing windows through which we can peer and glimpse the fragments of a physics from another side. What is stunning is when you take that metaphor, and you go back and you read the actual Egyptian descriptions in the hieroglyphs for Sirius, the brightest star in the sky, the description is (that) Sirius is a doorway. Now what did they know? What did they know?
> Now, looking at that as a twentieth-century Egyptologist, or as a modern anthropologist, or as any of the academics looking at the history of man and archaeology, the obvious answer is: 'They didn't know anything. It was all primitive superstition.' … (But) we can now buttress with specific mathematical linkages, which indicate strongly (that) the Egyptians, among others, were profoundly aware that the night sky and all of reality is somehow circumscribed by the physics behind the circumscribed geometry given to us now by the Monuments of Mars. And that of course is an amazing statement to be able to make.
> But there's another, because the thought occurred then, after we had figured this part out — the potential, the possibility — that if in fact the Sun is a 'gate' to another dimension, and (that) the energy we see is merely a lower-level transformation of a higher-level force or energy or process, it may be possible to harness such a process on earth and to create an actual hyper-dimensional technology. What could one do…?[304]

What, indeed, did ancient Egypt, and by implication, all other ancient cultures, with their persistent and consistent association of stars with deities or “higher intelligences” and other dimensions, know? Was there indeed a deeper physics behind their astrological obsessions? And what could one do with that physics? Hoagland has also suggested something else as well, and that is that there is a physics connection with the ancient fixation on “sacred geometry” and the positioning of various temples and buildings on sites that embody such geometries, in this case, on Mars. And why does one find moneychangers invariably associated with these temples? One answer is hinted at by Lockyear.

2. The Peculiar Resemblance of Pantheons Between Cultures

Lockyear makes yet another pertinent observation relevant to our purposes. To understand its significance, one need only consider the fact that if temples are associated with various gods — whether in Egypt or Mesopotamia — and various gods in turn are associated with various celestial bodies, then there should be considerable parallel between the pantheons of various civilizations, since, in a word, the underlying astronomical data are the same. This, he observes, is in fact what one actually sees. There is a peculiar parallel between the Egypt god Annu or An, and the Babylonian Anu.[305] More to the point, on an astrological-astronomical reading, the gods blend into each other. For example, the chief god of the Mesopotamian city of Eridu was Ea, a.k.a. Enki, a.k.a. Oannes, “symbolized as a goat-fish.”[306] This Ea or Enki sired a son, Tammuz, who was “in some way associated with Asari,” who, notes Lockyear, has a name suspiciously similar to the Egyptian Osiris.[307] The god Tammuz in turn ultimately becomes the notoriously murderous god Nergal in Chaldaea.[308] Nergal by similar astronomical conversions eventually actually becomes “the Spring Sun Marduk” of Babylon itself.[309] In other words, lurking behind all these transformations and pantheonic parallels is the association of Enki with Nergal and Marduk, and via Tammuz, with the Egyptian Osiris. Such pantheonic parallels are, once again, inevitable if, as Lockyear shows, the gods themselves are associated with various celestial bodies. The patterns of the heavens, as it were, formed a template with which to associate certain gods and their activities.

However, given the fact that we now have the close association of temples not only with astronomy and astrology, but with money issuance and therefore with mining, and given the fact that we have discovered three significant indicators that we may also be looking at the discrete and subtle actions of an ancient international “bullion brokers” power, the similarity of pantheons may have other than just astronomical causes. It may indeed be a product of the deliberate manipulation of those pantheons by an entity that has every appearance of being international in extent and influence in ancient times. But to what purpose? The answer to that question must unfortunately await the next chapter, as there is a further association of gods, gold and temples to be explored:

That other association is with precious and semi-precious gems. It is a peculiar fact, notes researcher George Frederick Kunz, that

> From the earliest times in man's history gems and precious stones have been found in great esteem. They have been found in the monuments of prehistoric peoples, and not alone the civilization of the Pharaohs, of the Incas, or of the Montezumas invested these brilliant things from Nature's jewel casket with a significance beyond the mere suggestion of their intrinsic properties.[310]

But why give such items a significance beyond "their intrinsic properties"? One answer might lie in their well-known association with astrology from ancient times:

> The magi, the wise men, the seers, the astrologers of the ages gone by found much in the matter of gems that we have nearly come to forgetting. With them each gem possessed certain planetary attractions peculiar to itself, certain affinities with the various virtues, and a zodiacal concordance with the seasons of the year. Moreover, these early sages were firm believers in the influence of gems in one's nativity — that the evil in the world could be kept from contaminating a child properly protected by wearing the appropriate talismanic, natal, and zodiacal gems.[311]

That is to say, gems, since they were associated with certain celestial alignments, planetary bodies, and houses of the zodiac, could quite literally, on the ancient view, draw down (or ward off!) the influences of those bodies and alignments. But why did such a belief originate? What is its underlying cause?

Search as one might for the answer to those questions amid ancient texts and tomes,[312] one always comes up empty-handed, being met with the bare and naked assertion that it is so, with perhaps now and then an attempt — usually unconvincing — as to why it is so. Kunz even notes that during the Renaissance "an effort was made to find a reason of some sort for the traditional beliefs."[313] Nor is he above suggesting that eventually, science itself might suggest the reasons, or rather, re-discover them.[314]

a. The Traditional Powers Associated with Gems

Leaving aside the speculative scientific case for this association to a later chapter, we shall catalogue here but a few of their alleged powers and virtues attributed to them by ancient lore. One almost universal property attributed to them is the ability to heal various maladies and infirmities .[315] Oftentimes these were associated specifically to their various colors and relative luminescence.[316] In one case, a Hindu tradition even describes diamonds as "Indra's weapon."[317] There are, in the Sumerian tradition, stones of "love" and "hate," or, as the Sumerian literally has it, "un-love."[318] And as readers of my book The Cosmic War know, one Sumerian epic, The Epic of Ninurta, is nothing but a rather dull inventory-taking of some extraordinary stones that were captured after a gruesome war, shades of the imaginary scenario with which we began this book![319]

And there are even some rather special cases of powers attributed to gemstones that merit closer attention.

(1) Special Case Number One: Invisibility

Kuns cites a passage from the 1659 treastise "The Faithful Lapidary" by Thomas Nicols that is worth mentioning here. Nicols begins by enumerating a typical list of the reputed and assumed powers of precious gems:

> Perfectionem effectus contineri in causa. But it cannot truly be so spoken of gemms [sic] and pretious [sic] stones, the effects of which, by Lapirists are said to be, the making of men rich and eloquent, to preserve men from thunder and lightning, from plagues and diseases, to move dreams, to procure sleep, to foretell things to come, to make men wise, to strengthen memory, to procure honours, to hinder fascinations and witchcrafts, to hinder slothfulness, to put courage into men, to keep men chaste, to increase friendship, to hinder difference and dissention…

This is a fairly standard list, and one can even understand the attribution of the power “to foretell things to come” to stones, for given their astrological associations, it stands to reason that the predictive properties of astrology should be associated with gemstones. But then comes a rather unusual statement:

> … and to make men invisible, as is … affirmed by Albertus and others… and many other strange things are affirmed of them and ascribed to them, which are contrary to the natures of gemms.[320]

One wonders just what other “strange things” could possibly be attributed to the powers of gemstones beyond conferring invisibility!

The belief that some stones could confer invisibility was echoed by a fourteenth-century alchemist, Pierre de Boniface, who claimed that diamonds could make the wearer invisible.[321] Given that an alchemist is making these claims, one might be justified in drawing the speculative conclusion that this operation could only occur at certain times and under certain conditions, given the well-established fact that most alchemists claimed their operations had to be performed at certain times in order for them to work.

(2) Special Case Number Two: Magnetic Levitation, or Anti-Gravity

An even more stunning claim is made in a Viennese print of 1709 and an accompanying text of Valentini, “Museum museorum oder die vollständige Schau-Bühne,” an obscure manuscript published in Frankfurt-am-Main in 1714:

> According to the text accompanying a curious print published in Vienna in 1709, the attractive qualities of the so-called coral-agate were to be utilized in an air ship, the invention of a Brazilian priest. Over the head of the aviator, as he sat in the air-ship, there was a network of iron to which large coral-agates were attached. These were expected to help in drawing up the ship, when, through the heat of the sun’s rays, the stones had acquired magnetic power. The main lifting force was provided by powerful magnets enclosed in > two metal spheres; how the magnets themselves were to be raised is not explained.[322]

Here it is evident that, for whatever obscure reason, coral-agate was thought to somehow amplify the effects of magnets in conjunction with exposure to the rays of the sun!

(3) Special Case Number Three: Light-Absorbing and Emitting Stones

A much more serious special case is mentioned by Kunz in connection with the peculiar properties of Brazilian diamonds:

> The power of absorbing sunlight or artificial light and then giving it off in the dark is only possessed by certain diamonds. These are Brazilian stones, slightly milky in tint, or blue-white as they are often termed, and it is an included substance and not the diamond itself giving it out. Willemite, kunzite, sphalerite (sulphide of zinc) and some other minerals possess the same power. Their peculiar property may be due to the presence of a slight quantity of manganese or to that of some of the uranium salts. That it is only the ultra-violet rays that are thus absorbed by these diamonds is proved by the fact that the phenomenon is not observable when a thin plate of glass is interposed between the sunlight of artificial light and the diamond, as glass is not traversed by these rays….
> On the other hand all diamonds phosphoresce when exposed to the rays of radium, polonium, or actinium, even when glass is interposed. Treating of some of the aspects of phosphorescence in diamonds, Sir William Crookes says:

> read by its rays. But the time has hardly come when diamonds can be used as domestic illuminants!"[323]

This is a rather interesting comment by Crookes, for archaeologists have long puzzled how the ancient Egyptians managed to see inside their temples. If one grants the proposition that they may have known of and used electricity or other sources of phosphorescence, then might they perhaps have discovered this quality of diamonds or other stones?

In answer to this question, Kunz makes an interesting observation:

> An old treatise in Greek, said in its title to come from "the sanctuary of the temple," and containing material, partly of Egyptian origin, may help us to understand something of the processes employed by a temple priest to impress the common people by the sight of luminous gems. The writer of the treatise declares that for the production of "the carbuncle that shines in the night" use was made of certain parts (he says "the bile") of marine animals whose entrails, scales and bones exhibited the phenomenon of phosphorescence. If properly treated, precious stones (preferably carbuncles) would glow so brightly at night "that anyone owning such a stone could read or write by its light as well as he could by daylight."[324]

Note that the source for this assertion comes from ancient Greek alchemical texts. And alchemy is, of course, invariably associated with Egypt and its temples. We may reasonably assume, then, that such properties, if known to the ancient Egyptian temple priesthoods, were among their most closely guarded secrets.

b. Gemstones, the Zodiac, and the Hebrew High-Priest's Ephod, or Breastplate

Perhaps the most familiar association of precious gemstones with the temple and religion in Western culture is the breastplate, or ephod, of the Hebrew high priests described in the Old Testament of the Bible, so it is worth pausing, before concluding this chapter, to take stock of the various associations of the breastplate in Jewish lore. Kunz observes that in Rabbinical legend “it is related that four precious stones were given by God to King Solomon; one of these was the emerald. The possession of the four stones is said to have endowed the wise king with power over all creation.”[325] This is a rather breathtaking claim for the power of these stones, whatever else they were in addition to the emerald.

In my book The Cosmic War I noted that similar claims were made for the Sumerian “Tablets of Destiny,” stones which allegedly conferred “all the power of the universe” on their possessors, making them a technology highly prized — and fought over — by the various Sumerian gods.[326] Here we encounter a similar claim, from a much later period, and in a different culture. Solomon, of course, is known not only for his legendary wisdom and wealth, but is also associated with the building of a magnificent temple.

It is possible, if such stones existed, that the celebrated Hebrew king wore them in a royal version of the priestly breastplate or ephod, for there do exist Assyrian versions of the breastplate, composed of seven gems — one for each of the seven planets of Mesopotamian astrology — and to be worn by the king:

> Among the Assyrian texts giving the formulae for incantations and various magical operations, there is one which treats of an ornament composed of seven brilliant stones, to be worn on the breast of the king as an amulet; indeed, so great was the virtue of these stones that they were supposed to constitute an ornament for the gods also. The text, as rendered by Fossey, is as follows:
> “Incantation. The splendid stones! The splendid stones! The stones of abundance and joy.
> “Made resplendent for the flesh of the gods.
> “The hulalini stone, the sirgarru stone, the hulalu stone, the sandu stone, the uknu stone.
> “The dushu stone, the precious stone elmeshu, perfect in celestial beauty.
> “The stone of which the pingu is set in gold.

> “Placed upon the shining breast of the king as an ornament.
> “Azagsud, high-priest of Bel, make them shine, make them sparkle!
> “Let the evil one keep aloof from the dwelling!”[327]

Note carefully the reference to the Assyrian high priest, exhorting him to make the stones shine and sparkle, suggesting that not only did Egyptian temple priests have a secret of making gemstones phosphoresce, but that their Mesopotamian counterparts did as well.

Similar breastplates were associated with Babylon and even the king of Tyre as well.[328] So what of the Hebrew high priest’s breastplate? Here there is a rich rabbinical, and even Muslim, tradition. The 12 stones of the high priest’s breastplate are first associated with the 12 angels who “guard the gates of Paradise.”[329] The Jewish historian Flavius Josephus, moreover, records a tradition in which the high priest’s garments were also fastened at the shoulders with phosphorescing stones.[330] Moreover, each of the 12 stones of the breastplate was engraved with the names of each of the 12 tribes.[331] Josephus further associates the 12 stones of the ephod to the 12 months of the year,[332] and to the zodiac as well.[333] By mediaeval times, Jewish tradition definitely associated the 12 tribes to the signs of the zodiac in the following correspondence:

Judah	Aries
Issachar	Taurus
Zebulun	Gemini
Reuben	Cancer
Simeon	Leo
Gad	Virgo
Ephraim	Libra
Manasseh	Scorpio
Benjamin	Sagittarius
Dan	Capricorn
Naphtali	Aquarius

Asher Pisces[334]

The breastplate, like the Ark of the Covenant, is one of those objects of historical and religious power from the Jewish temple that, after the fall of Jerusalem to the Roman armies in 70 A.D., seems to disappear from history. Where did the ephod with its precious gems go?

Kunz’s answer is worth citing extensively:

> (T)he treasures of the temple were carried off to Rome, and we learn from Josephus that the breastplate was deposited in the Temple of Concord, which had been erected by Vespasian. Here it is believed to have been at the time of the sacking of Rome by the Vandals under Genseric, in 455, although Rev. C.W. King thinks it is not improbable that Alaric, king of the Visigoths, when he sacked Rome in 410 A.D., might have secured this treasure. However, the express statement of Procopius that “the vessels of the Jews” were carried through the streets of Constantinople, on the occasion of the Vandalic triumph of Belisarius, in 534, may be taken as a confirmation of the conjecture that the Vandals had secured possession of the breastplate and its jewels.
> It must, however, be carefully noted that Procopius nowhere mentions the breastplate and that it need not have been included among “the vessels of the Jews.” It appears that this part of the spoils of Belisarius was placed by Justinian (4830565) in the sacristy of the church of St. Sophia. Some time later, the emperor is said to have heard of the saying of a certain Jew to the effect that, until the treasures of the Temple were restored to Jerusalem, they would bring misfortune upon any place where they might be kept. If this story be true, Justinian may have felt that the fate of Rome was a lesson for him, and that Constantinople must be saved from a like disaster. Moved by such considerations, he is said to have sent the “sacred vessels” to Jerusalem, and they were placed in the Church of the Holy Sepulchre.

> This brings us to the last two events which can even be plausibly connected with the mystic 12 gems — namely, the capture and sack of Jerusalem by the Sassanian Persian king, Khusrau II, in 615, and the overthrow of the Sassanian Empire by the Mohammedan Arabs, and the capture and sack of Ctesiphon, in 637. If we admit that Khusrau took the sacred relics of the Temple with him to Persia, we may be reasonably sure that they were included among the spoils secured by the Arab conquerors, although King, who has ingeniously endeavored to trace out the history of the breastplate jewels after the fall of Jerusalem in 70 A.D., believes that they may be still "buried in some unknown treasure-chamber of one of the old Persian capitals."
> A fact which had generally been overlooked by those who have embarked on the sea of conjecture relative to the fate of the breastplate stones is that a large Jewish contingent, numbering some twenty-six thousand men, formed part of the force with which the Sassanian Persians captured Jerusalem, and they might well lay claim to any Jewish vessels of jewels that may have been secured by the conquerors. In this case, however, it is still probable that these precious objects fell into the hands of the Mohammedans who captured Jerusalem in the same year in which they took Ctesiphon.[335]

Contrary to all those who believe that the Ark and breastplate ended up in the West in the hands of the Vandals and Visigoths, Kunz is correct, for by injecting the East Roman Empire back into the equation, he is clearly saying, "Look east rather than west" if one wishes to discover the whereabouts of the old Jewish temple treasure.[336]

C. CONCLUSIONS

The following constellation of relationships, and implications, has been exhibited in this chapter:

1. There are at least three disparate and significant clues to the existence of an international money power in ancient times, and to its reliance upon precious metal bullion as a medium of monetary exchange:

a. The unusual bullion policies of Rome vis-à-vis the Orient, which policies were virtual opposites of each other with respect to the relative valuation of silver and gold bullion. Such reciprocal policies could, of course, highly benefit an international money power with bases of operations in both places, for by transferring gold to the east and converting it to silver, and reaping the fees thereof, and then silver to the west and converting again to gold, vast profits could be accumulated;

b. The almost universal association of temples with minting, from the Middle East to China and India; and,

c. The presence of an international contingent of mercenaries from various countries and states at one of antiquity's largest gold mines at Bisharee, mines which in turn are worked by slaves and prisoners of war.

2. In addition to the association of temples with the minting and issuance of money, and therefore with mining activity, these temples are also associated with astronomy and astrology;

3. Additionally, astrology and astronomy are in turn associated with precious gemstones, each type of which is associated with various planetary bodies and their influences;

4. The various gods of the pantheons of the Middle East, since they can at one level be decoded as celestial bodies, are parallel, that is to say, the various pantheons themselves show remarkable parallels due to their similar astrological derivation. At this juncture, a significant question was implied:

a. Could the parallelism of various pantheons be due not only to their astronomical derivation, but also because of the activity of that class of international bullion brokers that appears to be associated with the temple in all lands, and influencing the bullion policy to its advantage in several states?

b. If so, then is there a deeper reason for their association with the practice of astrology in the temples? If there is, then what is it? And what is the connection between all this, and precious gemstones?

c. These gemstones were seen in turn by the ancients and in esoteric tradition to have certain powers; among these we note the following:

i) They possessed the power to heal;

ii) They possessed the power to predict the future;

iii) They could phosphoresce under certain conditions, and this was most likely a closely held secret of the temple priesthoods in various civilizations;

iv) They conferred invisibility;

v) They conferred the power to levitate;

vi) In Solomon's case, certain stones conferred power over creation.

We are thus in the presence of a complex dynamic, and making sense of it will not be easy, but before we can address this issue, we must assemble more data by taking a closer look at the activities of this ancient "bullion brokers' international," for those activities will disclose the common thread and clue: alchemy.

MONEY, MONOTHEISM, MONARCHIES AND MILITARIES

THE THESIS OF DAVID ASTLE

“They are but pudgy and sly little men as much overwhelmed by the monster they have raised, as are the foolish nations that permitted them to do so.”

— David Astle[337]

A. THE STATE OF EVIDENCE AND THE NEED FOR SPECULATION

David Astle is a researcher who has assembled a massive database and well-argued case for the existence, in ancient times, of an international bullion brokers' trust, allied with the temple, manipulating governments, religions, pantheons and policies behind the scenes for its own benefit and agenda. As such our examination here can only be a brief review of his work. It is to be emphasized that this review is but a small sampling of the types of evidence and analyses that Astle provides.[338]

This being said, Astle himself provides a strong cautionary note on the difficult state of the evidence, and the need for speculation. Noting that all ancient societies had a system of state warehouses connected with its money coining and regulating power, Astle states that

> In almost all of the works of the great archaeologists and scholars specializing in the ancient civilizations, there is a virtual silence on that all important matter, the system of distribution of food surpluses, and surpluses of all those items needed towards the maintenance of a good and continuing life so far as were required by climate and custom.
> In all the writings of these great and practical scholars, the workings of that mighty engine which injects the unit of exchange amongst the peoples, and without which no civilization as we know it can come to be, is only indicated by a profound silence. Of the system of exchanges, of the unit of exchange and its issue by private individuals, as distinct from its issue by the authority of sovereign rule, on this all important matter governing in such totality the conditions of progression into the future of these peoples, not a word to speak of.[339]

There is a related question, and Astle is quick to perceive it: not only is there a paucity of evidence relating how such an international bullion brokers' class might have arisen nor evidence as to "what created them,"[340] it is the pervasive and almost universal absence of such evidence that “borders on the mystifying.” Additionally, there is in scholarly literature on ancient international monetary policy a “complete failure to speculate on those most important matters at all.” But most importantly, Astle observes, there is a complete absence of speculation on “the true nature of the energy source by which such machinery was driven.”[341]

While Astle clearly throughout his work believes that energy source to be the widespread practice of slavery in ancient times, and while we tend to agree with him insofar as that goes, there is a deeper question that Astle’s comments disclose: was there another and deeper energy source that existed in, or was being sought by, those ancient “bullion brokers”’ fraternities besides slavery?

In any case, it is this perplexing silence on such crucial matters that calls for, indeed almost compels, speculation to fill the void.

> Practically no information seems to exist of the growth of private money creation in the days of the ancient city states of Mesopotamia of which, because of their records being preserved on fire-baked clay, more is known than of more recent civilizations; and the gap must necessarily be filled by a certain amount of speculation. Little is known of the beginnings of the fraudulent issuance by private persons of the unit of exchange, as in opposition to the law of the gods from whom kings in ancient times claimed to derive their divine origin.[342]

Thus, we now encounter a new dynamic: if the assumption of the existence of a private international bullion brokers’ power has merit, then there is a conflict between its private money-creating powers and that of the various states within which it exists. There are thus two operating units of exchange according to Astle: on the one hand, one has the circulation of coins of bullion as a unit of exchange, which coins were issued by temples and their allies, the bullion brokers, those who controlled the mines and slaves. On the other hand, one has the issuance — in Mesopotamia — of clay units of exchange, issued by the state power itself in conjunction with the temple, which units were backed by the surpluses of the state warehouses.[343]

1. Ancient and Modern Banking Conspiracy

Notwithstanding all this, Astle admits, largely on the types of considerations advanced in the previous chapter here, that there are significant indicators within ancient societies of …(T)he existence of a far-reaching conspiracy in respect to monetary issuance influencing the progression of man’s history in the earliest times of which written records exists. It is also outstandingly clear that it was parent to that acknowledged and most obvious conspiracy such as exists today.[344]

There is, in other words, more or less a continuity between ancient times and modern ones. The question is: what is the nature of that continuity? Is it merely conceptual, rooted in the similarities of goals, methods, and beliefs of the people engaged in such activites? Or is the continuity deeper? Does it extend to actual descent of certain families and groups down through history? As will be seen in this chapter, one can answer at least the first question with a resounding affirmative. And as will be seen momentarily, there are also significant indicators that the second question may be affirmatively answered in some cases as well.

B. THE MEDIUM OF EXCHANGE AND BULLION AS AN ORDER ON STATE WAREHOUSES

Astle's argument, while profound, is not always easily seen, scattered as it is throughout his book. Care is required in noticing its steps and taking due account of them in order that its transparency may be fully exhibited. We have already noted in the previous chapter, and in this one, the following things:

> 1. The regulation of the value of money was established by law and regulated by the state or crown, whose sole prerogative was the issuance and regulation of such units of money;
> 2. There was a deep and profound relationship between the minting and issuance of such money in the form of bullion-based coins by the crown or state power, and the temple;
> 3. Prior to this period, however, in Mesopotamia, the units of exchange, as noted by Astle, were simply clay tablets of credit against the surplus in the state warehouse.

It is at this last point that the story, and Astle's argument, really begins.

The reason is easily seen, for if one were to conduct trade between states, the issuances of money in the form of letters of credit against a given state's warehouse surplus would inhibit, rather than aid, such trade. Another mechanism was required that would not require a diplomatic negotiation between states for each and every trade. Thus, at one and the same time as a medium of international exchange is more or less agreed upon, there also arises an international class of merchants conducting such trade and exercising sweeping influence over those units of exchange. Astle states it with his characteristic sharpness and concision:

> Through stealthy issue of precious metal commodity money into circulation amongst the peoples, replacing that money which represented the fiat of will of the god of the city and which was merely an order on the state warehouses through his scribes, this internationally-minded group from the secrecy of their chambers > were able to make a mockery of the faith and belief of the simple people.[345]

In other words, at a certain juncture and by the nature of the case, there will be two monies in circulation, one created by a private group and based on bullion commodity money issued as a facsimile of the state money for which it can be traded and substituted, and the second, the original state-issued money. It should be noted that this situation is almost exactly paralleled in modern times by the issuance of state money and private notes both in England and in the United States.[346] In both the ancient and modern instances, the privately-issued money gradually and with inexorable inevitability replaces the state issuance, and with that occurrence, the power of the private issuers of such monies is established over a society.

But how was this substitution actually made? What was the stratagem that made it possible for ancient bullion brokers to achieve this extraordinary and sweeping influence over ancient states? The answers to these questions require an even closer look.

1. The Control of Mining and Bullion

The issuance of bullion-based monies implies something very significant, and Astle is quick to perceive it:

> The whole notion of the institution of precious metals by weight as common denominator of exchanges, internationally and nationally, cannot but have been disseminated by a conspiratorial organization fully aware of the extent of the power to which it would accede, could it but maintain control over bullion supplies and the mining which brought them into being in the first place.[347]

We have already seen how Egypt's Bisharee mines, with their contingent of international mercenary guards, implies the existence of such an international class of merchants and bullion brokers.

As an inevitable consequence of such activity, "the law of the ruler previously exercised towards the well-being of the people in that might live a good and honourable life accordingly became corrupted,"[348] since that crown power was inevitably in collusion with the very class undermining its power. This fact is attested by the rise of laws of punishment condemning lawbreakers to a lifetime of slavery working the semi-private mines which supplied both the state and the merchants with the medium of exchange that created their profits. Again, the situation is almost exactly paralleled by modern times, where one again encounters a private monied class in collusion with the state power for the expansion of their powers over the great masses of people.

A further implication falls out from this, and again, one perceives instantly the modern parallel:

> Kings largely became the mouthpiece and sword arm of those semi-secret societies that controlled the material of money as its outward and visible symbols came to be restricted to gold, silver, and copper… The fiat of the god in heaven which had been the decisive force behind that which brought about an equitable > exchange, was replaced by the will of those classes controlling the undertones of civilization, leaders of the world of slave drivers, caravaneers, outcasts and criminals generally, such as was to be discerned on the edges of the ancient city civilizations….. The instrument of this will was precious metal, whose supply was controlled by the leaders of these classes through their control of the slave trade, since mining was rarely profitable in the case of the precious metals, except with slave labour…[349]

In support of this contention, Astle notes that prior to the fourth century B.C., the institution of slavery "had been more in the nature of a benign custom similar to the custom of the bonded servant or apprentice of the 18th and 19th centuries in Northern Europe."[350] After that period, however, it became an extensive and international trade, complete with whips and chains and all the imagery of human suffering one associates with the institution.

Thus we now have an increasingly expanded, and interesting, constellation of relationships:

1. A relationship between priest-kings, the temple, money minting and issuance, and a private class of international bullion brokers;

2. A relationship of the latter class with the slave trade necessary to conduct profitable mining to circulate bullion as a medium of exchange;

3. A relationship of the temple with money minting and issuance on behalf of that private class of bullion brokers and slave traders; and finally,

4. A relationship of the temple to astrology and all its associated accoutrements: gems, sacred geometry, earth grid locations for temples, priest-magicians, forecasters, and so on.

The relationship between this private class and the temples in various states exercised a correspondingly corrupting influence on their priesthoods:

> …(I)t is clear that with the growth of silver in circulation between private persons, and between private persons and states, as now would become an inevitability, that which had been total economic control from the gods through his servants in the Ziggurat, was bypassed, and merchants were not able to deal privately using their credit, or powers of abstract money creation. They were also able, through their control of distant mining operations, to afflict a previously dedicated priesthood with thought of personal possession, and through the control of manufacture of weapons in distant places, they were able to arm warlike peoples towards the destruction of whosoever they might choose.[351]

Notice the dynamic subtly suggested here, for through its associations with the various temple priesthoods such a class also influences war policies of the various states under its influence, and these as might be expected could often be in the guise of religious conflicts.[352]

Citing scholar T.B.L. Webster, Astle comments at length on this dynamic:

> “The Alalakh tablets also record copper distributed to smiths, but not in addition it is to be used for making baskets or arrowheads; and the King of Assyria sent copper to Mari to be made into nails by the local craftsmen. A Report from Pylos that the woodcutters in two places are delivering 150 axles and 150 spars for the chariot factory may be compared with the Ugartic texts on the delivery of wood for the making of arms, and a note of wood delivered to the carpenters for the construction of wagons in Alalakh. We made here also from Pylos a list of wooden objects made, a list of vessels received by men (perhaps Mayors) in various places and a note of pieces of ivory; to set beside this rather slender evidence of Mycenaean manufacture, Alalakh provides a record of sixty-four business houses and their produce; they include smiths, leather workers, joiners, and cartwrights.”[353]
> Thus it seems that where the conception of money as to a silver standard existed as at Ugarit and Alalakh, so also existed organized industry, including outstandingly the private > manufacture of arms under methods that appear to be those of semi-mass productions. It is not without significance that this early era of privately issued money (such as was silver money), and consequent private industry, particularly that which was devoted to arms manufacture, was in certain areas so coincidental with the massive movements of warlike peoples, and the collapse of ancient empires that had lived long under the pattern of life known as that of the Ancient Orient. Conquering peoples needed the best of arms. It seems that the best of arms were obtainable from private industry; and private industry in its turn needed silver or gold or labour, which was slaves, in payment. Both were obtainable as the result of war. Therefore parallel, though not entirely the same as in today, the more war, the more industry, and the more the need for the products of the money creators' ledgers. Hence became the more absolute the control of that which most of all designs industry and its accompanying slavery in one form or another, namely, the private money creative power.[354]

In other words, the clues have been there all along, it is just that no one has noticed them, for the great war-making empires of Mesopotamia were involved with private arms manufacture and private money issuance. This fact will loom only larger as we proceed.

But such large manufacturing and monetary concerns only lead inexorably back to the relationship between crown and temple. The renowned historian Christopher Dawson outlines the relationship with a simplicity pregnant for implications:

> Originally the state and the temple corporations were the only bodies which possessed the necessary stability and resources for establishing widespread commercial relations. Temple servants were sent on distant missions, provided with letters of credit which enabled them to obtain supplies in other cities. Moreover the temple was the bank of the community through which money could be lent at interest and advances made to the farmer on the security of his crop. Thus in the course of the 3rd millennium there grew up > in Mesopotamia a regular money economy based on precious metals as standards of exchange, which stimulated private wealth and enterprise and led to real capitalist development. The temple and the palace remained the centres of the economic life of the community but by their side and under their shelter there developed a many sided activity which found expression in the guilds of the free craftsmen and the merchants, and the private enterprise of the individual capitalist.[355]

To put it simply, the fact of the existence of this class is not disputed by reputable historians. And the international extent of this trade should not be overlooked, for trade was known to extend from the city of Ur "over the whole known world which certainly reached as far afield as Europe, being carried on by means of letters of credit, bills of exchange and 'promises to pay' (cheques), made out in terms of staple necessities; of life expressed in terms of silver at valuation of barley (probably at a given season of the year)."[356] This state of affairs clearly implies an international extent to some banking and merchant class, in alliance with the temples of various states. But how would such a class arise and usurp the crown prerogative of money minting, value regulation, and issuance?

2. Ancient Babylon and Egypt

The answer to this question requires a closer scrutiny of the two major military and financial powers of that age: Egypt and Babylon. As noted so far, Babylonian money initially consisted of circulating clay-tablet letters of credit drawn on the surpluses of the state warehouses, and therefore its issuance as money was strictly controlled by the crown. But as also noted immediately above, at some juncture — as early as the third or fourth century B.C., in fact[357] — these existed alongside these clay tablets circulating silver of private issuance, whose value was also fixed in terms of barley or other staples in the state warehouses. In fact, so widespread was the use of the Babylonian system, which also included the use of actual checks, that one finds Babylonians at work in the temples and minting shops of some Greek cities after the Assyrian assault on Babylonia itself.[358] In other words, assaults on Babylon only served to disperse its merchant banking class in other countries, and with that dispersal, the expansion of Babylonian business and banking practices.

a. Early Egypt's Independence from the Babylonian Money Power

It is in this context, then, that the Egyptian money power should be examined, for as has already been noted, Egypt controlled the largest and most productive gold mines — the Bisharee mines — in the ancient world. Here too one notes a parallel development and all its implications:

> According to Breasted, gold and copper rings of a fixed weight circulated in large scale business in the time of the "Old Kingdom," and (significantly enough to the student of "banking," or private money creation and regulation, as it might better be known) "stone weights were already marked with their equivalence in such rings." The circulation as money of these "promises to pay" recorded on stone, pointedly suggests the likelihood of the activities of a secret fraternity whose hereditary trade was private money creation.[359]

Indeed, the parallel with Babylon is almost identical, since the latter used clay tablets as units of exchange, while Egypt used stone weights marked with their equivalent value in precious bullion. But there is likewise a significant difference as well, for in Babylon's case those clay tablets circulated as money prior to the issuance of bullion-based monies, and the value of such monies was stated in terms of stores in the state warehouse. But with Egypt, one finds a later stage of development, for the value of the stones is expressed, not in terms of the surplus stores in a warehouse, but in terms of bullion itself. In short, the concept of money has been degraded, and with it, there is almost no visible connection to the state and crown prerogative of money regulation and issuance, not to mention anything of practical value as the result of industry or creativity, i.e., goods.

And this degradation of money in Egypt, i.e., the fact that its promises to pay are expressed in valuation of bullion, rather than bullion being expressed in valuation of real goods, plus the fact of the existence of Egypt's Bisharee mines with their international contingent of mercenary guards, points to a very significant and — because of its subtlety — often overlooked point:

> As a result, although the Egyptian empire in the earliest years might very well be described as a common market existing independent of the Babylonian money power, and deriving its strength from the will to be of a dedicated and instructed Ruler, the sequence of events shows that through those concessions it obtained for its best services in war, it was not long before international money power re-penetrated the substructure of Egyptian life and established its usual behind-the-scenes influence, if not control, as in the earlier time that denoted the collapse of the "Old Kingdom." It may safely be considered to have reassumed the position of hidden power it had held a thousand years before during the closing years of the 6th dynasty, a period in which the stone weights indicating equivalence in metal money circulated in much the same way as clay facsimiles of contemporary coinages circulated…[360]

To put it differently, Egypt, once under the influence of that international bullion brokers’ power, had managed to throw off that influence, only to have it restored nearly a millennium later.

a. Economic and Military Autarchy and Modern Analogues: Sparta and the Greek Tyrants

But how, exactly, does one know that such an international money power existed in ancient times? Astle's answer is as surprising as it is both contemporary and simple: one had only to look at certain ancient wars in conjunction with a look at the economic activity and policies of various states to discern a hidden hand at work. And the best example of this war between a money power and a state determined to maintain its independence from it, its autarchy, are the Peloponnesian Wars between Athens and its allies, and Sparta. It is worth citing Astle and his sources at length:

> Of the tyrants of Greece and Asia Minor in ancient times, the learned Professor Heichelheim wrote:
> "These tyrants were for the most part members of the nobility themselves who had made the grade using the new political and economic possibilities of their time to overthrow their own equals and to subdue their whole state temporarily. The tyrants were often compelled to introduce the coin economy pattern into the area over which they ruled, or at least to promote its development officially, in order to gain the upper hand over their enemies…

(One wonders: Compelled by whom?)

> …to stabilize the position of the peasantry on the land, and to expand and rebuild state economy, a central distribution of money and goods in kind partly directed towards mercenaries, bodyguards and various political friends and partly indirectly to the masses of poor people in the form of wages paid for extensive building operations and improvements, is characteristic of tyrant economy…[361]

Astle comments as follows:

> The above remarks of Professor Heichelheim indicate there were "new political and economic possibilities: in that period 650-500 B.C. when the tyrannies most of all flourished… The question then becomes, what were these "new political and economic possibilities"?... The answer is arrived at readily: they derived from the activities of the agents of the international silver bullion brokers who, from ports such as Argos, Athens, and Aegina where King Pheidon struck the first Greek silver coinage ca. 680 B.C., promoted the luxury traders who sold their wares from wigs to harlots as against the new silver coinage or promise thereof. The opportunities clearly were for those who assisted in the monetization of the city, and all its activities and possessions, and its population….[362]

The result of this "monetization" of the city-state — and of the reduction of each member of its population to the status of a mere "human resource" (to use the modern term) — was, according to Professor Heichelheim, entirely predictable, and eerily reminiscent of the "free trade" agreements of the late 1980s and 1990s and of their disastrous effects on the industrialized societies that adopted them (and remember, Heichelheim was writing in the 1940s, long before such agreements were in the offing, and was speaking of ancient times!):

> The aristocracies refused equality to the landless traders and manufacturers, the peasants were oppressed by the rich and encouraged to get into debt and then were reduced to slavery and exile; slaves began to compete with free labour. Ambitious individuals capitalized this discontent to overthrow the constituted government and establish themselves as tyrants in all the Greek cities with the notable exception of Sparta.[363]

So what is so significant about Sparta that the rest of the Greek city-states went to war with her?

Astle puts it "country simple":

> …(T)he state that rejected international money power, as did Sparta and Rome in ancient times, and Russia in modern times, had > to be prepared to establish total military self-sufficiency.[364]

One might add Nazi Germany to Astle’s list, for like Russia and ancient Sparta, the regime of the Third Reich had determined not only to restore the issuance of money to the State, but had embarked on a program of military and energy autarchy as well.[365]

So what, exactly, had Sparta done that so infuriated the rest of the Greek city-states? The answer is complex, and requires a brief detour. Both Plato[366] and Aristotle[367] were clear that money had value only insofar as it was defined by the law of the state; in other words, they both obliquely recognized that the power of issuing and regulating the value of money was a state, not a private, prerogative, and this in spite of the fact that by their time, the private issuance of money was well-established practice.[368] Thus, when one turns to the city-states of the tyrants, and to their silver-coin issuances, one discerns a clear, though carefully disguised, hidden hand:

> The evidence that the earliest coinages in Greece had essentially a local circulation in no way alters the picture previously outlined of silver money as being part of an international conspiracy. All Greek states apart from Athens and Samos, Siphnos and Corcyra, and possible one or two others, had to obtain silver bullion for their coinage from abroad, which necessarily obliged them to deal with those traders who specialized in dealing in bullion. Such trade in bullion had to be in the hands of a small and highly secretive group, as much on account of the sources of supply being relatively few and scattered as it were out to the ends of the earth, as on account of the fact that it would be only such a group that could also control those supplies of slave labour and their purchase from triumphant peoples whose warlike activities, as likely as not, they had instigated themselves; slave labour so necessary to the success of their mining operations.[369]

Once the course had been determined in various Greek city-states to issue bullion-based money, which bullion they had in scarce supply, those city-states came increasingly under the influence and sway of the bullion brokers themselves. All except one, which refused to issue bullion-based coinage.

Sparta.

Hence one has now a basis of understanding for Sparta's well-known harshness and the military discipline it imposed on her whole population, for if she were to maintain her independence of the money power infecting the other Greek city-states, her military had to be the best. Thus, there is a hidden, and much more real, purpose to the infamous Peloponnesian War — a war that neither Athens nor Sparta "had won and neither one had lost." The war left both powerful Greek city-states "exhausted, and over their prostrate bodies the servants of this same sardonic Money power drew the chains of their slavery."[370] That real underlying purpose of the Peloponnesian War "was to establish private common money market across the Greek world totally controlled by the trapezitae or bankers in modern terminology."[371] Consequently, "judging by Sparta…and later by Rome itself, it seems that in ancient times there was some considerable understanding of the power inherent in precious metal money to destroy, by lending itself to manipulation, the status quo of any race or state."[372]

b. Babylon, Persia, and Money Creation

Yet another, and even more persuasive, example of the actions and hidden directions of a money power on the international scene is afforded by the case of Babylon and Persia. It is worth citing Astle at length once again:

> It is not until the Assyrian, Neo-Babylonian, and Persian eras that clear evidence can be traced of the total degeneration of kingly power and of kings and so-called emperors as quite often being little more than gloriously be-medalled front men for private money creative power striving to create world-wide hegemony… They still continued to be needed principally as a point towards which the eyes of the people might be diverted in order that the people might not realize that all was not well in that direction towards which their loyalties naturally leaned, nor glimpse the destructive forces that were gnawing at the roots of the Tree of Life itself. Even as far back as 2500 B.C. Sargon of Akkad proceeded into Anatolia to chastise the city of Ganes on account of the commercial community of Mesopotamia; probably to enforce the payment of interest on loans, or repayment of principal… One of the reasons of the success of Cyrus, though but a petty Persian prince formerly to 550 B.C. when he deposed his sovereign, Astyages the Mede, is clear from the circumstances of his victory over Croesus of Lydia in 546 B.C.

Croesus had offended the international money powers by seizure of their treasure held by their agent Sadyattes, and by the total assumption of monetary issue by the state. Example had to be made of him to deter other princes from similar action, and the eager and ambitious Cyrus was obviously the one chosen for this purpose. According to the article on Babylonia in the Encyclopedia Britannica, 9th edition, by Professor Sayce, Croesus had rashly joined battle with Cyrus without waiting for the arrival of his Babylonian allies under Nabu-Nahua the father of Belshazzar of the Book of Daniel. It is more than likely however, that a truer reading of these events would be that international money power, patron of the rise of Cyrus both through organization of his supplies of mercenary soldiers, and of the best of weapons, had been the principal influence in these events as in other enterprises of Cyrus, such as the siege of Babylon 14 years later. Thanks to his influence, while the progress of Nabu-Nahua towards junction with the forces of Croesus would have been sabotaged, Croesus himself would have been misinformed of the intentions and strength of both Cyrus and Nabu-Nahua.

Cyrus won the day, and Croesus was totally humbled. Having thus proven his “suitability,” and his readiness to promote the policies of his financial backers, the relatively easy conquest of Babylon was arranged for Cyrus some fourteen years later.[373]

Who arranged for the easy conquest of Babylon? More importantly, who financed the vast Persian war machine?

The answer, according to Astle, is a biblical one. “It is interesting to note,” he observes,

> That shortly after the entry of the Persian forces into the city, the “Children of Israel” were permitted to return to that which they considered their homeland, and every assistance was given them towards renewal of their national life and the rebuilding of their temple, which, of course, was its heart…. The special concessions made by Cyrus to the Hebrew almost on entry into the city of Babylon, would certainly suggest that he had received their substantial assistance, perhaps through financing towards the purchase of the finest of military accoutrements such as would be obtainable only through the good graces of the Babylonian commercial and banking houses, or through that information with which the Hebrew may have kept him constantly supplied such as the state of military preparedness within the city, etc.
> It may reasonably be assumed that the Babylonian money power was completely international in outlook, whatever its outward profession, and totally unsympathetic towards the ancient faith of the Ziggurat and the worship of Marduk, and towards the intended effects of the restoration of the Ziggurat at Ur, at that time, by Nebuchadnezzar. If in earlier Assyrian times such money power certainly was not the Hebrew, though possibly linked thereto through members of the latter Israelitish Confederacy… the fact of the existence of powerful Hebrew influence in international finance in Neo-Babylonian times seems a reasonable supposition.
> The Hebrew…may have risen to especially privileged position in the Babylonian money industry, if that is what it can be called, and may have come to learn at that time those secret practices of the money changers’ craft, which he was certainly forbidden in his native land, according to the Laws (of) Moses.[374]

Indeed, as Astle points out, the Hebrews returning to Palestine were compelled, under Ezra's edict, to divorce their foreign wives. While certainly explainable as a religious ordinance designed to restore doctrinal and racial purity, Astle notes that the practice of intermarriage is itself the hallmark of the international banking class to this day, and thus, Ezra's ordinance may itself be an indicator that the Hebrews had indeed penetrated the international money power during the Babylonian captivity.[375] There is yet another indicator of this "babylonization" of Hebrew religion and practice, and that is the existence of the Talmud and the rabbinate itself, and the adopted symbol of the Hebrews and Jewish people to this day, the so-called Mogen David or Star of David: ☆. This symbol is itself of Babylonian, not Hebrew, origin, and as we shall see in the next chapter, it is an apt symbol of a fraternity that is "keeping secrets."

C. HOW THE CONSPIRACY WORKED

It is perhaps in the actual history of the development of the private issuance of bullion-based monies in ancient times and in various civilizations that one most clearly discerns the evident hand of a hidden international class of bullion-brokers, war merchants, slave traders, and mining operators, for almost invariably, the pattern is the same.

1. The First Stage: Penetrate and Ally with the Temple

As noted repeatedly throughout the previous pages, from Greece to Rome to Egypt and the Mesopotamian civilizations of Sumer, Babylon, and Assyria, there is a clear association of banking activities, and of minting itself, with the temple. The reason for this association, at least as far as banking and finance go, are easy to rationalize:

> These persons had conducted their business in the shade of the temple courtyards from ancient days as, and if they could, in order that the power or mystery as locally was held in awe, might give sanctity to their activities which so often were exercised against the well being of the people who sheltered them….
> These agents would have lurked as only faintly discernible shadows behind the temple façade, although they instigated much of what came to pass in those days, if themselves so little seen. Of first concern to them would have been the reputation of their masters, the priesthood, for piety, probity, and godliness, in so far as appearance went. For by maintaining the position of the priesthood, they maintained themselves and their secret power; yet for whatever they brought about, especially if of evil, it may safely be assumed, a nevertheless inviolate priesthood would be held responsible.

With the sanctity of the temple as a shelter and cloak of their activities, this bullion brokers’ class could then engage in the next stage of their activity:

2. The Second Stage: Issue False Receipts

That second stage is to issue counterfeit or false receipts against the credit or surpluses of the state warehouse, and thereby to increase the money supply itself: the principal device at this stage “may be assumed to be the secret and private expansion of the total money supply effected primarily by the issuance into circulation of false receipts for…valuables supposedly being held on deposit in thief-proof vaults, or otherwise, for safe custody.”[376] Such issuance would be relatively easy to come by, for by penetration of and close association with the temples of various states, they would have had access to the seals and other devices used to authenticate letters of credit by the temple priesthoods.

3. The Third Stage: Substitute Bullion for Letters of Credit as a Measure Against False Receipts

This brings us inevitably to the third stage, for once a sufficient number of such false receipts were in circulation, it would become apparent both to the crown and to members of the temple itself that there were simply too many false receipts in circulation, and that a monetary reform was necessary. At this juncture, in step the bullion brokers with the solution: holding a virtual monopoly on mining, they propose the substitution of bullion-based coinage, whose value is initially defined by a certain amount of actual goods — barley, as we saw in the case of Mesopotamia — for the actual state-issued letters of credit. Once any crown and temple alliance within any given state accepts this arrangement, it will become increasingly hostage to the need for bullion and for the merchants, slave traders, and mining-mercenaries that can supply it, and that have the technology to mine and melt and mint it.[377]

4. The Fourth Stage: Then Create a Facsimile of Money

Having artificially stimulated and increased the value of bullion, this class then creates the final step: it issues new letters of credit against the supply of bullion rather than against the warehouse surplus, and defines those letters of credit as valuation in terms of weight of some precious bullion. Thus, we arrive back at the state of issuing false receipts, only in this instance, these receipts are neither false nor counterfeit, they are simply privately created notes or promises to pay a certain amount of bullion (which they also control). Thus, once again the money supply is not only expanded, but the use of such instruments actually served to allow the bullion brokers to circulate more of such notes than they had actual bullion to redeem. The key, once again, was the sanctifying probity that the temple association gave them. With this step, their power and influence over the various states which they penetrated was almost complete, for it gave these ancient bankers, like their modern counterparts, the ability to expand or contract a state’s money supply, and to control their economies to create boom or bust. The final step, in other words, was to create a clay or stone (or in modern times, paper or plastic) facsimile of the facsimile of state-issued money (the bullion-based monies, also of their own creation)!

D. THE PARALLEL TO THE AFTERMATHS OF THE COSMIC WAR, AND WORLD WAR II: THE GLOBALIST AGENDA AND MONEY, MONARCHIES, MONOTHEISM, AND MILITARIES

But there is a final piece to this ancient story and plot, and it is one of the most breathtaking of them all. The effect of the alliance of this bullion brokers' class with the temple throughout the ancient world would have brought to their attention the fact that the pantheons of various civilizations, and even the stories and acts associated with various gods, were all remarkably similar. As a result of this realization, the bullion brokers would also come

> To realize that they could actually create that which functioned as money with but the record incised by the stylus on the clay tablet promising metal or money. Obviously, as a result of this discovery which depended on the confidence they were able to create in the minds of the peoples of their integrity, provided they banded themselves together with an absolute secrecy that excluded all other than their proven brethren, they could replace the god of the city himself as the giver of all. If so be they could institute a conception of a one god, their god, a special god of the world, a god above all gods, then not merely the city, be it Ur or Kish or Lagash or Uruk, but the world itself could be theirs, and all that in it was.[378]

In other words, behind the creation of the vast empires of Persia, and later the Macedonian-Greek empire of Alexander the Great, there lies the activity of a powerful financial interest, striving to create an ancient "New World Order" with a central state and unified religio-cultural world.[379] And the mechanism by which to foster this religious worldview would be to gradually point out, and inculcate the idea in popular imagination, that all local religions were but the same thing, various "names" for the "same gods."[380] Thus, the whole weight of their combine and cabal would have been thrown behind the promotion of a monarchial front, representative of the new empire and the new monotheism, and backed by the latest in military hardware.

But there is another possibility, one suggested by the scenario of a cosmic war outlined in the first chapter,[381] and that is, if the survivors of a once scientifically sophisticated civilization were ever to reach the pinnacle of scientific power and achievement that would have made an interplanetary war possible, if, that is, they were ever to reconstruct the destructive technologies of their hegemony and extend themselves again into space, then they would have quite literally to draw on the full resources of the entire world, and to create the wars and conflicts that drove technological achievement forward at a faster-than-normal pace of development. In this case, they would develop not only secret associations for this purpose, but money, and a close association with the temples, would be the easiest and least technologically sophisticated method to do it. And the political goal would be the same: ever-larger empires, eventually to encompass the entire globe itself.

This association of money creation with the temples, and with the goal to create a unified world order, for the purpose of reconstructing a lost technology of hegemony, is where the story gets really interesting. As they say, the plot is about to thicken….

So once again, what possible connection could there be between all these things? Why do we find a J.P. Morgan suppressing Tesla? Why in turn do we find a Tesla preoccupied with “gripping the earth” to make his “wireless transmission of power” work? Why do we find a startling ancient connection between banking and physics (in the form of astrology, astronomy, and even — as Hoagland has hinted — sacred geometry)? Why do we find an RCA engineer named Nelson drawing up planetary charts that look for all the world like astrological charts? Why do we encounter a government economist like Edward Dewey devoting a lifetime of work to the study of cycles of all sorts? And why do we find him making conscious and deliberate reference between economic activity and physics? And why do we find, not just in ancient times, but in modern ones as well, the presence of bankers on the peripheries of such investigations?

A. ECONOPHYSICS

1. Physicists Invade Finance: The Modern Model as a Key to the Paleoancient Past

The answer lies in part in modern times, and in order to begin to peel back the onion skin layers of this vast, intricate, and ancient relationship, one must look at the rise of a new discipline — “econophysics” — and at what happened in modern times as physicists entered the world of high finance, bringing their techniques and tools of applied mathematics and analysis with them.

The term “econophysics” was actually coined in the mid-1990s by H. Eugene Stanley[383] to reflect two things: first, it was designed to reflect the vast influx of degreed physicists into the financial sector itself, as that sector often provided a higher salary base and opportunities to employ the tools of applied mathematical analysis than was possible in actual standard academic or experimental careers, and secondly, it was reflective of the fascination that physicists had acquired for the application of the techniques of statistical analysis they had developed in quantum mechanics to the problems of economic and financial analysis itself.

As such, econophysics “is an interdisciplinary research field, applying theories and methods originally developed by physicists in order to solve problems in economics, usually those including uncertainty or stochastic processes and nonlinear dynamics.”[384] What spurred this interest was in part, according to the article in Wikipedia, the “availability of huge amounts of financial data, starting in the 1980s.”[385] Of course, as has been noted, this is not exactly true, since there was a vast amount of data available from the Department of Commerce and from other sources and countries dating much further back, a database utilized by Edward and the Foundation for the Study of Cycles, and a database known to its members, some of whom included economists from major international banks.

One thing in particular that attracted physicists to this study of the application of their techniques to financial and economic systems was precisely that in economics, more often than not, there prevailed a general condition of non-equilibrium,[386] that is, one was never dealing with systems where there was a uniform distribution of resources, wealth, and so on. As physicists and chemists had only recently — in the 1960s — begun to study non-equilibrium physical systems and their remarkable ability to self-organize, the motivation for their study of economics becomes clear: physicists thought that by studying the most notoriously non-equilibrium systems known to mankind — economic systems — their models of the ability of such systems in the physical world could be applied with some success to model self-organization in economic systems, and to make valuable predictions on that basis. As will be seen in a few moments, this is an important clue to the possible deeper physics involved in economic systems.

To put it succinctly, quantum mechanics had invaded economics, and the reason why is relatively easy to perceive, because since economic activity was "the result of the interaction among many heterogeneous agents, there is an analogy with statistical mechanics, where many particles interact."[387] And the key tool in this new interdisciplinary endeavor was quantum physics' use of the "path integral formulation of statistical mechanics."[388]

But what exactly does this mean?

The first implication is that one may use the influx of physicists into economic study in modern times as an analogy of what happened in ancient times, and assume that something like this happened as well in ancient times, as those with the "high knowledge" of a deeper physics penetrated the world of high finance, that is to say, the temple, seeking a better standard of living and personal wealth, like their modern descendants. And once inside those hallowed pavilions and chambers, they allied with the bankers of their day, the "bullion brokers." It was a necessary détente in the aftermath of that great Cosmic War, for if the lost science and technology were ever to be reconstructed, it would require lots of money, and lots of scientific expertise, and both resided in ancient times in the temple.

The second implication requires a closer look at quantum mechanics itself.

2. Quantum Mechanics, Ancient Astrology, and the Statistical Approach

One may gain an appreciation of the statistical nature of quantum mechanics by considering its foundational principle, the Heisenberg Uncertainty Principle, itself. Briefly stated, the Uncertainty Principle holds that if one measures the velocity of an electron, one cannot measure its position, and conversely, if one measures its position, it is impossible to measure its velocity. Thus, quantum mechanics, when considering the behavior of several particles all at once, had to rely upon observation and the compilation of statistical probabilities in order to model that behavior.

The same holds true, if one takes the ancient texts at face value, for astrology as well, for there is an exact modern analogy with quantum mechanics and its countless and untold observations made diligently over time, and with its statistical approach to that vast number of interactions, for this is precisely what one encounters in ancient times as well. In fact, as previously noted, the Babylonian “omen tablets” indicate that astronomical observations of planetary alignments and corresponding earthly activities and effects — a combination we now call astrology — were made over hundreds of thousands of years ago. This is therefore yet another sign that there is some other hidden influence at work in the temples besides that of the bullion brokers, and that influence is that of the ancient astrologers-astronomers themselves, compiling their lists of observations. From the previous chapters it is evident that the ancient international “bullion brokers” were in league with the various temple priesthoods-astrologers.

3. Dr. Li’s Gaussian Copula and a Physics Analogue: The Multibody Problem

Quantum mechanics’ statistical approach, and that implied by the millennia of ancient astronomical and astrological observation, is directly connected to Dr. David Li’s Gaussian copula formula via a rather interesting route: the multibody problem. The problem is an exact analogue to the difficulty of modeling the behavior of mass aggregates of particles. The only way to do so was through careful and countless observations and a statistical model of probabilities of their behavior. But the problem becomes more acute as the size of bodies being modeled grows.

Imagine one is trying to model not the aggregate behavior of several particles, but of several planets and stars. It is relatively easy to model the force of gravitational attraction between two moving masses or planets, and to predict their behavior. But as one adds more and more moving masses to the system to be modeled, the ability of mathematics to handle and accurately predict the behavior of a total dynamic system or any of the individual components within it progressively breaks down, and margins of error increase. Dr. Li, of course, solved his “multibody problem” of correlations of economic activity by, predictably enough, a statistical approach, which introduced the problem of random probabilities into economic activity.

But what if the randomness of quantum mechanics was itself the result of a deeper physics? And, if that be so, and since “econophysics” was but the importation into economics of physical models, would that deeper physics also be a deeper physics of economic activity?

4. The Deeper Physics:

a. David Bohm's Hidden Variable Quantum Mechanics and The Implicate Order

The deeper physics implied by this question may be readily perceived by a review of one of its most famous expositors, the well-known plasma and quantum physicist David Bohm. Bohm is best known, in fact, for his "hidden variable" version of quantum mechanical theory, in which the "randomness" of quantum mechanics observed and measured by physicists (Bohm's "explicate order") is understood to point to a deeper and more ordered hyper-dimensional reality (Bohm's "implicate order"). Bohm outlined these views in a popularized treatment in a book entitled Wholeness and the Implicate Order, and it is this book that will be the basis of our review of his ideas.

For Bohm, the whole development of quantum mechanics pointed to the real existence of this hyper-dimensional "implicate order":

> One discovers…both from consideration of the meaning of the mathematical equations and from the results of the actual experiments, that the various particles have to be taken literally as projections of a higher-dimensional reality which cannot be accounted for in terms of any force of interaction between them[389]

In other words, Bohm is saying almost exactly the same thing as was Richard C. Hoagland at the beginning of this chapter: particles, as rotating masses, and whose behavior when measured as a statistical aggregate, are portals that "gate" a hyper-dimensional reality into our own world. While Hoagland, however, was concerned with the hyper-dimensional implications of the physics of very large masses, i.e., stars, Bohm is concerned with the hyper-dimensional implications of the physics of the very small. This is an indicator that the physics involved is scale-invariant, that is, applicable over the whole range of scales of objects with which physics deals.

Bohm’s apt analogy of the interaction of this hyper-dimensional world with our own is that of a projection. “Let us begin,” he says, “with a rectangular tank full of water, with transparent walls.”[390] He then reproduces a diagram of a fish tank, with two television cameras, one pointed at one side of the tank, and the other at the side perpendicular to each. Each camera, “A” and “B” respectively, is attached to one television monitor. As the fish swims around, the images from the two cameras are sent to the monitors. Bohm then comments as follows:

> What we will see there is a certain relationship between the images appearing on the two screens. For example, on screen A we may see an image of a fish, and on screen B we will see another such image. At any given moment each image will generally look different from the other. Nevertheless the differences will be related, in the sense that when one image is seen to execute certain movements, the other will be seen to execute corresponding movements. Moreover, content that is mainly on one screen will pass into the other, and vice versa (e.g., when a fish initially facing camera A turns through a right angle, the image that was on A is now to be found on B). Thus at all times the image content on the other screen will correlate with and reflect that of the other.[391]

In other words, our three-dimensional world acts as a sort of “prism” to break up a singular hyper-dimensional object into a fragmented thing, perceived from different angles but with correlated movements.

Bohm summarizes this view of our three-dimensional reality as a projection from a high-dimensional reality, and its effect on perceptions of quantum mechanics and its underlying implicate order, with words eerily evocative of Hoagland’s comments about stars at the beginning of this chapter:

> …(W)e may regard each of the “particles” constituting a system as a projection of a “higher-dimensional” reality, rather than as a separate particle, existing together with all the others in a common three-dimensional space. For example, in the experiment of Einstein, Podolsky and Rosen, which we have mentioned earlier, > each of two atoms that initially combine to form a single molecule are to be regarded as three-dimensional projections of a six-dimensional reality.[392]

However, it is when Bohm turns to a consideration of the implications of this view that the full scope of the possibilities of this deeper physics springs into full view, and with them, the reason for the association of banksters with temples in ancient times — not to mention modern times! — becomes a little clearer.

To make these implications manifest, Bohm begins by noting that

> …(W)hen the quantum theory is applied to fields… it is found that the possible states of energy of this field are discrete (or quantized). Such a state of the field is, in some respects, a wavelike excitation spreading out over a broad region of space. Nevertheless, it also has somehow a discrete quantum of energy (and momentum) proportional to its frequency, so that, in other respects it is like a particle (e.g. a photon). However, if one considers the electromagnetic field in empty space, for example, one finds from the quantum theory that each such “wave-particle” mode of excitation of the field has what is called a “zero-point” energy, below which it cannot go, even when its energy falls to the minimum that is possible. If one were to add up the energies of all the “wave-particle” modes of excitation in any region of space, the result would be infinite, because an infinite number of wavelengths is present.[393]

Before we can proceed, it is necessary to pause and consider how Bohm has characterized the zero-point energy. For Bohm, as the passage just quoted makes clear, this energy is a result of the quantized nature of space itself, and of the fact that this quantization is the result of wavelike structures — of areas of compression and rarefaction — within it.

Why this is so requires only a moment’s reflection. When a physicist suggests that space itself is quantized, what he means is simply that it is not an infinitely divisible continuum, capable of being divided into ever smaller units or cells ad infinitum. The reason is, according to Bohm, that if space itself is the result of wavelike structures of compression and rarefaction, then such wavelike structures will inevitably induce cells within it. What appears to be an infinitely divisible continuum, therefore, is really so only because of the infinite number of wavelengths present at any given point of vacuum space.

This conception leads Bohm to posit the next step toward the quantization of space itself:

> …(T)here is good reason to suppose that one need not keep on adding the energies corresponding to shorter and shorter wavelengths. There may be a certain shortest possible wavelength, so that the total number of modes of excitation, and therefore the energy, would be finite.394

We will refer to this "shortest possible wavelength" as the "Bohm wavelength."

This "Bohm wavelength" — the idea that wavelike phenomena are themselves quantized — has profound and huge implications for the type of "deeper physics" being explored here. For one thing, this unknown wavelength sounds very much like the "lost word" of Masonic tradition, or the "lost chord" of the esoteric doctrine of the harmony of the spheres, the lost chord being the frequency which somehow binds all of physical creation together, since the latter is but a harmonic or overtone series of it.

This conception turns out to have huge implications for the possible unification of the physics of the very large with the physics of the very small:

> Indeed, if one applies the rules of quantum theory to the currently accepted general theory of relativity, one finds that the gravitational field is also constituted of such "wave-particle" modes, each having a minimum "zero-point" energy. As a result the gravitational field, and therefore the definition of what is to be meant by distance, cease to be completely defined. As we keep on adding excitations corresponding to shorter and shorter > wavelengths to the gravitational field, we come to a certain length at which the measurement of space and time becomes totally undefinable [sic]. Beyond this, the whole notion of space and time as we know it would face out, into something that is at present unspecifiable. So it would be reasonable to suppose, at least provisionally, that this is the shortest wavelength that should be considered as contributing to the "zero-point" energy of space.[395]

In short, find that wavelength and one will find the ability to engineer space-time and all that is in it. One would be able to tap into a virtually inexhaustible source of energy and utilize it for whatever purpose one desired. Additionally, Bohm's remarks also suggest that finding this frequency would also be a step on the road to the manipulation of gravity itself.

Bohm, moreover, clearly sees this implication of engineerability, for he sees the clear implication of his view for the very "construction and constitution" of matter itself. Indeed, he even goes so far as to give an approximation of the very frequency that constitutes the "Bohm wavelength"!

> When this length is estimated it turns out to be about 10^{-33} cm. This is much shorter than anything thus far probed in physical experiments (which have got down to about 10^{-17} cm or so). If one computes the amount of energy that would be in one cubic centimetre of space, with this shortest possible wavelength, it turns out to be very far beyond the total energy of all the matter in the known universe.
> What is implied by this proposal is that what we call empty space contains an immense background of energy, and that matter as we know it is a small, "quantized" wavelike excitation on top of this background, rather like a tiny ripple on a vast sea.[396]

Before pondering the implications of all this further, it is worth citing Bohm on the awesome power implied in such a view:

> It is being suggested here, then, that what we perceive through the senses as empty space is actually the plenum, which is the ground for the existence of everything, including ourselves. The things that appear to our senses are derivative forms and their true meaning can be seen only when we consider the plenum, in which they are generated and sustained, and into which they must ultimately vanish.
> In our approach (the) "big bang" is to be regarded as actually just a "little ripple." An interesting image is obtained by considering that in the middle of the actual ocean (i.e., on the surface of the Earth) myriads of small waves occasionally come together fortuitously with such phase relationships that they end up in a certain small region of space, suddenly to produce a very high wave which just appears as if from nowhere and out of nothing. Perhaps something like this could happen in the immense ocean of cosmic energy, creating a sudden wave pulse, from which our "universe" would be born.[397]

Observe quite carefully what Bohm has just stated, for it is crucial to all that follows: matter itself, in all its variegated forms, is the result of an interferometry — of the "mixing" — of several waves of various wavelengths, all of them in turn harmonics or overtones of the "Bohm wavelength." It is the very technology of the creation ex nihilo, of the ability of the physical medium to create information and systems by wave-mixing. It is the technology of creation from nothing: alchemy. And there is one final consequence of Bohm's views, and that is that in order to give relative system stability to such waves, or rather to the systems that such waves generate, the easiest way to do so is via rotation.

A consequence inevitably follows from this view, and that is that rotating material systems — whether stars or particles — are thus natural resonators of such waves, and hence to understand the pattern of interference of such waves, one had therefore to monitor the geometrical positions of significant objects in local space-time. In short, Bohm, with his view that matter is a “portal” and a glimpse into this higher-dimensional reality and its energies, has provided a rationale for two things: the ancient preoccupation with astrology, and the ancient preoccupation with alchemy, for both are manifestations of one and the same physics. Matter, to put it succinctly, is but a standing wave of interferometry of other waves; matter itself is a grid or template of interference of such waves. This forms the link to alchemy, for as such, matter emerges as information within the field of the physical medium. To put it succinctly, matter is mutable, or in the language of alchemy, transmutable, since the physical medium itself, the Philosophers’ Stone par excellence, transmutes itself into the diversity of the material creation. This idea of matter as a template of the interferometry of such waves will play a key role when we turn to examine the placement of sacred temples along a certain earth grid in the next chapter, and an even more crucial role as a connecting concept typing together all the disparate data points in this book upon its conclusion.

b. The Foundation for the Study of Cycles Notices a Similar Thing

Oddly enough, the Foundation for the Study of Cycles noticed a very similar thing. We have already encountered the fact that the Foundation’s founder, Edward Dewey, compared the many cycles in its database to wave forms, and noticed the fact that various waves of cycles could be “averaged” together, like sound waves.

Ray Tomes, a member of the Foundation, wrote an interesting paper presented at the Foundation’s February 1990 conference. The paper’s title is pregnant with implications: “Towards a Unified Theory of Cycles.” In it, Tomes pursues Dewey’s and Dakin’s sound wave analogy to a breathtaking conclusion:

> Eventually I realised that the pattern of frequencies present in … corn prices was the same as the arrangement of frequencies of the white notes on a piano… This was peculiar, and going back to my early common economic cycles study I realised that the ratios 4:5:6:8 were exactly those of a major chord in music! Why are economic series playing major chords and scales in very slow motion?

> Research showed that such patterns had been observed and reported before by several contributors to Cycles magazine.[398] One of these was D.S. Castle (1956) who found that stock market cycles fit the musical scale. The pattern found ranged over three octaves, and all seven white notes plus one black note were present in at least one octave.[399]

Tomes' suggestion, in other words, is simply one and the same as that of David Bohm, namely, that one might find "the ultimate wavelength" or frequency of all types of cycles of which all others are but harmonics or derivations from it.

c. The Well-Tempered Clavier: The First Physical Unification

The suggestion is not as far removed from physical reality as it might at first seem, for the modern Western musical scale with its 12 equidistant "notes" are in fact the example of the first unification in physics. In order to see how, one may perform a simple exercise. If one sits at an acoustic piano and silently presses the note "C," and then hits the same note "C" an octave lower, one will hear the strings of the silently pressed note vibrating sympathetically with the struck note. The reason is simplicity itself. Each string on the piano vibrates not only with the entire length of the string, but simultaneously also vibrates in various fractions of that length. Thus, each note has an "overtone" or "harmonic" series of notes. Therefore, one can then press silently the next note in "C's" harmonic series, the note "G," and hit the same "C" as before. Once again, one will hear the silently pressed note "G" vibrating sympathetically with the struck "C." The next note in the harmonic series above "G" is again the note "C," then the note "E," and so on. If one is sitting at the piano keyboard performing this simple experiment, one will notice that the intervals of each harmonic overtone of the original "C" are growing shorter, first the octave (the first silently pressed "C"), then a fifth, the note "G," then again another "C" above that, which is a fourth, then the note "E," which is a third, and so on. But eventually one will arrive, in the naturally occurring harmonic series, at a note that lies somewhere in the "crack" between the notes "A" and "B flat" on the piano keyboard.

But why does the piano (or any other keyboard instrument, for that matter) not have that note? The answer is simple. If that note were present, then it would be impossible to play a piece that continually changed keys. One would only be able to play a very limited series of chords. To change keys from, say, “C” to “D,” one would literally have to stop and retune the whole keyboard. So what has happened?

What happened was that between the stylistic change in music between the Renaissance and the Baroque, musicians learned to “tweak” the harmonic series, to tamper with it, or, as they liked to say, to “temper” it, by a slight mathematical adjustment of the natural overtone series, that would in turn create 12 equidistant notes, each one a harmonic of all others, and thus music could change through as many keys as it wished in the course of a piece, without having to stop and retune the whole instrument. In this way, each harmonic series of each note on the keyboard, which originally and naturally did not overlap completely, were engineered to do so, and thus were unified.[400]

In short, and bearing this analogy in mind, what physicist David Bohm is actually suggesting, as a way forward into the deeper physics of engineering the medium itself, is that there is a frequency of which all others — from sound to electromagnetic waves even to gravitational waves — are harmonics. He is proposing, in effect, a very ancient idea, that of the music of the spheres, a well-tempered clavier of the universe itself. He is proposing a modern physics analogue to the “lost word” and “lost chord” of esoteric lore.

d. Nikolai Kozyrev’s Causal Mechanics and Precursor Engineering

If David Bohm clearly implied a direct engineerability of the physical medium along the lines of a “well-tempered” harmonic unification of physics, then Russian astrophysicist Dr. Nikolai Kozyrev went one step further by implying the ability to engineer not effects, but causes directly.

Such an ability implies that Kozyrev had a rather more unconventional view of time than does standard physics. For Kozyrev, time was not a mere duration, a passive stage on which physical events were enacted;[401] rather, time itself was an actor on the stage that, like space, had a multi-dimensional character and quality. An analogy will be useful to illustrate this point. Ordinarily physics tends to think of time in terms of the future, the present, and the past, i.e., as simple duration.[402] But human natural languages view time in a much subtler, deeper, and "qualitative" sense, with a variety of verb tenses and voices: future perfect, pluperfect, past perfect, active and passive voices, and so on. In a sense, natural languages therefore view time and the correlations between systems in a much deeper and more sophisticated manner than does physics.

It was this subtlety that Kozyrev intended to explore, and to render into the formally explicit language of mathematics. This complexity and subtlety of interrelationships Kozyrev located in the "rotation moment" of a given system, that is, the subtleties of time and of the interactions of systems could be modeled as a series of interlocking, and interfering, systems of rotation, or "dynamic torsion."[403] Time itself could impart its own intensity — Kozyrev's word for "compression," implying its opposite, rarefaction — to a system, as well as impart a spin orientation to a system.[404] Through a series of extremely subtle experiments with gyroscopes, balances, and in some cases, even telescopes, Kozyrev was able to determine that prior to the inception of any physical action, a kind of "pre-action" would be recorded by his measuring equipment, almost as if the equipment was "anticipating" the physical action itself.[405] "Cause" and "effect" were therefore themselves the result of a lower-dimensional fracture or breaking of a higher-dimensional unity and symmetry, much like Bohm's projection analogy. By noting the temporal conditions under which these "pre-actions" or "precursors" occurred, one could eventually engineer the precursors to any physical action.

Thus, bearing in mind Kozyrev's "precursor engineering," and to return to Bohm's analysis of matter itself as a set of waves in the medium that are interfered upon one another, producing what Dewey and Dakin would call an "averaged" wave, then one may imagine a horrific possibility, namely, the exact mirror image of such a wave which, interfered upon the original, would sum to zero, or exactly cancel it out, making the "something" a nothing again. The ultimate in “precursor” engineering was the power to erase an effect of a physical action altogether, by eradicating its cause.

Furthermore, Bohm’s and Kozryev’s deeper physics behind the apparently stochastic processes of quantum mechanics implies a similar deeper physics behind the apparently stochastic processes of econophysics as well. Indeed, if one can, pace Kozyrev, engineer the precursors of effects — if one can actually engineer causes — then this implies that one could indeed engineer the precursors of economic activity, since the means to do so, direct engineering of the physical medium itself, is implied in both cases.

Consequently, one now has a speculative basis upon which to advance the reasons for the close association of the banking class throughout history with the temple, that is to say, with that element or class within human society that has at least some grasp on this deeper physics: banking is in effect an alchemical operation of creating information out of nothing, in this case the information of credit and debt, for the latter is but a dim and pale technological reflection in the realm of finance of the analogous, but deeper, operations in physics. And it is similarly likely that this relationship was formed precisely so that by utilizing the latter, the former technology and deeper physics might ultimately be recovered. In short, were such a physics to be recovered, an alliance with as many temple priesthoods was altogether necessary, for each most likely preserved some fragment of it, which when appropriately assembled would be once more accessible. It provides also a rationale for their obsessive interest, since ancient times, in “world unification and domination,” for on the one hand, it is likely that vast financial resources — resources transcending the wealth of any one civilization in ancient or modern times — would be needed to reconstruct such a deeper physics, and on the other hand, a world extent is needed in order to maintain the suppression of any independent development or recovery of such a technology by potential rivals.

B. ECONOMICS, ASTROLOGY, AND ASTROPHYSICS

There are two streams of data that now converge to exhibit a probable deeper physics to economic activity: on the one hand, the vast database of wave-like forms from the Foundation for the Study of Cycles, and on the other, the implications of David Bohm's implicate order, where matter itself is the result, and hence a natural resonator, of such waves. As noted in chapter two, one of the implications of the Foundation for the Study of Cycles' database was that economic cycles, precisely because they seemed to have some sort of underlying physics basis — recall Dewey's and Dakin's sound wave analogy once again — were to that extent and in a certain sense "beyond the total rule of man's conscious will."[406] But there is another kind of database that Dewey and Dakin did not consult, but it too suggests a profoundly deep physics to economic activity.

And that database is astrology.

Astrologers have, of course, been casting "mundane horoscopes" for various nations for decades, if not centuries and millennia, and more recently, many have noticed the odd correlations of certain recurrent planetary alignments and periods of economic boom or bust. One to do so is Robert Gover in a recent, and fascinating, book called Time and Money: The Economy and the Planets. He begins by noting the fact that Saturn orbits the sun every 28-30 earth years, Uranus 84 years, Neptune 165 years, and Pluto 248 years.[407] He then notes the importance of these outer planets for astrological economic observation: since the other planets — Jupiter, Mars, the Earth, Venus, and Mercury — all move too rapidly around the Sun, they cannot be used "to mark years or decades of major economic cycles."[408] He then states his main thesis, one more or less well-known to astrologers, but not well-known outside such circles:

> Every time the USA has gone through a great depression, the outermost, slowest moving planets have formed what astrologers call a grand cross with the USA's natal Sun and Saturn. Every time Uranus has returned to early Gemini where it was when the USA > was "born" July 4, 1776, America has experienced its worst wars. Every time Uranus and Pluto have moved into conjunctions or 90-degree squares and simultaneously come conjunct, opposite of square sensitive points in the U.S. birth chart, America has experienced social changes or upheavals….

> Other wars occur when the U.S. natal Uranus is "afflicted" by transiting planets, as happened when the World Trade Center and Pentagon were attacked. Saturn and Pluto form 180-degree oppositions three times a century, the latest being in effect on September 11, 2001;. The previous Saturn-Pluto opposition coincided with the tempestuous period we now call the Sixties, the one before that with what we now call The Great Depression.[409]

Gover then explains what four of the most significant conjunctions or alignments are. We shall focus on only two of them:

> A Grand Cross aspect is created when four planets form simultaneous squares and oppositions to each other. This is a rare aspect which brings obstructions, tensions, frustrations, i.e. a grand cross to the U.S. Sun-Saturn square has formed each time the USA has fallen into a great depression.
> A Grand Trine aspect is also rare, and is formed by a triangle of three planets 120 degrees from each other, creating harmonious flows of energy, good fortune and opportunities.[410]

It is odd that the Grand Cross conjunction bears such a strange resemblance to the planetary positions charts of RCA engineer Nelson.

Grand Crosses form such a common feature to U.S. depressions that Gover actually formulates it as a kind of astrological law: "No grand cross, no great depression."[411] However, Gover notes that in this respect, astrological "prediction" is not to be misconstrued:

> If we view the planets around us in our solar system as a huge celestial clock, the first thing history teaches us is that the celestial clock is not mechanically precise like our earthly clocks. Although > we can discern from history when like economic events are due, clock-like prediction isn't possible. Certain planetary patterns create seasons when certain types of events can be expected. But the planets cannot tell us specifically how events will unfold, nor how we will respond. We know when winter is nigh but not how cold it will get. Some hurricane seasons bring great devastation, others are less severe .[412]

With this said, a glance at Gover's charts is in order.

Robert Gover's Astrological Chart for the American Great Depression of the 1780s[413]

If one takes the time to decipher the planetary symbols, then one finds "Saturn was at 15 degrees Capricorn which puts it opposite the U.S. natal Sun at 13 Cancer; meanwhile, Mars at 21 Aries is within orb or an opposition to (the U.S.A.'s) natal Saturn at 15 degrees of Libra."[414] In short, a Grand Cross was formed between the planetary positions during the 1780s great depression, and that of their positions at the time of the U.S.A.'s birth.

Similarly, a Grand Cross is formed during the Great Depression of the 1870s.

During this time "Saturn in Capricorn formed a square with Neptune in Aries to create the grand cross with (the U.S.A.'s) Sun and Saturn."416

Finally, during the Great Depression of the 1930s, yet another Grand Cross was formed:

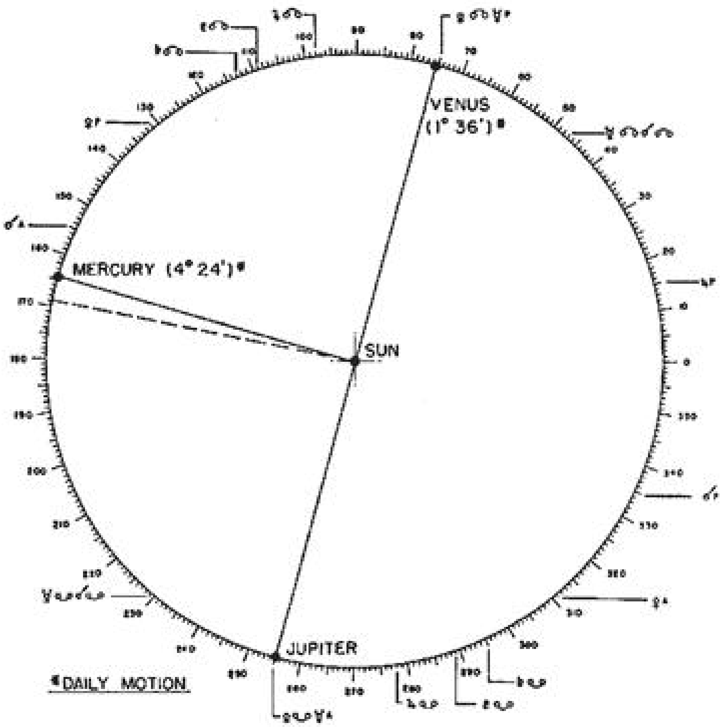
This chart chows a Grand Cross between Saturn, at 13 degrees Capricorn square with Uranus at 11 degrees Aries, and opposite (i.e., at 180 degrees) with the U.S.A.'s natal Sun and Saturn.418

That these Grand Crosses have a malign influence would seem, at least as a prima facie case, to be a given. But is there any real-world physics correlation?

The answer to this question is as easy as reproducing one of Nelson's charts from his RCA study of planetary alignments and radio signal propagation.



Nelson's Chart of Venus-Jupiter Opposition[419]

Note the similarity is once again that planets, in this case the inner planets, are in certain relationships to each other, relations of 90 degrees or some harmonic thereof, i.e., 180 or 270 degrees.[420]

Thus, if the Foundation for the Study of Cycles' database and Gover's (and other astrologers') charts are any indicator, then we can now draw even closer to an understanding of the relationship that was seen to exist between banking and the temple in ancient times, for the astrological data of economic boom and bust would have been known by them from ancient times, and it would have been crucial for the "financial powers in the know" to have such data available, in order to exacerbate or damp the overall trend of boom or bust within a cycle.

With this in mind, a glance at the evidence gathered by Ellen Hodgson Brown, whose book was mentioned in the Prologue, is in order, for a comparison of the activities of banksters relative to Gover's astrological charts is quite revealing.

C. ELLEN HODGSON BROWN

1. The Depression of the 1780s and the Banksters

Brown points out something that most modern Americans do not know, and that is, that prior to the American Revolution, most of the colonies printed their own paper money — debt-free — and actually made loans to farmers and businessmen. The result was a booming economy and almost full employment. When Benjamin Franklin went to England prior to the revolution, he was asked about the source of this prosperity "by the directors of the Bank of England," and Franklin responded that the colonies "issued paper money 'in proper proportion to the demands of trade and industry.'"421 But what was the "backing" of this money? The colonies, however, had little silver and gold with which to back their issues of paper currency. With what, then, was it backed? The then famous Protestant minister in New England, Cotton Mather, made clear what the backing of this colonial scrip was by asking a pointed series of questions:

> Is a Bond or Bill of Exchange for (one thousand pounds), other than paper? And yet it is not as valuable as so much Silver or Gold, supposing the security of Payment is sufficient? *Now what is the security of your Paper-money less than the Credit of the whole Country?*422

As Brown notes, "Mather had redefined money. What it represented was not a sum of gold or silver. It was credit: 'the credit of the whole country.'"423 Within the context of the evidence presented thus far, and in particular, the analysis of David Astle reviewed in chapter five, what Mather had really done is return to the very ancient conception of money prior to the rise of the international bankster class of bullion brokers in ancient times; what he had done was to return to the idea of money as a credit bill against the surpluses of the state warehouse, and not an interest-bearing note of private issuance.

Franklin stated this conception somewhat differently: "The riches of a country are to be valued by the quantity of labor its inhabitants are able to purchase and not by the quantity of gold and silver they possess."424 The difference is striking, for > when gold was the medium of exchange, money determined production rather than production determining the money supply. When gold was plentiful, things got produced. When it was scarce, men were out of work and people knew want. The virtue of government-issued paper scrip was that it could grow along with productivity, allowing potential to become real wealth.[425]

Franklin elaborated on the source of colonial prosperity to his English hosts, and his words are worth taking to heart, for in them one discerns the clear difference between a closed system of "debt-as-money" or monetized debt, and an open system of money as a medium of exchange of production and credit:

> In the colonies we issue our own money. It is called Colonial Scrip. We issue it to pay the government's approved expenses and charities. We make sure it is issued in proper proportions to make the goods pass easily from the producers to the consumers…. In this manner, creating for ourselves our own paper money, we control its purchasing power, and we have no interest to pay to anyone. You see, a legitimate government can both spend and lend money into circulation, while banks can only lend significant amounts of their promissory bank notes, for they can neither give away nor spend but a tiny fraction of the money people need. Thus, when your banks here in England place money in circulation, there is always a debt principal to be returned and usury to be paid. The result is that you have always too little credit in circulation to give the workers full employment. You do not have too many workers, you have too little money in circulation, and that which circulates, all bears the endless burden of unpayable debt and usury.[426]

Franklin has seen the essential criminality and fraud that is central banking, for the governments pursuing a policy of "monetizing the debt" only means that they are beholden to a private monopoly, which issues "debt as money," whereas the colonial experience — and the very ancient experience — was that true money was credit on the productive surplus of the state, and hence*, only the state could issue it.*

Needless to say, England’s banksters were not about to allow this situation to continue, allowing the colonists to gain prosperity without enriching their own parasitic coffers. Thus, the Bank of England parlayed its influence in Parliament to get the 1764 Currency Act passed, which made it illegal for the colonies to issue their own money. And predictably, as Franklin observed, a year later the streets of the colonies were filled with the unemployed and beggars.[427] And it was this substitution of debt as money, the replacement of real money by the facsimile of money that, according to Franklin, was the real cause of the Revolution.[428]

When the Revolutionary War finally came, the Continental Congress financed the entire endeavor by once again resorting to the expedient of issuing its own paper scrip as a circulating debt note of the state to be redeemed by coinage at a future date.[429] Of course, the Continental Congress issued too much of this scrip, some two hundred million dollars’ worth, so that by the conclusion of the Revolutionary War, the scrip was basically worthless.

But the real lesson was not in the dangers of a state hyper-inflating its state-issued credit notes. The real lesson was that the Continental Congress’ scrip

> Still evoked the wonder and admiration of foreign observers, because it allowed the colonists to do something that had never been done before. They succeeded in financing a war against a major power, with virtually no “hard” currency of their own, without taxing the people. Franklin wrote…during the war, “the whole is a mystery even the politicians, how we could pay with paper that had no previously fixed fund appropriated specifically to redeem it. This currency as we manage it is a wonderful machine. Thomas Paine called it a “corner stone” of the Revolution: “Every stone in the Bridge, that has carried us over, seems to have claim upon our esteem. But this was a corner stone, and its usefulness cannot be forgotten.”[430]

Alas, it is a lesson the American people and the two political parties that supposedly “represent” them seems all but forgotten in modern times.

Of course, the British were fully aware of how their rebellious colonies were funding their Revolution, and purposed to crash the currency by the time-tested tactic of counterfeiting. One British general cited by Brown in her book noted that every art of counterfeiting had been tried, but, to his chagrin, "still the currency has not failed."431 It was only after the successful Revolution that the Continental Scrip failed, as the very same Founding Fathers grew understandably disillusioned with the resulting devaluation that inflation of the supply — not to mention the counterfeit scrip in circulation — caused. The result of this deliberate speculation against the American Continental Scrip was predictable, for the Founding Fathers rebelled against the very paper money-as-credit against the state's future productive surplus after the war by stating that Congress had the power to make "and coin" money. In other words, the Continental Congress had fallen into the old trap of the issuance of the facsimile of money, of money as debt, even if that debt were the credit against a future surplus of the state.

> The notes represented debt, and the debt had now come due. The bearers expected to get their gold, and the gold was not to be had. There was insufficient supply of money for conducting trade. Tightening the money supply by limiting it to coins had quickly precipitated another depression. In 1786, a farmers' rebellion broke out in Massachusetts, led by Daniel Shays. Farmers brandishing pitchforks complained of going heavily into debt when paper money was plentiful. *When it was no longer available and debts had to be repaid in the much scarcer "hard" coin of the British bankers, some farmer lost their farms.*432

The immediate result of this First American "Great Depression" then, was of course the call for a stronger central government and a means for it to create "an expandable money supply," and the convocation of the assembly that eventually led to the draft of the current American Constitution.433

At this juncture, it is worth citing Ellen Brown's comments extensively:

> The solution of Treasury Secretary Hamilton was to "monetize" the national debt, by turning it into a source of money for the country.

> He proposed that a national bank be authorized to print up banknotes and swap them for the government's bonds. The government would pay regular interest on the debt, using import duties and money from the sale of public land. Opponents said that acknowledging the government's debt at face value would unfairly reward the speculators who had bought up the country's I.O.U.s for a pittance from the soldiers, farmers and small businessmen who had actually earned them; but Hamilton argued that the speculators had earned this windfall for their "faith in the country." He thought the government needed to enlist the support of the speculators, or they would do to the new country's money what they had done to the Continental….
> Jefferson, Hamilton's chief political opponent, feared that giving private wealthy citizens an ownership interest in the bank would link their interests too closely within it. The government would be turned into an oligarchy, a government of the rich at war with the working classes. A bank owned by private stockholders, whose driving motive was profit, would be less likely to be responsive to the needs of the public than one that was owned by the public and subject to public oversight. Stockholders of a private bank would make their financial decisions behind closed doors, without public knowledge or control.
> But Hamilton's plan had other strategic advantages, and it won the day. Besides neatly disposing of a crippling federal debt and winning over the "men of wealth," it secured the loyalty of the individual States by making their debts too exchangeable for stock in the new Bank. The move was controversial; but by stabilizing the States' shaky finances, Hamilton got the States on board, thwarting the plans of the pro-British faction that hoped to split them up and establish a Northern Confederacy.[434]

It is worth pausing at this juncture to observe, in the context of Gover's astrological chart of the Great Depression of the 1780s, what we have:

1. The Continental Congress' scrip was essentially not the same thing as Colonial scrip, in that it was debt money issued against a future promise to pay, some of which was a promise to pay in bullion which the colonies did not have in abundance. Hence, the Continental Scrip inevitably opened itself to speculation and counterfeiting by the very European and British banksters who held a virtual monopoly on bullion supplies;

2. The inevitable result, as the value of the Continental plunged after the Revolution and the money supply contracted to reflect the scarce bullion supply, was that the post-Revolutionary states could not pay their debt, and an inevitable depression occurred as the supply of money contracted and private debt-holders were not able to service that debt;

3. the result of this sequence of events led to the calling of the Constitutional convention, the formulation of the current American constitutional system, and the first chartered private central bank of the United States which issued the facsimile of money based on monetized debt;

4. The alternative fear, which Hamilton voiced, was that “private speculators” would manipulate any new American currency via speculation and counterfeiting, driving it to similar worthlessness, and splitting the new American nation if they themselves were not given some stake in the new currency as a vested class interest.

In short, almost from the beginning of the current constitutional system of America, an uneasy compromise — a détente — was struck with the banksters to allow the new nation to survive, and enrich that class in the process. And during all this period, as Gover noted, the planets were in certain alignments….

2. The Depression of the 1870s and the Banksters

The American depression of the 1870s again followed yet another war in American history, the War Between the States. And like the American Revolution, at least one of the leaders of the belligerent parties, as is now well-known, chose to finance his side of the war by issuing state-created debt-free money, i.e., money as credit on the productive output of the nation. His name, of course, was Abraham Lincoln, and the fiscal lessons of his presidency and its immediate aftermath are once again worth rehearsing in some detail.

German Chancellor Otto Von Bismarck wrote a curious thing in 1876 about the fiscal policies of the Lincoln Administration:

> I know of absolute certainty, that the division of the United States into federations of equal force was decided long before the Civil War by the high financial powers of Europe. These bankers were afraid that the United States, if they remained in one block and as one nation, would attain economic and financial independence, which would upset their financial domination over Europe and the world. Of course, in the 'inner circle' of Finance, the voice of the Rothschilds prevailed. They saw an opportunity for prodigious booty if they could substitute two feeble democracies burdened with debt to the financiers… in place of a vigorous Republic sufficient unto herself. Therefore, they sent their emissaries into the field to exploit the question of slavery and to drive a wedge between the two parts of the Union…. The rupture between the North and the South became inevitable; the masters of European finance employed all their forces to bring it about and to turn it to their advantage.[435]

There was just one problem. President Lincoln refused to go into debt to the private class of banksters to fund the Northern effort in the Civil War. Chancellor Bismarck's comment is worth citing:

> The Government and the nation escaped the plots of the foreign financiers. They understood at once, that the United States would escape their grip. The death of Lincoln was resolved upon.[436]

Bismarck, in other words, in his customary direct way, was simply stating that the "inner circle of European financiers" led by the Rothschilds had had Lincoln murdered as a punishment and message to those who dare presume to challenge their power.

While Lincoln was busily issuing his Greenback debt-free scrip, however, the banksters were busily hatching a scheme of their own in Congress through their own faction. Once again, it is essential to cite Ellen Brown extensively in order to appreciate what the scam was, and how it was effected:

> While one faction in Congress was busy getting the Greenbacks issued to fund the war, another faction was preparing a National Banking Act that would deliver a monopoly over the power to create the nation's money supply to the Wall Street bankers and their European affiliates. The National Banking Act was promoted as establishing safeguards for the new national banking system; but while it was an important first step toward a truly national bank, it was only a compromise with the bankers, and buried in the fine print, it gave them exactly what they wanted. A private communication from a Rothschild investment house in London to an associate banking firm in New York dated June 25, 1863, confided:
> "The few who understand the system will either be so interested in its profits or so dependent upon its favors that there will be no opposition from that class, while, on the other hand, the great body of people, mentally incapable of comprehending… will bear its burdens without complaint."
> The Act looked good on its face. It established a Comptroller of the Currency, whose authority was required before a National Banking Association could start business. It laid down regulations > covering minimum capitalization, reserve requirements, bad debts, and reporting. The Comptroller could at any time appoint investigators to look into the affairs of any national bank. Every bank director had to be an American citizen, and three-quarters of the directors had to be residents of the state in which the bank did business. Interest rates were limited by State usury laws; and if no laws were in effect, then to 7 percent. Banks could not hold real estate for more than five years, except for bank buildings. National banks were not allowed to circulate notes they printed themselves. Instead, they had to deposit U.S. bonds with the Treasury in a sum equal to at least one-third of their capital. They got government-printed notes in return.

> So what was the problem? Although the new national banknotes were technically issued by the Comptroller of the Currency, this was just a formality, like the printing of Federal Reserve Notes by the Bureau of Engraving and Printing today. The currency bore the name of the bank posting the bonds, and it was issued at the bank's request. In effect, the National Banking Act authorized the bankers to issue and lend their own paper money. The banks "deposited" the bonds with the Treasury, but they still owned the bonds; and they immediately got their money back in the form of their own banknotes. Topping it off, the National Banking Act effectively removed the competition to these banknotes. It imposed a heavy tax on the notes of the state-chartered banks, essentially abolishing them. It also curtailed competition from the Greenbacks, which were limited to specific issues while the bankers' notes could be issued at will. Treasury Secretary Salmon P. Chase and others complained that the bankers were buying up the Greenbacks with their own banknotes.[437]

In other words, what the National Banking Act really did was allow the banksters effectively to outproduce the government Greenbacks in issues of their own debt-bearing banknotes, which the banksters then used to buy Greenbacks and take them out of circulation!

The banksters followed this up in 1873 with the so-called Act that became known popularly as the "Crime of '73," an act which effectively forbade the coinage of silver as legal tender, effectively placing America on the gold standard once again. Predictably, the Act led to a vastly shrunken money supply, unemployment, and the Depression of the 1870s. The result was similar to the bankster-engineered Depression of the 1780s, for it led to a political "revolt" of powerful farmers who formed the appropriately named Greenback Party, calling for the issuance of state-created debt-free money directly, which money was to be used putting people back to work improving the infrastructure of the country.[438] While the Greenbacks never succeeded in placing a national candidate of their own into the White House, their message was heard, and in 1881 James Garfield became President of the United States of America. Garfield proclaimed:

> Whosoever controls the volume of money in any country is the absolute master of all industry and commerce…And when you realize that the entire system is very easily controlled, one way or another, by a few powerful men at the top, you will not have to be told how periods of inflation and depression originate.[439]

As Brown notes, "Garfield was murdered not long after releasing this statement, when he was less than four months into his presidency."[440] We shall have occasion to return to a consideration of President Garfield's remarks in a moment, but for now, be it noted, that he has clearly insinuated that the cycles of boom and bust are artificially created by the banksters, whereas the cycles data assembled by Edward Dewey, and the astrological data assembled by Gover, clearly indicate that such things appear to have much deeper causes than just human actions, and are, to a certain extent, inevitable. So….what is really going on?

A hint is perhaps gained by the fact that

1. in the cases of both depressions examined thus far, both occurred after a major war; and,

2. both occurred after the government in each case decided to fund the war by issuance of debt-free money, bypassing the banksters completely; and,

3. the banksters retaliated against that currency by unleashing various forms of speculation and manipulation against it, through counterfeiting, or by otherwise removing the government's currency from circulation; and

4. in each instance thus far, this resulted in the deliberate tightening of the money supply and a corresponding loss of jobs, production, and an economic depression.

These patterns reach the nadir of their expression in the greatest Depression of them all, the Great Depression of the 1930s.

3. The Great Depression of the 1930s and the Banksters

By the time of the Great Depression, the great struggle between the federal government of the United States of America and the private banksters had finally been won by the latter with the creation of the privately owned Federal Reserve Bank in 1913, and its thinly-disguised police force agency, the Internal Revenue Service, the agency responsible for gathering the newly created federal income tax that was designed specifically to pay the regular interest payments to the banksters loaning money at interest to the government. Then began the deliberately and quietly orchestrated run-up to the Great Depression:

> The problem began in the Roaring Twenties, when the Fed made money plentiful by keeping interest rates low. Money seemed to be plentiful, but what was actually flowing freely was "credit" or "debt." Production was up more than wages were up, so more goods were available than the money to pay for them; but people could borrow. By the end of the 1920s, major consumer purchases such as cars and radios (which were then large pieces of furniture that sat on the floor) were bought mainly on credit. Money was so easy to get that people were borrowing just to invest, taking out short-term, low-interest loans that were readily available from the banks.
> The stock market held little interest for most people until the Robber Barons started promoting it, after amassing large stock holdings very cheaply themselves. They sold the public on the idea that it was possible to get rich quick by buying stock on "margin" (or on credit). The investor could put a down payment on the stock and pay off the balance after its price went up, reaping a hefty profit. This investment strategy turned the stock market into a speculative pyramid scheme, in which most of the money invested did not actually exist…. The public went wild over this scheme. In a speculative fever, many people literally "bet the farm."… Homesteads that had been owned free and clear were mortgaged to > the bankers, who fanned the fever by offering favorable credit terms and interest rates. The Federal Reserve made these favorable terms possible by substantially lowering the discount rate — the interest rate member banks paid to borrow from the Fed. The Fed thus made it easy for the banks to acquire additional reserves, against which they could expand the money supply by many multiples with loans.441

But why, asks Ellen Brown, would the Federal Reserve want to swamp the U.S. economy with an inflated supply of borrowed "dollars" of Federal Reserve notes?

The answer is chilling.

"The evidence," says Brown, "points to a scheme between Benjamin Strong, then Governor of the Federal Reserve Bank of New York, and Montagu Norman, head of the Bank of England, to deliver control of the financial systems of the world to a small group of private central bankers."442 The reason, according to Dr. Carroll Quigley of the Georgetown School of International Relations, and himself an "insider" with access to the banksters' plans, was that during the 1920s, the privately-owned central banks were determined "to use the financial power of Britain and the United States to force all the major countries of the world to go on the gold standard and to operate it through central banks free from all political control…"443 In other words, the scheme, by forcing money to be a reflection of the world's gold supplies, was one of drastically curtailing the amount of money in circulation as debt, thus setting off a Depression.

The plan was indeed ingenious for its cold calculation and cunning:

> Norman, as head of the Bank of England, was determined to keep the British pound convertible to gold at pre- [World War I] levels, although the pound had lost substantial value as against gold during World War I. The result was a major drain of British gold reserves. To keep gold from flowing out of England into the United States, the Federal Reserve, led by Strong, supported the Bank of England by keeping U.S. interest rates low, inflating the U.S.

> dollar. The higher interest rates in London made it a more attractive place for investors to put their gold, drawing it from the United States to England; but the lower rates in the United States caused an inflation bubble, which soon got out of hand. The meetings between Norman and Strong were very secretive, but the evidence suggests that in February 1929, they concluded that a collapse in the market was inevitable and that the best course was to let it correct "naturally" (naturally, that is, with a little help from the Fed). They sent advisory warnings to lists of preferred customers…telling them to get out of the market. Then the Fed began selling government securities in the open market, reducing the money supply by reducing the reserves available for backing them. The bank-loan rate was also increased, causing rates on brokers' loans to jump to 20 percent.
> The result was a huge liquidity squeeze — a lack of available money. Short-term loans suddenly became available only at much higher interest rates, making buying stock on margin much less attractive. As fewer people bought, stock prices fell, removing the incentive for new buyers to purchase stocks bought by earlier buyers on margin. Many investors were forced to sell at a loss by "margin calls" (calls by brokers for investors to bring the cash in their margin accounts up to a certain level after the value of their stocks had fallen). The panic was on, as investors rushed to dump their stocks for whatever they could get for them. The stock market crashed overnight. People withdrew their savings from the banks and foreigners withdrew their gold, further depleting the reserves on which the money stock was built….It was dramatic evidence of the dangers of delegating the power to control the money supply to a single autocratic head of an autonomous agency.[444]

Once again, one has, if one compares this evidence with Gover, that as the planets entered certain alignments, certain policies were pursued by the banksters, first, to artificially inflate the money supply, extending easy credit and debt, and then suddenly contracting it, allowing stock prices to fall, and allowing the banksters to snap up real assets for a substantially lower price.

Of course, as all of this was going on, Herbert Hoover was President, and as we have already seen, he quietly commissioned Commerce Department economist Edward Dewey to study the reasons for all these Depressions.

4. Implications

So now let us return to the statements of President James Garfield cited previously, and to the questions they raised.

Recall that he clearly insinuated that the cycles of boom and bust are artificially created by the banksters, whereas the cycles data assembled by Edward Dewey, and the astrological data assembled by Gover, clearly indicate that such things appear to have much deeper causes than just human actions, and are, to a certain extent, inevitable. So….what is really going on? In each case thus far examined, as these planetary alignments were occurring, or, more importantly, as a glance at Dewey's cyclic data would indicate, each downturn, and particularly that of the Great Depression of the 1930s, came at a moment when the data suggested that this was more or less inevitable, regardless of what actions might have been taken by various governments or banksters.

So let us now make two assumptions, based on the assembled data:

1. The cyclic data of Dewey suggested that a downturn was inevitable precisely during the time of the 1930s Depression, and the cosmological data assembled by Gover suggested a similar inevitability for other depressions in American history; and,

2. The presence, since ancient times, of the close association between the "temple" with its astrological associations and the "banking class" continued unabated into modern times, a point readily suggested by the presence of economists of major banks in Dewey's own Foundation. Gover's astrological data, moreover, would be available to any astrologer capable of casting a mundane horoscope, and hence, readily available to anyone so inclined to assemble such charts for comparison with the historical evidences of booms and busts in various economies.

Thus, one is led to an astonished, and rather breathtaking conclusion: it would appear that anyone in possession of such knowledge as Dewey's cycles or astrological data similar to Gover's would be in a position, through careful policy manipulation and the contraction of a money supply based on the facsimile of money-as-circulating-debt, to dramatically exacerbate and capitalize on the overall upward or downward trend of such a cycle. Moreover, this appears to be exactly what happened in the cases of the three great depressions in American history.

The exact mechanism for these deeper physics influences on human behavior is not here in view, however. It may be the case that certain alignments cause certain types of behavior to emerge in the aggregate, which in turn create conditions apt to favor one policy or course of action over another. Or conversely, it may be that certain types of influences block the aggregate ability of humans to perceive the subtle manipulations of these would-be master manipulators, which other types of influences may magnify human perceptual abilities and discretion. We simply do not know how this works. But what we do know is that this astrological component and its connection to the banking classes is as old as the civilization with which astrology is associated: Babylon itself. It is an association as old as that of the ancient priesthoods and temples not only with the stars, but with the bullion brokers. It is interesting to note, then, that some allege that the Rothschild family secretly traces its family dynasty back to the Sumerian tyrant Nimrod.[445]

D. IMPLICATIONS OF ENGINEERABILITY: THE ANCIENT ALCHEMICAL CONNECTION

All this implies an "engineerability" to economic trends, even if one does not possess the technology or means to engineer the physical medium or thus its cycles themselves, for if one possessed a sufficient database to know in advance the inevitable cycles of boom and bust, one may not be able to reverse those cycles, but one could considerably exacerbate or alleviate their overall effect.

The keystone in the arch linking together all these disparate concepts — econophysics, astrology, astronomy, Bohm's and Kozyrev's precursor engineering of causation itself, the bullion brokers, the ancient temples — is alchemy, which in its exoteric aspect is the ability to confect the Philosophers' Stone, a substance that can turn base metals into gold, and in its esoteric aspect is the ability to draw upon the transmutative, information-creating properties of the physical medium itself for the power to create or destroy. In its exoteric aspect, therefore, it would be of immediate concern to the bullion brokers to command such a technology, to prevent any outside force or faction from utilizing such a technology to collapse the artificially-created value of their bullion, and hence ruining their private money-creating power. Similarly, it would be of immediate interest to those wishing to break that bullion brokers' monopoly to command that technology. By the same token, the bullion brokers, by controlling the exoteric aspects of alchemy, would see in it a means to the vastly expanded powers of its esoteric aspect, the ability to manipulate and engineer the physical medium itself, thus including even the cycles of aggregate human behavior and activity. Once that power was restored to them, their iron grip on power would be complete.

So notice the stages which have been observed throughout the previous chapters:

> 1. In the first stage, the bullion brokers resort to a kind of false alchemy, i.e., the private creation of credit (and interest debt) by the fiction of ledger credit entry. This is the financiers' alchemical charlatanism, for something has quite literally been created out of nothing, but that "something" only continues to be something of value so long as wider society accredits it as such. It is not genuine information, for it is in fact, in its interest debt creation, the creation of "negative information," a black hole of financial entropy that inevitably must suck all creative production into it and let nothing escape; it is a financial cancer that inevitably will consume its host, creating its own death. Lose that confidence, and the value is gone. Thus, the way to sanctify and ensure that "negative value" was to associate their money minting and issuing activities with the sanctity and probity of the various temple priesthoods in each civilization;

2. In the second stage, alchemy is pursued for its own sake, not only to increase or expand the supply of bullion, but also to monopolize that technology lest the too-rapid increase of that supply ruin the value of the privately-created money which they themselves have implemented. In short, they must monopolize this technology lest their money monopoly be challenged by kings intent upon restoring their crown prerogative of money issuance based upon the creative production of their state and subjects. And in order to monopolize it, they must quite literally infiltrate every society and civilization which appears likely to develop it. It is, perforce, and by the nature of the case, an international conspiracy, for it must have an international reach in order to ensure that the economic system remains closed.

3. In the third stage, which is always the ultimate goal, the bullion brokers seek to develop the highest alchemical technology of them all: the ability to engineer the physical medium and its cycles directly. Since alchemy in its exoteric aspect is based upon its esoteric aspect, i.e., upon the idea of the physical medium as an information-creating and transmutative medium, this technology too must likewise be monopolized, since any rival gaining access to it could successfully challenge their monopoly of money issuance and, more importantly, would have the power to overturn them by force if necessary.

From Morgan’s suppression of Tesla, to Tesla’s own possible independent use of his wireless impulse transmitter technology in a weaponized fashion at Tunguska, to Nazi Germany’s restoration of state-created, debt-free money and to its investigation of this deeper “torsion”-based physics with its Bell project, to ancient Sparta’s and Rome’s attempts to restore economic autarchy and Rome’s burning of Egyptian alchemical books, the pattern is the same:

Wherever there is a private monopoly on the creation of money, there too one finds the inevitable and covert alliance with the temple of science, and a mutual interest in the secret development of the deep alchemical physics of the medium, for that, far beyond the shadowy imitations of international banksters creating ledger credit entries, is the ultimate power to create or destroy.

That alliance with the temple gave the ancient bullion brokers yet another clue on the road to recovering the lost and unified physics: the placement of such temples on the surface of the Earth itself, and the repetitive occurrence within those structures of a sacred geometry known to its priests and initiates…

THE MONSTERS IN THE MACHINE

> *"In their drive to advance the global empire, corporations, banks, and governments (collectively the corporatocracy) use their financial and political muscle to ensure that our schools, business, and media support both the fallacious concept and its corollary. There is little doubt that many ancient temples — from Giza to Stonehenge to Teotihuacan in Mexico — are aligned to astronomical phenomena or particular stars or constellations. However, it is equally true, as noted in chapter four, that many of these temples are aligned, or rather, situated, to something else, and that is their peculiar siting on the surface of planet Earth herself. Many researchers, noticing this peculiar placement, have been able to demonstrate that these sites, if viewed as a total system, constitute a kind of “gridwork” or imaginary lattice stretched across the face of the globe. Moreover, these structures, from the Great Pyramid of Giza to the Parthenon in Athens, to the vast and ancient pyramids of Mexico, appear to incorporate measures in their dimensions comprising constants of a “sacred geometry.”

Consequently, in order to grasp the intricate relationships of deep physics and deep finance, one must go yet another step further, for if there was, as has been already seen, a deep and ancient connection between the ancient temples, their priesthoods, and astrology on the one hand and the “bullion brokers” on the other, and if, as has been argued, this connection evinced a hidden motivation on the part of the latter to know and manipulate the physics this portended, then the alignment of these sites and temples, and indeed, their very dimensions, may form yet another clue and data point to be considered. Indeed, researcher Brian Desborough makes some astonishing assertions in this respect:

> Sacred geometry, which comprised the core teaching of any genuine Mystery School of antiquity, was incorporated into the design of buildings that enabled them to function as resonant cavities, which were attuned to the dynamic energies that pervade the cosmos. This is the same energy continuum that was harnessed some two thousand years later by Nikola Tesla and other scientific pioneers, who elected to conduct their research beyond the stultifying confines of academia.
> The basic tenets of sacred geometry were taught in ancient Mystery Schools, in countries as geographically diverse as India, Britain, and Egypt. This strongly suggests that such institutions functioned not as individual entities, but rather as a transnational network. Such a suggestion implies that the more esoterically-oriented … sects operated not as individual religious communities, but were in communication with the Mystery Schools of other nations.[448]

As has been seen, the rise of an international class of bullion brokers closely associated with such temples in ancient times provides a ready mechanism to explain this transnational character of the Mystery Schools, and may have been instrumental in the dispersion of such ideas.

More importantly, however, Desborough clearly alludes to an occulted physics purpose that motivated the incorporation of these geometries into ancient temples, for these were, in his words, designed to function as “resonant cavities” or, in a physicist’s language, as “coupled harmonic oscillators” to those “dynamic energies that pervade the cosmos.” In this last statement, Desborough is correct, for as has also been seen, the deeper physics suggested by Kozyrev and Bohm in the perpetual dynamism of the cosmos, with its rotating systems within rotating systems, implies that matter itself arises as a gridwork or interference pattern of the waves produced in the physical medium. As such, matter is a natural resonating cavity of such waves, and in certain geometrical alignments and dimensions, that resonance can conceivably be made to function more efficiently. Desborough’s insight is keen, but unfortunately, neither argued nor substantiated.

So inevitably the question occurs: is there such a gridwork of sites upon the Earth? And do temples in fact evidence a geometry in their very construction that would enable them to function as such resonators?

A. THE MODERN RISE OF EARTH GRID THEORIES

1. Ivan Sanderson

One does not have to read too far into the area of Earth Grid theories to find a veritable overgrowth of wild speculations and fanciful ideas. But the actual modern growth of the theory may best be attributed to the scientific research of some Russian chemists, and a Western scientist interested in “anomalous phenomena,” the famous Fortean researcher Ivan Sanderson. Sanderson was in fact a professional biologist by academic training and background. But in 1972 he published an article for Saga magazine entitled “The Twelve Devil’s Graveyards Around the World.”

What Sanderson did was to compile a database of “Bermuda Triangle”-like phenomena of ship and plane disappearances worldwide, and, using modern techniques of communications and geophysical tabulation, plotted these on a map of the globe. These correlated to 12 areas on the globe where magnetic anomalies “and other energy phenomena were linked to a full spectrum of strange physical phenomena.”449 Plotting these strange occurrences on a map yielded 12 regions where such phenomena occurred with a greater statistical occurrence than usual:

What Sanderson also noted, however, was that some of these areas also included strange megalithic structures. For example, on the map above, in the Pacific Ocean west of South America, one such triangle incorporates Easter Island, with its well-known and very strange stone carvings of gigantic stylized human heads. Another, located in the Algerian desert, also was home to megalithic structures.

2. The Russians Get into the Game

Sanderson’s findings spurred a veritable flurry of activity, as other researchers, notably the engineer and mathematician Carl Munck, quickly noticed that virtually all ancient sites were laid out according to a scheme incorporating some sort of “Earth Grid” including the tenets of sacred geometry and ancient units of measurement such as the “megalithic yard.” No less than the Soviet Academy of Sciences became involved in this effort, when an article, “Is the Earth a Large Crystal?” appeared in its journal Khimiya I Zhizn (Chemistry and Life), authored by a trio of very unlikely collaborators.

One of them, Nikolai Goncharov, was an historian fascinated by the ancient world and its history. Goncharov plotted on a map of the world all the “centers of earliest human culture.”[450] Goncharov then met a construction engineer, Vyacheslav Morozov, and Vaelry Makarov, an electronics researcher. Pooling their resources, the trio, following the lead of some Soviet scientists, suggested the Earth actually began as a crystal “with angular dimension” that only after “millennia of motion and the actions of many forces did the crystal round itself into a ball.” Moreover, because of this, hidden beneath the surface of the Earth, the edges of that crystalline structure were buried and possibly still faintly visible.[451]

Later, researchers Bill Becker and Bethe Hagens expanded on the Russian article with their own version. Hagens described her own reaction to the Russian research, and its implications, as follows:

> I found a picture of the world with a funny lattice work on it. It looked as if someone had put one of Buckminster Fuller’s domes over the planet, and the design caught my eye. As I read the accompanying article…I learned that was indeed what had been done. Three Russians (an engineer, a historian, and a linguist) had found that the dome-like geometric pattern could be aligned on the Earth in such a way that the struts of the dome mapped out major geologic features (such as mountain ranges and river systems), and > the connecting points for the struts fell at the sites of important ancient civilizations.[452]

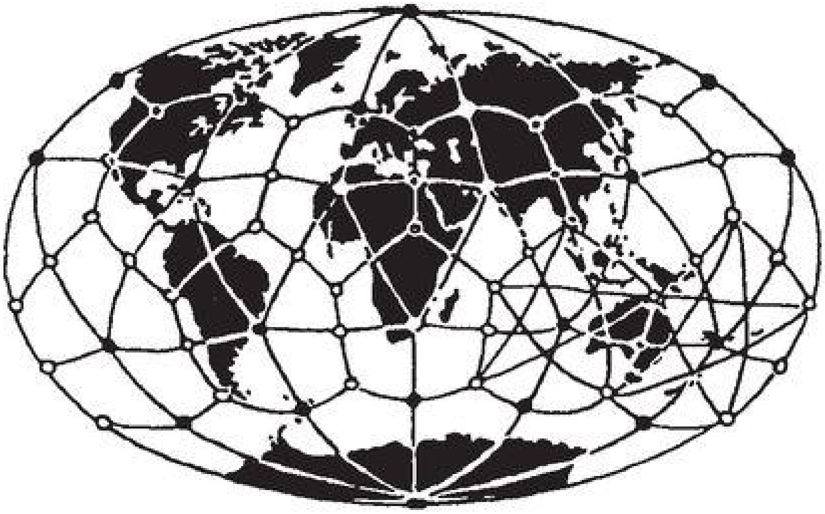
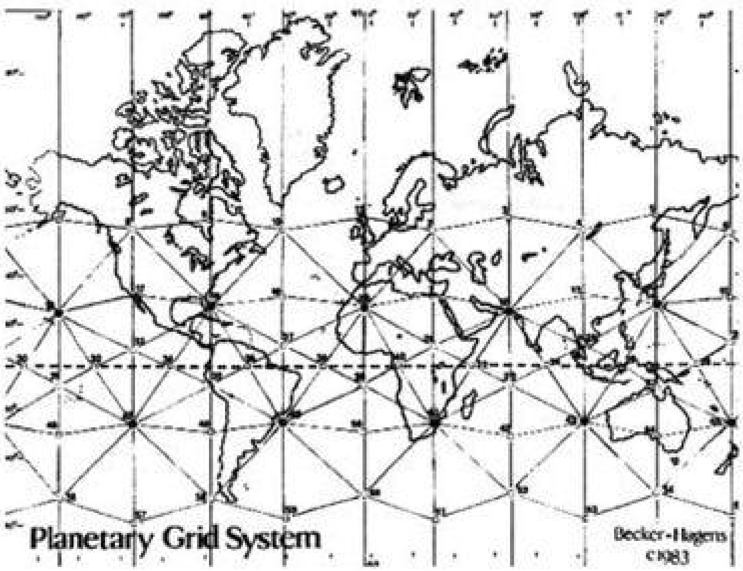
Hagens and Becker then expanded on the Russian concept, and produced the following interesting map, which indeed looks like some bizarre creation of Buckminster Fuller:



The Original Russian "Earth Crystal"

Flattening the projection, and adding Becker's and Hagen's research to it, yields their Earth grid map:



The Becker-Hagens Earth Grid Map of 1983

Looking at this map carefully discloses some rather interesting features. For one thing, the convergence of several lines in the southern Pacific Ocean west of Latin America is, once again, close to Easter Island and its megalithic stone statues. Yet another line runs due north and south through England, close to the celebrated structure of Stonehenge. Yet another node of convergences occurs in Florida, near the well-known Coral Castle, constructed — no one knows exactly how — by Edward Leedskalnin. Finally, yet another node occurs at almost the exact location of the Giza plateau in Egypt. And lest one think this was the fanciful creation of New Age dabblers and cranks, let it be noted that William Becker was a professor of industrial design at the University of Illinois, while Bethe Hagens was a professor of anthropology at the Governors State University of Illinois.[453]

The mention of Buckminster Fuller affords a significant clue into what might be going on with this Earth Grid system. In a series of unusual experiments, Fuller decided to test what sorts of wave patterns might emerge within spheres when subjected to acoustic stress, that is, when subjected to stress of longitudinal waves. Fuller painted the surfaces of balloons, immersed them in water, and then pulsed the water with sound waves of varying frequencies. Fuller discovered that as the spheres vibrated, they set up standing waves on the surfaces of the balloons such that the paint would begin to collect and form lines and grid-like patterns on the surface.[454]

With this one has the conceptual link to the ideas of Kozyrev, Bohm, and others, for if matter is the result of the inference pattern of such “longitudinal waves in the medium” (or, as some have called them, “scalar” waves”) and as such is therefore a natural resonator of them, then it stands to reason that as a resonator, such waves will be perpetually established within any planetary body, producing such a gridwork. Small wonder then that Tesla, in his scheme for the beaming of wireless power to any part of the globe, found it necessary to “grip the earth,” for such waves, resonating with the ever-changing dynamism of the planets themselves, would be a virtually inexhaustible supply of energy. And small wonder too, that J.P.

Morgan, with his own deep connections to the oil industry and its understanding of energy as a non-renewable closed system of a scarce resource, eventually shut Tesla down.

3. Back to the Nazis

But lest it be forgotten, the first major world power to show an interest in Earth grid theories was not Soviet Russia, but Nazi Germany. As detailed in my previous book The Philosophers' Stone, "Himmler's Rasputin," Karl Maria Wiligut, introduced Himmler to the geomantic ideas of Günther Kirchhoff, who believed that there was such a world grid of ancient sites laid out on power points designed to draw energy from the earth itself.[455]

B. DR. KONSTANTIN MEYL’S PALEOPHYSICAL INTERPRETATION OF ANCIENT TEMPLES AS SCALAR RESONATORS

If the conception of matter itself, as a “template” or gridwork of the interference of such longitudinal standing waves in the medium rationalizes, is capable of rationalizing the placement of certain ancient temples on the surface of the Earth, what about the incorporation of sacred geometry into their very dimensions?

One scientist who tackled this problem very directly is German physicist and engineer Prof. Dr.-Ing. Konstantin Meyl. Meyl is the author of probably the only comprehensive — and highly mathematical — textbook treatment of the production of such scalar or longitudinal waves in the medium. The title of Meyl’s book, all 654 pages of it, is Scalar Waves: From an Extended Vortex and Field Theory to a Technical, Biological, and Historical Use of Longitudinal Waves.[456] For the technically and mathematically minded, this book is a thorough introduction to the theory and practice of scalar waves, if one can get through the sometimes shaky English translation.

Meyl is a scientist who very deliberately and consciously sets out to reconstruct an underlying physics basis — what I have called “paleophysics” in my various books on ancient history and texts — from ancient myths, texts, and temples. And his program, as outlined in the final pages of his book, is a total one.

For example, he reproduces the following table as a summary of his particular way of “decoding” the ancient temples and mysteries:

Ancient temple = short wave station
Dedicated to one god = fixing of the frequency
Supreme god Zeus, = range of the short wave
Father of all gods = all short wave bands
Priest, Representative of the god = amateur radio operator with license to transmit

High priest = chief intendant

Pontifex Maximus, “topmost bridge builder” = Chairman of the authority and the telegraph offices

Oracle = telegraphy receiver

Runes, cuneiform writing = telegraphy symbols

Metre, hexameter = increase of redundancy

Oracle priest = telegraphy interpreter

Tripod = reception key, electroacoustical converter

Looking at intestines, Rite of sacrificing = reading off convulsions, electro-optical converter

Temple books = news notes

Seer, who looks into the God world = amateur radio operator, at telegraphy reception

Homer = Ancient radio operator

Godology = high-frequency technology

God name = RDS, station identification

Members of a family of gods = broadcasting studios of a broadcasting company

Earth radiation = power supply

Homage of a weekday = time restriction of the operation of the station

Zeus forges “thunderbolts” = electrostatic blows, when a Temple is oscillating

Ritual act = technical provision for transmission and reception

Cella (marrow of temple) = tuned cavity

Obelisk = antenna rod[12]

[457]

While this table of comparisons and decodings might at first glance seem highly implausible if not downright bizarre, Meyl minces no words in the explanatory text accompanying this table:

> It shall be proven that already in antiquity radio engineering based on scalar waves has been used. The proof starts with a thesis.
> The temples in antiquity were all short wave broadcasting stations. And energy from the field served as an energy source, so e.g. the earth radiation in the case of temples of terrestrial gods. In the case of the solar god the radiation of the Sun was used, whereas for the temples, which were dedicated to the planetary gods, the neutrino radiation arriving from the planets served as an energy source.[458]

Meyl's program, in other words, is a total one. In terms of the context of the hypothetical scenario with which we opened this book in chapter one, however, it is also an intriguing one, for given the close association of the ancient bullion brokers with the temples, they, like their modern counterparts, would have need of a vast communications network, one, moreover like their modern counterparts, that would be faster than those communications available to the common masses. So Meyl's thesis, from one standpoint, fits the needs of the situation perfectly.

It is, however, when Meyl turns to a consideration of the sacred geometry in these temples that his thesis takes on its breathtaking significance. In order to buttress his thesis, Meyl reproduces the diagrams of the floor plans, and in some cases, side views and cutaways, of several ancient temples. We do so here in order to illustrate his thesis, and to set his remarks and commentary into their proper context. Meyl first reproduces the floor plan and front view of the Temple of Zeus in Olympia, showing its use of the Golden Ratio, or Phi (φ=0.61818…):

The Temple of Zeus at Olympia, with Meyl's Calculation of its Resonant Frequency[459]

Note Meyl's calculations of the resonant frequency of the Temple on the lower left of his diagram: 5 MHz or 5 Megahertz. On the right, notice how the various dimensions of the Temple reflect the harmonics of the width of the Temple, with the width being designated by L, and the various harmonics of that fundamental being L/2, and φ-L, in a kind of stone chamber version of Dewey's organ pipes from chapter two. This analogy is not as haphazard as it might at first be seen, but in order to appreciate why this is so, more of Meyl's diagrams need to be examined.

The next temple Meyl reproduces is a frontal floor plan and side view of the Temple of Athena Alea, ca. 350 B.C.:

Note again that the Temple is laid out on redundant harmonic relationships of a fundamental, L, representing the width of the Temple, again with the harmonic φ-L being a prominent feature of the structure. Note also Meyl's calculations of the resonant wavelength of the structure being 40 meters, with a "transmitter frequency" of 7.5 Megahertz. He reproduces a similar diagram for the Hera Temple of Selinunt, ca. 460 B.C.:

Similar harmonic relationships also held true for later Roman temples, such as the temple of Venus and Roma at Rome, ca. 136 A.D.:

And finally, of course, there was the temple of temples, the Roman Pantheon itself:

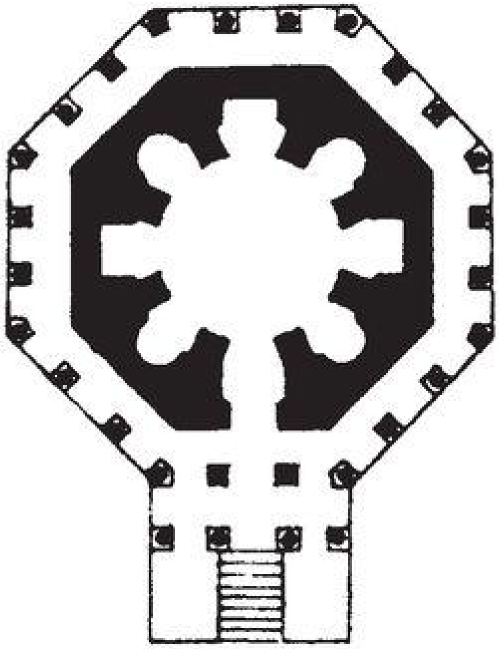
Looking carefully at the floor plan of the Pantheon, however, Meyl noticed something that, to his engineer's eye, looked extraordinarily familiar, and a breathtaking confirmation of his thesis that ancient temples may have been deliberately designed as transmitters and receivers of scalar "radio" waves.

Deciding to see if there were other similar floor plans, Meyl went in search of them, and soon found them, one in the floor plan of a temple in the palace of the Emperor Diocletian:



Floor Plan of the Temple in the Palace of Emperor Diocletian[465] and yet another example in the floor plan of the Temple of Minerva
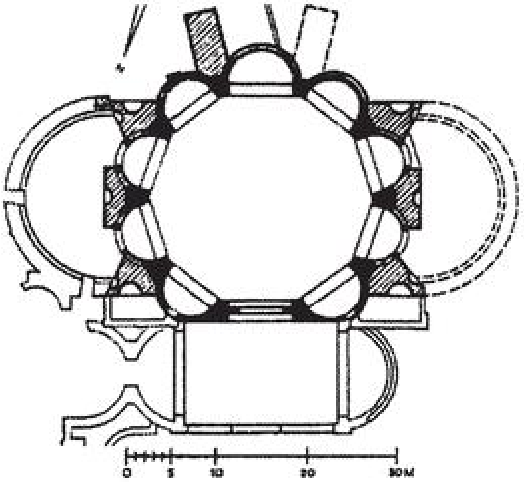
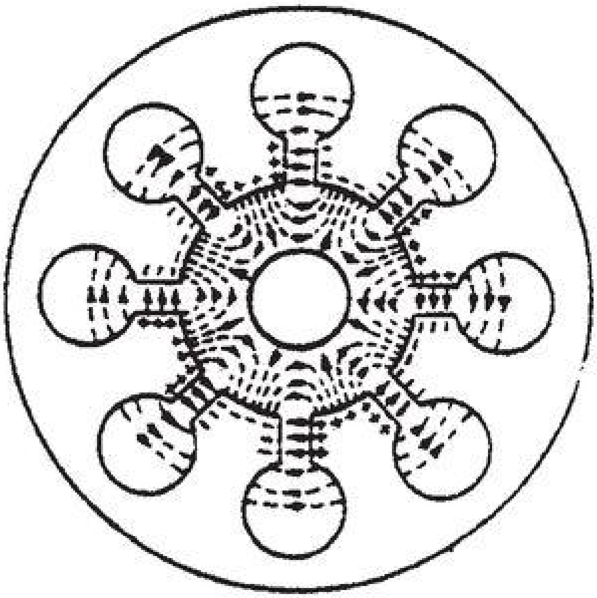
Medica in Rome, built ca. 320 A.D.:



Temple of Minerva Medica in Rome, ca. 320 A.D.[466]

What precisely was so amazing about these floor plans of late Roman temples?

It was their suspicious resemblance to a modern device — crucial in the operation of radios and radars — called a magnetron:



A Modern Magnetron467

Meyl's commentary accompanying these diagrams is now worth citing, for it shows how strong the case actually is that some of these ancient temples, a good many in fact, may have been covertly designed for the precise purposes of long-range communication, using some very advanced notions of physics:

> Let's to some extent proceed from the knowledge of textbook physics currently present in high frequency engineering and give a well trained engineer the following task, which he should solve systematically and like an engineer. He should build a transmitter with maximum range at minimum transmitting power, thus a classic of optimization. Doing so, the material expenditure doesn't play a role!
> After mature deliberation the engineer will hit upon it that only one solution exists. He decides on a telegraphy transmitter at the long wave end of the short wave band, at f=3 MHz, which corresponds to a wavelength of λ=100m. There less than 1 Watt transmitting power is enough for radio communication once around the earth….

And he optimizes further. Next the engineer remembers that at high frequencies, e.g. for microwave radiators, not cables but waveguides are used, since these make possible a considerable better degree of effectiveness. In the case of the waveguide the stray fields are reduced by alignment and concentration of the fields in the inside of the conductor. In the case of antennas however the fields scatter to the outside and cause considerable stray losses. He draws the conclusion that his transmitter should be built as a tuned cavity and not as an antenna!

As a result the engineer puts a building without windows in the countryside with the enormous dimensions of 50 m length (=λ/2) and 25 m (=λ/4) respectively 12.5 mm (=λ/8) width. The height mhe calculates according to the Golden Proportion to increase the scalar wave part. Those approximately are the dimensions of the Cella without windows of Greek temples.

For the operation of such a transmitter in antiquity apparently the noise power of the cosmic radiation was sufficient, which arrived at the earth starting from the sun and the planets. By increasing the floor space also the collected field energy and the transmitting power could be increased, so that also from the perspective of the power supply the temple with the largest possible wavelength at the same time promised the largest transmitting power, so at least in antiquity.

Our engineer further determines that he will switch the carrier frequency on and off at a predetermined clock pulse. Thus he decides for radiotelegraphy. The advantage of this technique is a maximum of the increase of the reception range. For that the signals at the transmitter have to be coded and at the receiver again deciphered. By means of the encryption of the contents these are accessible only to the “insiders,” who know the code; prerequisite for the emerging of hermeticism and eventually a question of power![468]

This leads Meyl to his next bit of evidence, or rather to the next stage of his decoding of the ancient data pointing to the existence of a genuine technology at work: ancient texts.

Meyl, having demonstrated the peculiar transmitter-receiver properties of many ancient temples, then uses the existence of this technology to decipher a baffling mystery concerning ancient texts:

> Direct evidence is present as well. It can be found in ancient texts. But it is questionable if historical texts concerning ancient radio engineering have been translated correctly. The talk is about oracles, mystery cult and earth prophecy if the receiver is meant. The predominantly technically uneducated historians attest (that) the Romans (possessed) a defective sense of time, because their couriers surely could not cover the long ways across the Roman empire so fast at all, if the read in the Latin texts: “They sent by courier to the emperor in Rome, and got for answer…”. The answer of the emperor namely already arrived at the squad at the latest in the following night. The correct translation should read: “they cabled” or “they broadcasted to the emperor in Rome and got for answer…”
> Such a big empire as the Roman Empire actually only could be reigned by means of an efficient communication. Cicero coined the word: “We have conquered the peoples of the earth owing to our broadcasting technology…”! The term broadcasting technology from ignorance is translated with piety. If engineers however rework the incorrect translations, then one will discover that numerous texts tell of the broadcasting technology, that thus correspondingly much direct evidence exists concerning the practical use of this technology.
> For the Roman military transmitters, which formed the backbone of the administration of the empire, the reading off of the information from observations of nature like the bird flight or from felt signals of a geomanter was too unreliable. They read off the information from the rhythm of the convulsions of the intestines of freshly slaughtered animals. In the case of the dead animals on the > altar every extrinsic influence was excluded. But the enormous need of slaughter cattle was a disadvantage. Who wanted to have information first of all had to bring along an animal, which then was "sacrificed" to the god, or better say, which was abused as a receiver of a particular transmitter. Thereby the innards served as a biosensor and as a receiver for the news.[469]

In other words, an extraordinarily sensitive membrane had to be found to be able to sense and record the very subtle pulses of such transmissions and telegraphy, for they were by the nature of the case, very weak.

Whatever one makes of these speculations of Meyl, he is, however, correct in his basic premise that the design of ancient temples is too coincidentally peculiar to the engineering requirements of transmitting weak radio signals. Nor should the material used to construct such temples be overlooked, for many of them were constructed from limestone, granite, and other crystal-bearing rock, and the ability of crystals in receiving radio signals is common knowledge.

But why does he invoke the scalar component in his argument that such temples were, in fact, tuned resonant cavities? The key lies with what seems to be the most absurd component of his reconstruction, namely, the use of the membranes of an animal's intestines to record the pulses, for the pulses being received are not ordinary Hertzian "jump rope" waves, but the "yardstick" waves of longitudinal or scalar waves:

> The argumentation has to be made on mathematical-physical foundation. The prerequisite for that are the 29 chapters of before.[470] The following points could be demonstrated and derived:
> 1. The wave equation (inhomogeneous Laplace equation) describes the sum of two wave parts, where
> 2. every antenna emits both parts.
> 3. The transverse part, known as electromagnetic wave (Hertzian wave)

4. and the longitudinal part (Tesla radiation) termed scalar wave by the discoverer, better known as antenna noise.

5. The wave equation mathematically describes the connection of both wave parts in general and the conversion of one part into the other in particular, thus

6. the rolling up and unrolling of waves in field vortices (measurable as noise).

7. The transition takes place proportionally to the Golden Proportion, as resulted from the derivation (chapter 29.7-29.9).

With the last point the electrotechnical problem becomes a geometrical problem, if it concerns the use of scalar waves. The geometry of the antenna is crucial. Thereby the Golden Proportion provides the necessary direction for construction.

That justifies the assumption that the buildings in antiquity, which were built according to the Golden Proportion, were technical facilities for scalar waves. Maybe the builders had specifications that had physical reasons and could mathematically be proven.

At this place here result completely new aspects for judging and interpreting buildings especially from antiquity through the derivation of the Golden Proportion from the fundamental field equation. If we have understood their way of functioning, then we will be able to learn much from that for our own future and for the future construction of scalar wave devices.

As a further prerequisite for the ancient broadcasting technology enough field energy should be at disposal. We proceed from the assumption that

1. the earth magnetism and the cosmic neutrino radiation are tightly banding together by the processes in the earth's core,

2. the earth magnetism in antiquity verifiably was (approximately a) thousandfold stronger than today (proven by gauging of pieces of broken pot),

> 3. as a consequence the neutrino radiation in antiquity as well must have been (a) thousandfold strong and
> 4. the cosmic neutrino radiation has served the transmitting plants of antiquity as an energy carrier.

Any thought is absurd to reject the technical function of a temple only because it today can’t be reproduced anymore. The artistic and aesthetical viewpoints, which are put into the foreground by art historians because of ignorance about the true function, rather are secondary.[471]

And with those rather breathtaking statements, Meyl’s case for the ancient temple as being a broadcast technology based on longitudinal pulses or scalar waves is concluded.

However, in view of my own speculative analysis of the Earth grid itself as being the result of its natural properties of being a resonator of such standing longitudinal waves, one is inevitably led to the conclusion that both the use of “sacred geometry” in the construction of such temples, and the placement of some of these temples over precise nodal points on that gridwork was for the explicit and precise purpose of making these structures as efficient resonating cavities as possible. When one adds to this the fact that the resulting template or interference pattern of such longitudinal waves, produced by all such resonators, such as the planets, vary with time according to their positions relative to each other, and to the cosmic backdrop of the galaxy, one again finds a physics reason why so many of these very same temples were oriented to astronomical points or events.

To put it succinctly, it is beginning to look an awfully lot like that Very High and Very Ancient Civilization, having blown itself apart by means of those very same technologies, moved quickly and effectively to preserve as much of that technology as it could in the establishment and propagation of the ancient temples and mystery schools, and moved equally quickly to ensure that its legacy civilizations knew and understood the necessity — if there was to be any kind of civilization at all — for there to be a medium of exchange based upon the creative and productive output of the physical medium itself, and of its derived and differentiated creatures: man. Little wonder, too, that those who sought to reconstruct that technology in order to gain mastery and hegemony over their fellow man quickly allied themselves with those temples and mystery schools, and begin to pervert that physics in a financial and false alchemy that created the exact opposite: “negative information” in the form of money-as-debt interest, for by means of that closed system of finance, they purposed to reconstruct that open system of physics for themselves, to ensure their power and hegemony.

For with living organisms — as Dr. Meyl himself alluded to — and more importantly, mankind, one arrives at the final component and resonant cavity of this form of energy: human DNA, and its own remarkable embodiment of the very same “Sacred Geometries.”

Both in ancient and in modern times we have discerned the persistent outline of an association of an international class of banksters with those engaged in advanced scientific research, and we have also seen that this class has endeavored to monopolize not only the false alchemical power of the issuance of debt as a facsimile of money, but also to monopolize the genuine alchemical power of the physics of the transmutative physical medium itself. But what about the period between these two widely separated historical poles? Did that class continue to exist? And if so, what were they doing? Is there evidence to suggest that it continued as a class in more or less uninterrupted continuity from ancient times? And is there evidence to suggest that it continued its close association and monitoring of scientific achievement?

Moreover, it was seen that some allege that the Rothschild family secretly traces their family origins back to the Sumerian conqueror Nimrod. Is there any truth to, or for that matter, any broad corroboration of, these allegations?

A. ANCIENT ROME

To answer these questions, a closer look at ancient Rome is in order.

Professor Tenney Frank was a professor at Johns Hopkins University at the turn of the last century, and was the author of a well-known treatise, An Economic History of Rome. This work became such a standard in the field that it became the basis for entries in the Cambridge Ancient History and the Oxford History of Rome.

In the course of his researches, Professor Frank discovered an interesting thing about the population of ancient Rome during the period between the Republic and the final emergence of the empire, and that is that the population was not Roman or Latin at all, but — in a word and without much exaggeration — Babylonian. In an article written for the American Historical Review, Frank begins by noting how the problem of the ancient Roman race came to his attention. Visiting the ancient tombs of Rome, Frank observes that the historian will notice a curious and even peculiar thing:

> …he finds prenomen and nomen promising enough, but the cognomina all seem awry. L. Lucretius Pamphilus, A. Aemilius Alexa, M. Clodius Philostoasgas do not smack of freshman Latin. And he will not readily find in the Roman writers now extant an answer to the questions that these inscriptions invariably raise. Do these names imply that the Roman stock was completely changed after Cicero's day, and was the satirist (Juvenal) recording a fact when he wailed that the Tiber had captured the waters of the Syrian Orantes? If so, are these foreigners ordinary immigrants, or did Rome become a nation of ex-slaves and their offspring?[473]

Frank's tentative answers are even more unsettling than the original questions he asks. Studying almost 14,000 names, Professor Frank discovered that between 300 B.C. and 300 A.D., the population of Italian Rome underwent a drastic change in ethnicity, such that by the end of the period, the vast majority of the Italian Roman population had Greek surnames, and not Latin at all:

> For reasons which will presently appear I have accepted the Greek cognomen as a true indication of recent foreign extraction, and since the citizens of native stock did not as a rule unite in marriage with (freemen), a Greek cognomen in a child or one parent is sufficient of status (i.e., was foreign).[474]

Professor Frank quickly dispatches the idea that this was simply due to a "popularity" craze of certain names:

> On the other hand, the question has been raised whether a man with a Greek cognomen must invariably be of foreign stock. Could it not be that Greek names became so popular that, like Biblical and classical names today, they were accepted by the Romans of native stock? In the last days of the empire this may have been the case, but the inscriptions prove that the Greek cognomen was not in good repute. I have tested this matter by classifying all the instances in the 13,900 inscriptions where the names of both father and son appear. Form this it appears that fathers with Greek names are very prone to give Latin names to their children, whereas the reverse is not true.[475]

Thus, the conclusion for Professor Frank was rather obvious:

> Clearly the Greek name was considered as a sign of dubious origin among the Roman plebeians, and the freedman family that rose to any social ambitions made short shrift of it. For these reasons, therefore, I consider that the presence of a Greek name in the immediately family is good evidence that the subject of the inscription is of servile or foreign stock. The conclusion of our pros and cons must be that nearly ninety per cent of the Roman-born folk represented in the abovementioned sepulchral inscriptions are of foreign extraction.[476]

But this posed a rather large problem, and to see what it is and how Professor Frank dealt with it, we need to recall a bit of obvious history.

The problem is the mere presence of a Greek surname on tomb inscriptions does not necessarily mean the occupant is Greek. The simple reason for this is that after Alexander the Great's conquest of Mesopotamia, Persia, and Egypt, the Greek language spread far and wide, and became something of an "international" language, much as English or French is today. Thus, a Greek surname on a tomb does not necessarily imply that all these Roman tombs had Greek occupants. But this raises a far larger and more significant question. If they were not necessarily Greek, then what were they? What was the predominant ethnic stock they represented? Frank minces no words:

> Who are these Romans of the new type and whence do they come? How many are immigrants, and how many are of servile extraction? Of what race are they?[477]

Frank's method of dealing with this question is to take Rome's classical authors and satirists at their word, and from this, an important and very significant fact emerges.

Noting that "most of the sociological and political data of the empire are provided by satirists," Frank then reasons himself to a rather astonishing conclusion:

> When Tacitus informs us that in Nero's day a great many of Rome's senators and knights were descendants of slaves and that the native stock had dwindled to surprisingly small proportions, we are not sure whether we are not to take it as an exaggerated thrust by an indignant Roman of the old stock…. To discover some new light upon these fundamental questions of Roman history, I have tried to gather such fragmentary data as the corpus of inscriptions might afford. The evidence is never decisive in its purport, and it is always, by the very nature of the material, partial in its scope, but at any rate it may help us to interpret our literary sources to some extent. It has at least convinced me that Juvenal and Tacitus were not exaggerating. It is probably that when these men wrote a very small percentage of the free plebeians on the streets of Rome could > prove inmixed Italian descent. *By far the larger part, perhaps ninety percent, had Oriental blood in their veins.*478

One has only to read a bit between the lines to see what Professor Frank is implying, for Juvenal, let it be recalled, had complained of the Syrian “Orantes” river “flowing into the Tiber,” a metaphor for people of Chaldean — i.e., Babylonian — extraction having “flowed” into the bloodlines of the ancient Roman stock: “These dregs call themselves Greeks,” he complains, “but how small a portion is from Greece; the River Orantes has long flowed into the Tiber.”479

The basic historical outlines are now clear, for as Roman conquests spread into the eastern Mediterranean and eventually conquered the old Seleucid Empire — i.e., the portion of Alexander’s empire based in Mesopotamia with its capital at Babylon — many of these peoples made their way back to the Italian peninsula as slaves, and, following the relatively lenient Roman custom of manumission of slaves upon the death of their owner, these later became freemen and the backbone of the Roman economy in the very lap of the Empire itself.

1. The Change in Roman Racial Stock and Imperial Policy

This brings us to the economics and finance part of the story, the part that is for our purposes, the most significant part:

> There are other questions that enter into the problem of change of race at Rome, for the solution of which it is even more difficult to obtain statistics. For instance, one asks, without hope of a sufficient answer, why the native stock did not better hold its own. Yet there are at hand not a few reasons. We know for instance that when Italy had been devastated by Hannibal and a large part of its population put to the sword, immense bodies of slaves were brought up in the East to fill the void; and that during the second century B.C., when the plantation system with its slave service was coming into vogue, the natives were pushed out of the small farms and many disappeared to the province of the ever-expanding empire. Thus, during the thirty years before Tiberius Gracchus, the census statistics show no increase. During the first century B.C., the importation of captives and slaves continued, while the free-born citizens were being wasted in the social, Sullan, and civil wars. Augustus affirms that he had had a half a million citizens under arms, one-eighth of Rome’s citizens, and at that the most vigorous part. During the early empire, twenty to thirty legions, drawn of course from the best free stock, spent their twenty years of vigor in garrison duty while the slaves, exempt from such services, lived at home and increased in numbers. In other words, the native stock was supported by less than a normal birthrate, whereas the stock of foreign extraction had not only a fairly normal birthrate, but a liberal quota of manumissions to its advantage.[480]

The result of this combination of bad policy, wars, and heavy reliance on slaves, was that the original Roman race — at least on the Italian peninsula — “went under.”[481]

However, there were two significant things that this importation of Mesopotamian slaves accomplished. First, these slaves brought with them, of course, their culture and religion. Secondly, they brought with them their “Babylonian” business and banking practices. Thus, even when this population were slaves, the great majority of the normal practical day-to-day commerce of Rome — farming, construction, instruction, and so on — was conducted by slaves. And when freed, not only did their religion and culture penetrate Roman society to a significant degree, but this group gradually penetrated the highest reaches of the Roman imperial government itself.[482] The result, in short, was that the Mesopotamian and Syrian merchants effectively colonized Rome’s provinces bordering the Mediterranean Sea, Roman banking was all but monopolized in their hands as the influence of Mesopotamian mystery cults extended throughout the Empire, and the activities of the temple continued to be associated with commerce. In a certain limited sense, then, the Roman Empire may be viewed as but the latest imperial front for that ancient class of “bullion brokers,” and this change of the ethnic stock in the heart of the Empire, the Italian peninsula itself, finally, explains why the bullion exchange policies of Rome vis-à-vis the Far East appear to be the product of deliberate manipulation.

2. The Next Stage: Venice and Banking

A quick glance at the subsequent history of this class will show the connections to modern time, for the next stage in this connective history was provided by Attila the Hun who, ravaging the Italian peninsula and even Rome itself, forced many of these mercantile families to flee northward to the protective lagoons and marshes of what would later become the Middle Ages' center of commerce and banking in western Europe: Venice. In the very early ninth century, Venice was formally recognized as a part of the Eastern Roman Empire, and thus began its rise as a financial power, for it was granted special trading and tax exemptions throughout the Empire.

But the pattern, a mercantile and banking class operating behind special imperial privileges, remained the same. As noted in chapter four, however, the Fourth Crusade eventually captured Constantinople, and with that, the Empire's monopoly on the right to coin gold was broken, and western European monarchs began to coin such money. But it was Venice that had funded the mercenary army of French knights that captured Constantinople, and it was the Venetian Doge, Enrico Dandolo, that imposed a puppet Latin government on the ancient Eastern Empire. By this point, the great Venetian oligarchical families and their family fondi or fortunes (literally, “funds”), were in place: the Cornaro, the Dandolo, the Contarini, Morosini, Sorzi and Tron fortunes.

3. On to Amsterdam, London, the Reformation, and the Wars of Religion

Researcher Webster Tarpley, in three short paragraphs, outlines the connection of Venetian banking and politics in subsequent European history during the Reformation and Counter-Reformation, and the period up to the English “Glorious Revolution”:

> Why are the British liberal imperialists called the Venetian Party? Well, for one thing, they call themselves the Venetian Party. The future prime minister Benjamin Disraeli will write in his novel Conningsby that the Whig aristocrats of 1688 wanted “to establish in England a high aristocratic republic on the model of Venice, making the kings into doges, and with a ‘Venetian constitution.’”
> During the War of the League of Cambria of 1509-17, an alliance of virtually every power in Europe threatened to wipe out the Venetian oligarchy. The Venetians knew that France or Spain could crush them like so many flies. The Venetians responded by launching the Protestant Reformation with three proto-stooges — Luther, Calvin, and Henry VIII. At the same time, (Cardinal) Contarini and his Jesuits made Aristotle a central component of the Catholic Counter-Reformation and the Council of Trent, and put Dante and Piccolomini on the Index of Prohibited Books. The result was a century and a half of wars of religion, and a “little dark age,” culminating in the Great Crisis of the seventeenth century.
> Veince was a cancer consciously planning its own metastasis. From their lagoon, the Venetians chose a swamp and an island facing the North Atlantic: Holland and the British Isles. Here the hegemonic Giovanni party would relocate their family fortunes, their fondi, and their characteristic epistemology. France was also colonized, but the main bets were placed further north. First, (Cardinal) Contarini’s relative and neighbor Francesco Zorzi was sent to serve as a sex advisor to Henry VIII, whose raging libido would be the key to Venetian hopes. Zorzi brought Rosicrucian > mysticism and Freemasonry to a land that Venetian bankers had been looting for centuries….483

Reading between the lines, one notes again the familiar and shadowy pattern of the ancient bullion brokers’ alliance with the temple, in this case, the temple of Renaissance Catholicism and nascent Protestantism, for one and the same financial power is behind both, and manipulating a conflict for its own profit. More importantly, one notes another sinister and familiar pattern, that of David Rockefeller’s “republic” of a global elite of intellectuals and bankers at the apex of a pyramid of power.

B. THE MYTH OF THE ROTHSCHILD DESCENT FROM NIMROD: A SECOND LOOK

All this provides an interesting context in which to view the allegations that the Rothschild dynasty secretly traces its family origins back to Nimrod, the conqueror of the Old Testament closely associated with the Tower of Babel incident.[484] The careful reader will have observed throughout this and preceding chapters that there are at least three different types of historical continuity operating:

1. The alleged continuity of a bloodline or family, as is alleged for the Rothschilds and their secret family descent from Nimrod, and hence, from the Babylonian “bullion brokers”;
2. The continuity of methods: alliance with and operation through the temple, cultivation of science and suppression of certain scientific and technological advancement, the promotion of the facsimile of money as circulating privately-created debt, and the policy of such families to intermarry within their own class and, in some cases, their own bloodlines; and,
3. The continuity of class, culture, family fortunes, and even — in the obvious descent of Venetian banking from the Oriental stock of slaves imported to Rome — of ethnic stock.

Viewing this list, it is evident that so far as the Rothschild Nimrod allegation is concerned, there is a broad corroboration of the pattern as is evident from points 2 and 3. But is there anything more specific that would tend to corroborate point 1, or at least, suggest that it might be true?

Indeed there is.

The famous register of nobility in Britain, Burkes’ Peerage, records numerous instances of members of the European Rothschild clan marrying each other. For example, it records that Evelina de Rothschild, daughter of Lionel Nathan Baron de Rothschild and Charlotte de Rothschild, married Ferdinand James Anselm Rothschild, who was the son of Anselm Salomon Rothschild and Charlotte Rothschild.[485] Salomon Albert Anselm

Rothschild was son of Anselm Salomon and Charlotte Rothschild, and married Bettina Caroline de Rothschild, daughter of Mayer Alphonse de Rothschild and Leonora de Rothschild.[486]

But interestingly enough, in the midst of this consanguineous interbreeding warren, Alphonse Mayer Rothschild and Clarice Sebag-Montefiore had a son, born in 1922, to whom they gave the peculiarly Jewish-Christian-"Babylonian" name of Albert Anselm Salomon Nimrod Rothschild.[487] The child died only 16 years later, in 1938.

Of course, one male heir in all of the proliferating Rothschild warren is hardly conclusive, but it is suggestive that the name had some significance for the clan known only to itself. But there is something else that suggests that the allegation must be taken seriously. Among the banking clan's vast financial network, there is one financial group that raises the eyebrows, and this is the "Rothschild Nemrod Diversified Holdings" group.[488] The name "Nemrod" is of course yet another phoneticization of the name "Nimrod," since the biblical character's name, in ancient Hebrew, was written without vowels as simply NMRD. It can thus be phoneticized as Nimrod, Nimrud, Nemrod, Nemrud, and so on. The use of the biblical conqueror's name for a mutual fund investment group thus connotes aggressiveness, risk-taking, and an intention to dominate and conquer (by financial means, of course).

By why the evident obsession of such families — witness the Rothschild dynasty — with marrying distant relatives and members of their own clans and classes? The answer to that question requires a closer look at human DNA, at its own remarkable connections to sacred geometries and the alchemical physics of the medium, and at the family tree of Nimrod himself.

C. HUMAN DNA AND THE HERMETIC CODE

1. The I Ching

Ancient esoteric doctrine held that mankind was a "microcosm," a "little universe" who mirrored in his very constitution — i.e. his size, shape, makeup, and most importantly, in his unique combination of a corporeal component (a body) and a spiritual, or if one prefers, "hyper-dimensional," component (his soul and personhood[489]) — the larger universe.[490] British researcher Michael Hayes, taking this doctrine seriously, decided to examine it more closely, and as a result, found a breathtaking connection between the code of sacred geometry and the fascination with certain numbers, and human DNA.

> In order to give myself a kind of visual aid, an image of the code in action, I had drawn up a diagram incorporating the key numbers of the biochemical components involved in the process. These were 4, 3, 64, and 22. That is, there are four kinds of chemical bases. It takes three of them to make what is known as a triplet codon, an amino acid template, of which there are exactly sixty-four variations. Each of these codons correspond to one or another of twenty-two more complex components, namely, the twenty amino acids and the two coded instructions for starting and stopping the process of synthesis. In my diagram, the number 64, the number of triplet-codon combinations (4 x 4 x 4), was represented by a square grid, eight divisions across and eight down, like a chessboard.[491]

Once he had done this, however, Hayes noticed a very odd and striking connection to one of esotericism's oldest systems of divination — the Chinese I Ching: "I realized, in fact, that the whole diagram echoed the format of the famous Chinese work known as the I Ching (Yi King), whose sixty-four basic texts are each identified with a six-line symbol called a hexagram."[492]

But how does Hayes' table and its numbers of 4, 3, 64, and 22, resemble the I Ching in particular, and the Hermetic Code of sacred geometry in general? Hayes explains:

> The I Ching….was intended for use as an oracle: you pose a question, toss three coins, and note the way they fall. A preponderance of heads gives an unbroken line — “yang,” positive; tails a broken line, “yin,” negative….

The results are written down as a solid or dashed line.

> Repeat the action six times and you have called up one of the hexagrams. The accompanying text supplies your answer.493

In other words, repeating the action six times and writing down each result — a broken or solid line — one above another will produce a picture of solid and broken lines (of which there are only 64 possible results). The pictogram or hexagram is then looked up in a book which has a text explaining the divinatory properties of each hexagram.

But where do the other numbers — 4, 3, and 22 — fit into this pattern?

> Let’s begin with the number 4, the number of fundamental chemical bases in the genetic code (adenine, thymine, guanine, and cytosine) upon which the whole process of amino-acid synthesis depends. The I Ching, I discovered, embodies exactly the same principle. The sixty-four hexagrams are actually constructed from four, basic, two-line symbols known as the Hsiang. These in turn were derived from the two fundamental lines, one broken and one unbroken, known respectively as yin and yang.
> Next, the number 3. The genetic code, as was evident, obeyed the law of three forces, which is why only triplet codons are evident in the process of creation. The three forces are inititially represented in the Book of Changes by the two original yin (negative, female), yang (positive, male) and neutral, the third, invisible, or “mystical” ingredient: the tao….494

Hayes recalls his reaction to this discovery:

> By this time, having recognized so many similarities between the I Ching and the genetic code, I was convinced that I was on to something of profound importance, and my emotional state > reflected this: I was highly charged. No way, I thought, could the identical features of these two apparently disparate systems be the product of mere coincidence, for they were not only identical in structure, it seemed that they each had a common purpose, which was to facilitate the process of evolution.[495]

So far, so good.

But what about the number 22? Was there some correspondence between the I Ching and DNA involving this number? Hayes puts the problem this way:

> Now these hexagrams, as I said earlier, just like the biochemical hexagrams of the genetic code, each consist of two trigrams, two three-line symbols, one above, one below. The trigrams, eight in number, were derived from the four Hsiang, by successively placing over each of them the two original broken and unbroken lines. When these same two lines are placed over the eight trigrams, the result is sixteen figures of four lines. Repeat the process once again and you get thirty-two figures of five lines, and a final similar movement produces the sixty-four hexagrams.
> Unlike the four- and five-line figures, the eight trigrams, known as the kua, are given particular prominence in the system. I mused over these for a long time, juggling with their numbers. Eight threes. Three eights. Twenty-four. I needed twenty-two. Close, but not close enough. Certainly the number 8 was an integral part of the overall symmetry, being the square root of that magical 64; but why did the sum of the trigrams not conform to the twenty-two codon signals of the genetic code? Why twenty-four? Why eight? [496]

The answer came when Hayes recalled that the numbers 4, 3, 64, 8 and 22 were significant components to the Hermetic Code and sacred geometries of the West, and more particularly, had a direct connection to music.

The number 22 was a key number of the Pythagorean system “principally because of its musical aspect.”[497] What it represented was in fact “three octaves of vibrations, or notes, three sets of eight — twenty-four components."498 But where does 22 come in?

The answer is very simple. If one sits at a keyboard instrument, and begins with the note "C," and goes upward eight notes using only the white keys, one will arrive back at "C" an octave higher, exactly eight notes later. Repeat the process again, and at the sixteenth note above the original, one arrives back at "C," and again a third time, and one arrives back on the twenty-fourth note, which is once again "C." But since two of these "C"s are but repetitions of the original "C," one might think of the three octaves as embodying the number 22, as well as 24.499

The implications of this were enormous, and Hayes was quick to perceive what they were:

> From that time onward, the summer of 1984, I spent several years exploring the mazelike annals of history. I automatically assumed that, if the Chinese and the Greeks were "tuned in" to this ancient science… then it was probably that so were some of the other traditions and civilizations…. As it turned out, the evidence was overwhelming. Everywhere I looked I saw musical symbols beaming back at me: every known major religion and esoteric tradition in recorded history had embraced this science…. Here in fact, was the missing common factor I had long felt existed, that magical ingredient that had given religious movements the power to affect the minds and hearts of billions in such a profound and extraordinary way. They were all unerringly based on the principle of harmony, a harmony that it echoed in, literally, every single cell of our bodies, in our DNA and in the genetic code. This is, therefore, a natural harmony…500

In other words, the numbers of the Hermetic Code or Sacred Geometry appeared to be a legacy of a long-lost civilization, predating all the high civilizations of the classical era — the Sumerian, the Egyptian, the Mesopotamian, the Chinese — and the essence of that code was not only musical, but genetic. It was, as Hayes concluded, a "natural harmony," and DNA itself was a natural resonator and transducer of it.

But with the idea that it represents a “natural harmony,” one also encounters yet another problem, a problem which reveals exactly how extraordinarily sophisticated the ancient Hermetic Code actually was. As I noted in my first book on alternative science and history, The Giza Death Star, the naturally occurring harmonic series is not what one encounters on a keyboard. To see what the problem is, we have to perform a simple experiment to demonstrate what physicists (and musicians!) know as the harmonic series.

Let us imagine one is sitting at the keyboard of an acoustic piano. Press down the note “C” silently with one hand, then strike the same note “C” an octave or two lower with the other hand. One will hear the open strings of the silently pressed note “C” vibrating sympathetically with the silently pressed note. This “Octave” is called the first harmonic or “overtone” of the fundamental “C” (the struck note). Now, repeat the experiment, only this time, press down the note “G” silently, but strike the note “C” an octave or two below it. Again, one will hear the note “G” vibrating sympathetically with the struck “C.” G is the second overtone or harmonic of the fundamental “C,” and, one notes that the interval has decreased, “G” being what musicians know as the interval of the fifth from C (counting up five notes from C, with C as “1,” gives G as the fifth). If one keeps repeating the experiment, with the intervals growing smaller and smaller, then the next overtone will be a fourth up from G, which is another “C.” The next interval is a major third, the note “E,” then the next interval is a minor third, the note “G.” But now we encounter the problem, for the next interval, which occurs naturally, is not present on the keyboard, for it is the interval between the minor third and the major second, or in other words a note lying between B flat and A natural, or lying “in the cracks” on the keyboard between those two notes.

This interval was known to the ancients, and in fact is called the “Pythagorean Comma,” for the Pythagoreans were well aware of it. Yet, as Hayes has pointed out, the analogy between ancient esoteric schools and modern science only works on a modern keyboard. So what's going on here?

Briefly — and a thorough explanation of this relationship would require a book in its own right — what happened within Western music, precisely as a result of the rediscovery of the esoteric tradition during the Renaissance, was that that tradition was applied to music and to the tuning of musical instruments, particularly keyboards, so that the naturally occurring harmonic series was deliberately tampered with, and a slight mathematical adjustment was made to the notes of the musical scale, so that each note was exactly an equal interval apart, allowing all notes to function as overtones of all other notes, and thus allowing a piece of music to change keys during a piece to the most distant keys without having to stop and retune the whole instrument! This "tampered keyboard" ushered in the era of modern Western music, beginning with Vivaldi, Scarlatti, Rameau and J.S. Bach, who even celebrated its arrival by composing a piece of music called The Well-Tempered Clavier, or to put it bluntly, "The Well-TAMPERED-WITH Keyboard." Rather than each note now having its own unique harmonic series which did not overlap with other notes, each note now could function as any harmonic of any other note. This, and not Maxwell's electromagnetic theory, was the first unification in physics, for now, rather than an infinite number of "notes" each with their own unique harmonic series, one had only 12 notes, each of which could function as harmonics of all the others. The modern system of music had originated, in other words, with a slight adjustment in the system of measurement of musical intervals.

This little musical detour now exhibits a profound implication, for what it really implies is that the ancients knew of this musical system, and, moreover, knew that it held some connection to DNA itself. This is a profound indicator that the esoteric and Hermetic Code is a legacy of a very sophisticated scientific, and musical, culture.

Hayes is quick to appreciate the implications of these considerations in terms of modern quantum mechanics and its view of quantum reality as being a non-local, interconnected universe. Not surprisingly, the physicist whom he chooses as an example to illustrate this harmonic interconnectedness of systems in a very deep, non-local hyper-dimensional reality, is David Bohm!

> In an attempt to explain the principle of nonlocality and the idea of a vast web of interconnectedness permeating the whole universe, the University of London physicist David Bohm posited the existence of what he called quantum potential. He saw this as a new kind of energy field that, like gravity, pervades the whole universe, but whose influence does not weaken with distance.
> Bohm first recognized a possible indication of this quantum potential through his work on plasmas, gases comprising a high density of electrons and positive ions (atoms with a positive charge). He noticed that the electrons, once they were in plasma, began to act in concert, as if they were all part of a greater, interconnected whole. For example, if any impurities were present in the plasma, it would always realign itself and trap all foreign bodies in an exclusion zone — just as a living organism might encase poison in a boil. Bohm observed also a similar, orchestrated mass movement of electrons in metals and superconductors, with each one acting as if it "knew" what countless billions of others were about to do. According to Bohm, particles act in this way through the influence of the quantum potential, a subquantum force matrix that somehow coordinates the movement of the whole.
> It appears that when plasmas are rejecting impure substances and regenerating themselves, they look very similar to swirling masses of well-organized protoplasm. This curious "organic" quality led Bohm to comment that he often had the impression that the electron sea was, in a sense, "alive." He possibly did not intend this to be taken too literally, that the electron mass was living in the same way as an amoeba, but the evident highly coordinated symmetries of the plasma convinced him that the electrons were responding to one of many "intelligent" orders implicit in the fabric of the universe.501

Hayes comments on these observations and their implications, drawing attention to the "interlocking" nature of all phenomena via the property of resonance:

> The whole universe is perpetually in motion and all wave/particles are continuously interacting and separating, which means that the nonlocal aspect of quantum systems in a general characteristic of nature. Clearly this represents, in the physical world, a harmony of the highest possible order. It is one thing to say that the universe is a harmonious entity because it is constructed entirely upon the eightfold chromodynamic and atomic matrices, but nonlocality suggests that there exists a far deeper interconnecting harmony underlying all physical phenomena, where everything is resonating at the very same subquantum frequency, everything is "in tune" with every other thing,[502] exactly as if it were one of the "notes" on a well-tempered cosmic keyboard, functioning as an overtone to all other notes in a vast and interconnected harmonic series.

And here, DNA enters the picture, for as Hayes has demonstrated, DNA would appear to be, in some sense, a "well-tempered" clavier for the whole system, or, exactly as the ancients understood mankind, a "microcosm." But is there any correlation between modern science and this ancient esoteric doctrine?

Indeed there is.

In my book The Philosophers' Stone: Alchemy and the Secret Research for Exotic Matter, I referred to a scientific paper by Freeman W. Cope entitled "Evidence from Activation Energies for Super-Conductive Tunneling in Biological Systems at Physiological Temperatures," a title guaranteed to make the eyes glaze over, unless one considers the profound implications hidden behind the dull scientific prose. But first, the dull scientific prose:

> In the present paper, evidence for another class of solid-state biological process is given. It is suggested that single-electron tunneling between superconductive regions may rate-limit various nerve and growth processes. This implies that micro-regions of > superconductivity exist in cells at physiological temperatures, which supports theoretical predictions of high temperature organic superconduction.

> Superconduction is the passage of electron current without generation of heat and hence with zero electrical resistance. Such behavior has been observed only in inorganic materials and only at temperatures below approximately 20°K, although theory predicts that superconduction might occur in organic materials at room temperatures. The conduction of electrons across interfaces between adjacent superconductive layers behaves differently from current across ordinary solid junctions. Electron-tunneling currents across interfaces between superconductive layers or regions have been predicted and demonstrated to have a particular form of temperature dependence…
> …Little…has suggested DNA as the sort of biological molecule along which electrons might superconduct…[503]

In The Philosophers' Stone, my focus was on the enormous implications of DNA superconductivity, but here, our interest is on the other aspect of the phenomenon noticed by Cope: electron tunneling.

The quantum tunneling phenomenon may be briefly understood by an illustration of what actually happens in quantum tunneling. Imagine one has an impermeable and impenetrable barrier, such as the wall of a biological cell, or a thick wall between two rooms, or even imagine the barrier as being the medium of space-time itself. Now, imagine a packet of waves approaching this barrier, like the interference pattern of two radar beams being bounced off the barrier and reflected back to the radar sets that generated the packet. But according to the wave equations of quantum mechanics, at the exact moment that this packet hits the barrier and is reflected back to the sets, a faint "echo" of that oncoming wave packet actually emerges on the other side of the barrier at the same instant, and travels away from the barrier; in short, the oncoming signal "tunnels" through the barrier — in almost wormhole-like fashion — and its "echo" emerges on the other side and travels away from the barrier, 180 degrees opposite of the reflected signal traveling back to our radar sets. And, as Cope notes in the section of the article cited above, DNA acts as exactly the sort of organic molecule that is able to accomplish this feat! It is as if an organic life form was a complex system being held together by superconductivity and quantum tunneling, a vast biological "non-local network" of tunneling nerve impulses. If so, then this might explain the basis of paranormal phenomena such as remote viewing, for DNA as such would interact directly with the information content within the field of the local physical medium.[504]

With this, then, we have the final component of that ancient technology and science — the genetic and biological — and with it, we return once again to the banksters, and why they seem inordinately interested in learning its secrets.

D. THE ANCIENT CONTACT: THE ROTHSCHILD NIMROD MYTH IN A WIDER CONTEXT

If DNA is such a resonator and transducer of the information content in the local field of the physical medium, it stands to reason that some specific genotypes will be more efficient resonators of it than others. We are told in countless ancient texts, from the Bible to the Sumerian epics to the Hindu epics of India to the legends of the Japanese “Yamato” peoples to the legends of Mesoamerican Indians, that at some point of time lost in the mists of “prehistory,” the “gods” came down and mingled with men, siring children of human women. In many of these legends, moreover, these ancient “civilizing gods” were self-evidently white Caucasians; again, this is a common feature of such myths from Mesoamerica, to the South American Incans, and even ancient Japanese legends.

Whatever the truthfulness of these claims might be, we have seen that, since ancient times, an international banking class has consistently aligned itself with the temple, both with a view to giving their financial activities the sanction of the probity of the temple and thereby cloaking their actions, but also with a view to accessing the residues of that lost science and technology and potentially reconstructing and reconstituting it. And one such component, since the times of ancient Sumer and Babylonia, is surely their Sumerian epics’ insistence that at least some of humanity descends from such “divine” ancestors and their intermarriages with humans. And given the laws of genetics, it is possible that, with a broad enough database, the outlines of such a genetic intermingling might eventually be discovered.

Such a database is, finally, within modern man’s grasp, with the Human Genome Project. While many researchers point out the obvious and deadly potential that such a project entails for the design and engineering of race-specific bio-weapons, I am bold to suggest that there might be yet another hidden purpose, namely, to find and isolate those genotypes within humanity that point to a possible “extraterrestrial” connection. Again, the myth of the Rothschild descent from Nimrod — himself a product of such intermarriages if one consults the Sumerian records — suggests that one such banking dynasty is aware of this connection.

And indeed, as researchers Glen Yeadon and John Hawkins have noted, there is a deep connection between the Human Genome Project and the hidden hand of the Anglo-American international bankster class, and a deeper connection to the American eugenics movement with its own white-supremacist overtones:

> Currently, [the Cold Spring Harbor Laboratory] is a leader in the human genome project. While the genome project will undoubtedly provide many future medical benefits, it could equally provide weapons of mass destruction, such as bioweapons or even more evil genome-specific bioweapons. The Project for the New American Century [PNAC] describes genome-specific weapons as politically useful tools. PNAC serves as the blueprint for the George W. Bush administration, with many members closely associated with PNAC.
> With the Bush administration's disregard for human rights and the ban on nuclear testing, it is cause for alarm to find Cold Spring Harbor firmly controlled by the same families involved in the American eugenics movement. Current directors William Gerry and Allen Dulles Jebsen are the grandsons of Averill Harriman and Allen Dulles, respectively. When such policies and organizations slip under the control of families like the Bushes and Rockefellers they can be used as modern-day weapons of genocide.[505]

While the close association of "the same old families" with the genome project is a cause of concern, and for the same reasons Yeadon and Hawkins suggest, within the wider context of this book the close association of these families with the project calls forth concern for more than the reason they elicit, for it would appear that, once again, these families are trying their best, through all the vast network of foundations, grants, corporations and other fronts at their disposal, to learn and reconstruct as much of that ancient science, and perhaps of their own family history, as possible.

With DNA, we have the last component of the physics puzzle, the other pieces being, as was seen, the data of recurrent economic cycles, the peculiar correspondence of astrological alignments with economic depressions, the idea of a deep connection between the physics of the medium and the false alchemy of the banksters. We have seen the persistent efforts of some nations to free themselves from the influence of that class, and, in Nazi Germany's case, the attempt also to crash develop the paradigms of a new — and very old — physics. We have seen the persistent association of the banksters with religion, with the temple, and in turn, the persistent association of the ancient temple with astronomical alignments, with positioning on a global grid, and with the peculiar incorporation of "scalar physics" into the very design and dimensions of ancient temples.

So now, it is time to assemble the pieces together, and explain what's going on, and to offer a speculative explanation of why it's going on…

THE BANKSTERS’ REAL BUSINESS THE PATTERN OF WAR, SCARCITY, SUPPRESSION, SLAVERY AND MONOPOLIZATION

> “In the course of the next several decades, a functioning structure of global cooperation, based on geopolitical realities, could thus emerge and gradually assume the mantle of the world’s current “regent,” which has for the time being assumed the burden of responsibility for world stability and peace. Geostrategic success in that cause would represent a fitting legacy of America’s role as the first, only, and last truly global superpower.”
> — Zbigniew Brzezinski[506]

The fact that so many ancient temples heretofore surveyed show evidence not only of a profound association with the stars through their astrological alignments, and with the physics of the medium through their incorporation of sacred geometries and their location on an “earth grid” over nodal points of standing waves within local space, but also with international banking through the prominent association of moneychangers with those temples, is an indicator that at a deep and profound level — perhaps as a legacy of the Very High Civilization from which they sprang — these classical civilizations through their marriage of banking and astrology preserved the dim memory of a lost science that unified physics, economics, and finance.

A. THE HISTORICAL PATTERNS OF SUPPRESSION

Moreover, we have presented evidence that this class existed in more or less unbroken continuity, both racially and ethnically, and, in terms of the methods and policies it has pursued throughout history. Additionally, suggestive allegations were presented that at least one member family of this class — the Rothschilds — trace their lineage directly back to one of the Sumerian elite, Nimrod.

In this, at least the methods surveyed have been consistent:

1. The basic methodology of the banksters, both in ancient and in modern times, has been to substitute one notion of money for another, and thereby to usurp the power of the state to create and issue money and substitute a private monopoly for its creation. In the former instance, the idea of money is that of a receipt for goods and services on the productive output of the state itself. In other words, money is “real” money and is a unit of information, of exchange, based on the creative activity of a whole state. It is thus issued by the state itself, and free of any interest-bearing debt. In the latter case, money is “false” money, or what we have called a *facsimile o*f money, issued by a private monopoly and bearing debt interest, and circulated as money. The facsimile of money, in other words, is a debt-bearing note, and debt, under such a system, can only increase and never be repaid. In the first instance, it is to be noted, money represents the creation of information, i.e., units of exchange, issued in proportion to the productive output of a state, and as such, the unit of exchange represents real information in the physical world. In this instance, the connection between finance and physics is direct and overt, and easily perceived. It is therefore an analogue of the actual alchemical and transmutative properties, ultimately, of the physical medium itself. In the second instance, however, money represents almost the exact opposite, since it represents not production but an interest-bearing debt, a kind of “negative information” that can only and must inevitably grow at a rate exponentially faster than the productive output of the state. It bears, in other words, no relation to physical reality. It is a kind of false alchemy, a financial black hole into which the productive output of a state is inevitably sucked, and from which it can never emerge, unless the very underlying idea of the facsimile of money is clearly repudiated and rejected. The system of the facsimile of money is, in other words, deliberately designed to enhance and enrich only those who control its issuance, and can never serve the broader public good because it is not designed to do so.

a. In the methods pursued to replace money by the facsimile of money, the bankster class, as we have seen, has invariably and throughout the centuries consistently followed a well-worn playbook, namely, the creation or counterfeiting of the real money of a state to undermine public confidence in it, or, in some cases, it has purchased the state's money issuance and taken it out of circulation, leaving only its own debt-bearing notes to circulate as a medium of exchange.

b. As we have seen from the historical examples presented in preceding pages, whenever a leader or a state has attempted to reject the principle of the facsimile of money, the international bankster class has mobilized those states it does control through that practice to make war against such "breakaway" states, or alternatively, the leaders of states advocating such policies of return to state-issued money as credit, are curiously murdered with a consistency that belies mere coincidence. In this respect, the following exemplars were mentioned in previous pages

1. In modern times:

a. The manipulation of the collapse of the issuances of the Continental Congress during the 1780s by a return to the "gold" or "bullion" standard, which greatly contracted the American money supply, causing a depression, during a period when planetary alignments always seem to suggest economic collapse or contraction;

b. The assassination of President Abraham Lincoln for issuing debt-free Greenbacks to finance the northern effort during the American War Between the States, and the subsequent National currency act following a similar manipulated depression, which itself occurred during similar planetary alignments;

c. The assassination of President James Garfield mere months into his presidency, after he had suggested his willingness to return to state-created and -issued debt-free money;

d. The manipulation of the American money supply prior to and during the Great Depression, first by vastly expanding credit, and then by vastly contracting the money supply, again at a juncture when planetary alignments indicated economic turmoil, and, as was seen, when Commerce Department data supplied by Edward Dewey indicated an inevitable cyclic downturn.

e. Some researchers, as was seen in the previous pages, implied that the war against Nazi Germany had a secret purpose, for the banking elite of the West, having aided Adolf Hitler’s and the Nazis’ rise to power, were quickly alarmed by Nazi Germany’s deliberate moves to restore state-issued debt-free money and by her efforts to explore alternative paradigms of physics that would lead to her energy independence and self-sufficiency;

f. Finally, and as many researchers have noted, President John F. Kennedy was murdered a mere five months after his issuance of an executive order authorizing the U.S. Treasury to print $4,000,000,000 worth of debt-free United States Notes, bypassing the privately owned and controlled Federal Reserve Bank completely.

2. Similarly, in ancient times, the following was noted:

a. the policies of Rome vis-à-vis its trading partners in the East regarding the value of gold and silver bullion strongly indicated manipulation at both ends of the trading routes, manipulation ultimately favorable to any class controlling bullion supplies;

b. Similar policies of issuance of false receipts or counterfeits of government currencies were noted, with the ultimate issuance of debt-bearing bullion-backed notes of debt by a private monopoly, particularly in the case of ancient Babylonia.

c. In the case of Sparta, it was also noted that it alone of all the ancient Greek city-states resisted this financial policy, a fact which led ultimately to the Peloponnesian War and to the eventual succumbing of Sparta to these policies and the class behind them.

2) Similarly, both in ancient times and in modern ones, we have noted a persistent association of the banking class with the following things:

a. In ancient times, with religion, i.e., the temple. The temple, in ancient times, was in turn associated with the following things:

1. With astronomy and astrology, i.e., with the “science” of forecasting human events;

2. With sacred geometries, embodied both in the dimensions of the structure, and in their placements and alignments on an earth grid;

3. With the issuance of money, both in the forms of real money, and its facsimile as interest-bearing debt;

4. With slavery.

b. In modern times, with not only religion, but with science and scientists determined to break out of the paradigm of energy scarcity being based on non-renewable resources, and who were seeking to develop new physics paradigms, with new energy technologies.

c. And in modern times, we saw evidence of corporate and banking interest in the vast database indicating a correlation and correspondence between economic cycles, and cycles of purely physical activity, cycles that, in Dewey’s estimation, were inevitable because they were due to deeper underlying physical reasons and not simply the result of policy or aggregate human action.

But the question, highlighted in this fashion, only remains: Why are they persistently associated with these things? Why does one find banksters manipulating such drastic curtailings of money supply when both cyclic data and astrological lore would indicate that such downturns were inevitable?

The answer to these questions requires that we now assemble all the physics pieces of the puzzle, outlined in the preceding pages, into a single catalogue, determine their underlying principles, and then correlate these with the above patterns of bankster activities and policies. Only then does the disturbing answer and picture of their motivations and possible agenda emerge.

B. THE PHYSICS, THE FINANCIAL ALCHEMY, AND THE BANKSTERS

1. Assembling the Pieces

Looking back over the assembled physics and financial data of previous chapters, the following salient features emerge:

1. According to Dewey and Dakin and the Foundation for the Study of Cycles, economic activity occurs in cycles of boom and bust, and these cycles are exact analogues to physical longitudinal waves of sound, i.e., of compression and rarefaction. As such, these cycles are in a certain sense inevitable and impervious to human action, but the overall downward and upward trend of a cycle can be dampened or exacerbated by human policy and activity;

2. Dewey and Dakin also posit that a deeper physics may lie behind such economic cycles, a fact loosely corroborated by Nelson's study of the variations in radio signal propagation and planetary alignments, and by Gover's study of American depressions which seem to occur near astrological alignments called grand crosses. It was also noted that the grand cross pattern mentioned by Gover also closely corresponded to the type of planetary alignments noted by Nelson in his RCA study;

3. All of this was further corroborated by the Global Scaling Theory of Dr. Harmut Müller, who noticed that physical objects themselves — including human social and demographic activity — clustered around certain nodal points of standing waves in logarithmic space. Müller went on to posit that these nodal points may indicate a real physics of the physical medium, i.e., that such clustering was due to the interference of longitudinal waves in the physical medium itself. On this view, Müller's theory is very close to the views of ancient alchemy which posits that the physical medium is a transmutative medium, creating information in its differentiations which in turn become the physical objects of creation. As was noted, Müller's theory came to the attention of the German Institute for Space Energy Research, which applied his theories to note the deep physics behind human social action and organization;

4. Similar views of matter as a template or interference pattern of such waves were expressed by quantum and plasma physicist David Bohm;

5. Since in these views matter is the result of a template or interference pattern of such waves in the medium, large masses such as planets and stars are natural resonators of such waves. Stars in particular are resonators of such waves, since, as rotating balls of plasma (which in turn, according to David Bohm, exhibit phenomena of “self-organization” and response to the “intelligent” instructions of the physical medium) they act as efficient natural resonators of the medium. As Richard C. Hoagland noted, it appears that the ancient societies, with their emphasis on stars as “portals” or “gates” to higher dimensions, preserved a legacy of this deep physics;

6. As natural resonators of these standing waves in the medium, it was also noted that planets set up within themselves a gridwork or template of such wave interference patterns on their surfaces, which, it was posited, may be the physical basis for the evidence of an “earth grid,” and of the placement of ancient sites and temples over these nodal points. A similar claim was made by Tesla for his wireless transmission of power facility on Long Island called Wardenclyffe. According to Tesla, in order for his system to work, it was necessary for it to “grip the earth”;

7. As Dr. Konstantin Meyl also noted, many such temples themselves appear to be constructed in their dimensions to be natural resonators of such waves. Meyl posited that such temples actually functioned as a means of instantaneous radio communications by means of scalar waves, using the sensitive membranes of slaughtered animals to register and measure the pulses of such waves; and finally,

8. As noted by British researcher Hayes, DNA appears to be designed along the same lines and principles of sacred geometry and the hermetic code. As such, DNA itself would seem to be a natural resonator of such waves.

2. The Underlying Principle

Examining each of these eight points, an obvious underlying physical principle of action is implied, which may be reduced to three components:

> 1. All action within the physical medium of space-time itself is constituted of longitudinal waves of compression and rarefaction within it;
> 2. These in turn give rise to matter, which in the form of planets and more importantly, stars (or rotating plasma), are natural transducers of such waves; and,
> 3. A system of such masses — i.e., a solar system — will, in its constantly changing dynamics, both resonate to and in turn give off an ever-changing dynamic and interference pattern or template of such waves, forming, perhaps, the ultimate and now lost scientific basis of astrology. In this, since DNA would seem to be a natural resonator of such interference patterns or templates, through long process of observation — the precise claim made for astrology in ancient Sumeria — it may have been possible to predict human response, via DNA, to such patterns in the aggregate, as Dewey and Dakin suggested, and as the influx of physicists with their analytical methods into economics and finance in the latter half of the twentieth century implies.[507]

a. The Reasons for the Banksters' Ancient Associations with the Temple

We are now, at last, in a position to see why at least in ancient times one finds the persistent pattern of the presence of "bullion brokers" or "banksters" with the temple, for with the astrological and oracular preoccupations of those temples, this would give such a class immediate access to

> 1. prediction, i.e., advance knowledge of cycles of human activity and emotional responses;

2. communication, for if Meyl's hypothesis should be borne out by subsequent scientific investigation and experiment, access to the temple would have given them access to a means of virtually instantaneous communication across a great part of the world's surface;

3. This in turn would have thus afforded them a means to concerted and coordinated activity and social manipulation, a coordination we saw was strongly suggested by the bullion policies of ancient Rome vis-à-vis the Far East; and finally,

4. If one assumes the truthfulness of the scenario of an ancient and cosmic war outlined at the beginning of chapter one, access to the residues of this lost science via a close association with the ancient temple would have also given the banksters the means, ultimately, to recover and reconstruct the technologies of hegemony and mass destruction that are implied by that scenario, technologies which in turn are based on exactly the same type or paradigm of physics.

It will be evident from the foregoing list that this pattern has persisted into modern times; witness only the close association of Morgan with Tesla, and Morgan's eventual suppression of Tesla. There are countless other such examples, of course: ITT's suppression of Philo Farnsworth's successful plasma fusion experiments, the suppression of Dr. Ronald Richter's "fusion" experiments in Argentina,[508] and on and on the list could go. The same pattern holds, as well, during the "interim" period between ancient and modern times, for during that period, one finds the persistent interest of the royal houses in Europe in alchemy, the ability to transmute base metals into gold. The reasons are now evident, for the private issuance of the facsimile of money as an interest-bearing debt note took from them the most ancient prerogative of governments and kings: the issuance of debt-free money on the productive output of the state.

The motivations are clear enough from the physics, for at one and the same time the banksters were trying to recover that ancient physics, and with it, the genuine financial alchemy of state-created money. The banksters, for their part, are also found during the interim period, and at both the modern and ancient poles of the story, resorting to a kind of false alchemy of debt, a kind of “negative financial information,” while they are simultaneously and very quietly funding certain scientists who hold the promise of unlocking that ancient physics. Witness only Isaac Newton’s preoccupations with alchemy, his membership in the Masonically controlled and inspired Royal Society, and the close connection of all these parties with the Dutch bankers that quietly and quickly assumed control of England’s money.[509]

3. The Possible Agenda

The careful reader will have noticed an immediate implication of the previous considerations, and that is that, as far back as ancient times, the persistent agenda of the bankster class, the international “bullion brokers,” has been coordinated action that aimed at a global reach, with ever larger and larger empires being created, provoking ever more wars, and ever more business for themselves. And thus we end where we began, in modern times, and the persistent and consistent evidence that this class is truly after a global hegemony. As David Astle pointed out and as was reviewed in chapter five, this hegemony quickly, and very early in its history, realized that all ancient pantheons and myths were more or less identical, and thus that religion itself not only held profound clues to the reconstruction of the lost science they sought to recover, but that it could function as a powerful tool of social manipulation to assist in that agenda. Not for nothing does one find a Rockefeller dynasty supporting the work and agenda of the World Council of Churches from its inception, or of various seminaries with a “suitable” social agenda, nor a Rothschild dynasty sponsoring various similar work. In this, “monotheism” really masks as a front for their own designs, with the claims of the three great monotheistic religions — Christianity, Judaism, and Islam — seemingly tailor-made for the manipulation and exploitation of conflict.

But to what end all this machination?

While many have guessed at the motivations for this vast and ancient conspiracy, no one seems to have approached anything like a final answer. I certainly cannot claim to have done so either. But an answer does suggest itself from the preceding pages, namely, that they are indeed trying to reconstruct a lost mythical past: a global “golden age” with a supremely sophisticated science with which they can dominate and subjugate the earth. But to reconstruct it, on the scale required and implied by their enterprise itself, will require that virtually the entire planet and its resources must be at their disposal.

What they intend to do after that is beyond the scope and purpose of this essay, but an answer does suggest itself, for if, as was seen, at least one of these banking dynasties — the Rothschilds — are alleged to trace their lineage back to Nimrod, half-human half-divine offspring of the "gods" who once descended to earth and sired children of human mothers, then perhaps they seek, ultimately, to return to the stars.

But….

…tracing that lineage, and that motivation, is a whole other story…

For this story, however, the lesson is clear: the false alchemy of the banksters and their issuance of the facsimile of money can only mean that money is based on scarcity and debt, on non-renewable energy sources, and on a paradigm of physics and energy, and a system that must ultimately consume itself in endless slavery and wars.

It is high time to have done with them.

Ibid. P2 Masonry refers to the notorious Lodge Propaganda Due, led by Mason Licio Gelli, that was finally exposed by the Italian government in the 1980s. By the time the Italian authorities had shut the lodge down, it numbered over two thousand members, with deep penetration into banking, the Italian government, various Italian political parties, and the Vatican.

Many who regard the death of Pope John Paul I as suspicious think that the Pope was murdered precisely because he discovered the extent of Masonic P2 penetration of the Vatican and was determined to root it out and end it. (Q.v. David Yallop's In God's Name.) Many also suspect that the strange death of banker Roberto Calvi, hung by the neck from London's Blackfriars' Bridge, and in self-evidently Masonic fashion, was also tied to the P2 scandal. Also prominent in the Lodge were various Italian and other Fascists. Not surprisingly, Licio Gelli, its founder, fled to Argentina after the lodge was exposed.

Estulin lists U.S. Secretary of Defense William Perry, Canadian Jean Chretien, the ubiquitous and sinister Henry Kissinger, David Rockefeller, George Soros, and various Belgian, Spanish, and Dutch royalty as attendees at the 1996 meeting that attempted to break up Canada. Q.v. p. 5. Estulin gives a further list of names on pp. 28-29. The breakup of Canada was to be accomplished via the mechanism of a "unilateral declaration of independence by Quebec" which would then, following the fragmentation of Canada, be absorbed piecemeal by the U.S.A. by the year 2000 (pp. 4-5). The contempt of the Bilderbergers for the perceptions of the general populace — perceptions they help to create and manipulate by their media organs — cannot better be illustrated than by this goofy scheme, for one cannot imagine French-speaking Quebecois faring any better in a union with the U.S.A. than they have with the Dominion of Canada, and probably would fare much worse.

Abs’ easy access to West German Chancellors Konrad Adenauer, Ludwig Erhard, and Kurt Georg Kiesinger (a former member of Dr. Josef Göbbels’ Propaganda Ministry!) may account for the fact that Bormann and his Nazi International were such hot political topics for West German politicians and prosecutors. Indeed, those prosecutors often would complain of their feeling that some hidden hand was directing the West German government, and inhibiting their efforts to bring Bormann and other top Nazis to justice. Abs, given his close contact before, during, and after the war, may have indeed been the go-between between Bormann and the postwar German governments.

Yet another factor is worth considering in this respect, and that is my interpretation of the Roswell event on the basis of the internal evidence of the MJ-12 documents as having been perhaps the crash of something Nazi. (Q.v. my Reich of the Black Sun, pp. 274-330; and The SS Brotherhood of the Bell, pp. 311-384.) If this be true, then the North American Faction, through the agency of its surrogate, the U.S. government and military, had yet another clue indicating the postwar Nazi possession of this physics, and its continued development of it. As such, it had yet another impetus to seek and recover as much of the original Nazi documentation and personnel as it could, and, failing that, to embark on its own programs to acquire the physics and technology for itself.

As yet another sign that this may be the case, one should also consider the allegation of authors Richard C. Hoagland and Mike Bara in their New York Times bestseller, Dark Mission: The Secret History of NASA, wherein they present evidence that by the time of the Apollo lunar missions, the Nazi faction had become the dominant and most influential group within the Agency, competing against the other two factions: Magicians, and Masons, both groups with strong ties to the Anglo-American establishment.

On its website the Foundation for the Study of Cycles states that it is "dedicated to the interdisciplinary study of finding and analyzing recurring patterns. This includes the economy, natural and social sciences, the arts and more as more than 4,300 natural cycles have been documented with interrelated patterns." Concerning its mission it states that "Our Mission is to discover, understand and explain the true nature and origin of cycles, thereby solving the mystery of recurrent rhythmic phenomena, as has been true nature and origin of cycles, thereby solving the mystery of recurrent rhythmic phenomena, as has been observed in both the natural and social sciences." (Emphases added) By 2006, it claimed more than "2,500 members in 42 countries." (www.foundationforthestudyofcycles.org)

It is also worth pausing to mention another interesting implication of the economist of Mitsubishi being present as a Foundation member. Search as I did for the presence of similar members from large international Anglo-American or European banks, I could find none. This does not mean there aren't any, but that they may be members whose papers and membership in the Foundation are not published or known. But the presence of a Mitsubishi economist is interesting in its own right, for Oriental societies are well-known to have, from their very earliest cultural and religious origins, essentially cyclic views of history and hence of human social activity. The presence suggests, then, that they are intent upon putting empirical scientific and quantifiable data in the service of recovering the real scientific bases of these ancient cosmological views. In short, they are doing what I called paleophysics in my very first book, The Giza Death Star. (Q.v. The Giza Death Star, chapter three. The paleophysical approach to ancient texts and myths was further developed in The Giza Death Star Destroyed, chapters one through three, and in The Cosmic War: Interplanetary Warfare, Modern Physics, and Ancient Texts, chapters one through nine. This present book is intended to extend this analysis over a broader range of data.)

Kozyrev’s work, as outlined by myself and others, led directly to the kind of “precursor engineering” of causes rather than effects in the top secret research of the Soviet Union, research which has continued apace in the Russian Federation.

And this observation of course, calls to mind once again the hyper-dimensional theory of Müller’s fellow countryman Burkhardt Heim, as well as the views of English physicist E.T. Whittaker and American Tom Bearden. In Heim theory, the physical medium, or space-time itself, begins in a state of absolute entropy or equilibrium. Even in that state, however, it is quantized, with the metric of the system being expressed as a single unit value, or “metron.” As information increases in the system, the metron correspondingly is divided, or decreases. Similarly, as information increases, this is expressed as a quantized “rotation moment” for a particular area of space. Thus, Heim’s view of space possesses certain nodes or lattice-like structures, and is thus commensurate with a view of space-time as a lattice-like structure of longitudinal waves in the medium itself. In a nutshell, space-time appears to “clump” around certain nodal points in that longitudinal wave’s logarithmic structure. Lattice defects would on that view perhaps then emerge in real space-time as clusterings of matter or as physical forces.

Considerations such as these have led some Nazi Bell researchers to the erroneous conclusion that the device was intended as an experiment in such mechanisms of controlled fusion for the purpose of creating a new energy supply as well as one of these "hydrogen bomb superbombs." As I noted in my Nazi International, the involvement of Dr. Ronald Richter in this project appears clear, and since his postwar project in Argentina ostensibly concerned itself with controlled fusion, such researchers reason back to the original project that the Nazi Bell was simply an earlier version of this postwar project. But Richter himself, as we shall see in a moment, indicates clearly that even this plasma research was a step or key to a much deeper and more fundamental physics. That such a plasma physics, however, might have led to such “fusion devices” would certainly have been a dividend of the project that the Nazis would have been only too happy to accept along the way! But it was merely a secondary dividend in any case.

To draw a simple analogy, consider only human natural languages. That humans have always more or less known this “multi-dimensionality” of time is revealed by the way natural human languages — with their many tenses, moods, and active and passive voices — treat time. Verbal systems are, in short, far beyond the simple "past, present, and future" of conventional standard physical theories. Notably, human natural languages consider time in a highly complex set of open systems and relationships between them. Mathematical physics has yet to catch up with this subtlety in a certain sense.

This is possible, though it raises certain questions since fission reactors, not fusion reactors, are normally associated with control rods. This does, however, make some sense, as the drums in Argentina are solid weights with a hole through the center, while the Bell's counter-rotating drums were most likely hollow cylinders.

Tesla also states that “Simultaneously with these endeavors, the means of individualization and isolation were gradually improved. Great importance was attached to this, for it was found that simple tuning was not sufficient to meet the vigorous practical requirements.” Once again, in other words, standard radio tuning techniques could not be utilized, since the waves were longitudinal “yardstick” waves of pulses, rather than Hertzian “jump rope” waves.

All this raises the question of why the Soviet Union would mount such an expensive expedition in the first place to such a remote wilderness area. Researcher Brian Desborough presents rather interesting, though unsubstantiated, information concerning the relationship between Morgan and Tesla: “Disturbed by Tesla’s command of free-energy and anti-gravity technology, Tesla’s financial backer, Louis Cass Payseur, ordered his front man J.P. Morgan to withdraw his financial support. This act financially ruined Tesla through the initiation of false foreclosure proceedings.

“….another added impetus for Morgan’s financial withdrawal was the amorous advances made toward Tesla by Morgan’s daughter. The manservant previously loaned Tesla by Morgan was, in reality, an industrial spy who, in collusion with one of Tesla’s staff, a German engineer named Fritz Lowenstein, stole Tesla's anti-gravity secrets and assigned them to various Illuminati secret societies, both in Britain and America." (Brian Desborough, They Cast No Shadows [Writers Club Press, 2002], p. 295.)

This is an important point and argues against Nichelson that Tesla used his Wardenclyffe project to make a demonstration of its capabilities at Tunguska. Thus, Tesla would have had to use another facility. However, note that Tesla also indicates that the basic preparations for the completion of the tower had been completed. We are left then with a mystery and a question: could the facility have been duplicated somewhere and by someone else?

Such, alas, is the case with the recent appearance of the work of a friend of mine, Sesh Heri, and his Handprint of Atlas. Heri indeed advances and argues a novel and intriguing hypothesis, namely, that the entire topography and geomorphology of land features and even the continents themselves are results of such standing waves in the earth. And in a brilliant insight, he couples this idea with the whole idea of the layout of certain artificial monuments and constructions around significant naturally occurring geomorphologies. These brilliant insights remain worthy of consideration, despite my following critique of his misunderstandings.

Heri states in his book the following in reference to my weapon hypothesis for the Great Pyramid as outlined in my Giza Death Star Trilogy:

“Such a thesis as Farrell develops in his Giza Death Star trilogy is compelling, breathtaking, chilling, and scientifically convincing in its details, and yet….

> “The same critique that I would apply to Dunn’s electrical power plant thesis, I would also apply in a variant form to Farrell’s weapon thesis as well. While the Great Pyramid, as a transmitter of longitudinal electric waves, could certainly be deployed as a weapon, why would it have been built specifically for the purpose of being used as a weapon? Is a ground-based longitudinal electrical wave transmitter the ideal way to configure a massively destructive scalar beam weapon — especially a scalar beam weapon designed for interplanetary war? I would think that a mobile position in space would be the strategically ideal location for a scalar beam weapon…. A civilization that could build the Great Pyramid could also build a giant space platform and mount upon it a longitudinal electric wave transmitter that could propagate massively powerful scalar beams capable of splitting a planet apart. Such a space platform would also be capable at an instant’s notice of moving from its position in space at superluminal speed….
> “So why would an advanced civilization build a weapon that was a “sitting duck”? Much more likely, a facility such as the Great Pyramid would be an object to be protected by a space platform, > not primarily a weapon. Certainly, the Great Pyramid would have been capable of propagating scalar beams in defense if it was attacked. But a true predatory weapon would have to be able to move — and move very quickly.”

Before proceeding with the rest of Heri’s critique of my weapon hypothesis for the Great Pyramid, these critiques must be addressed. As already noted in the main text, the best natural oscillators of these “scalar” resonances are large masses such as planets and stars. To miss this point is to miss entirely the point of the physics involved. Thus, if one were to build a mobile space platform for Heri’s version of such a weapon, one might accordingly have to do so on an almost planetary scale. Not that it could not be done, of course, for the types of civilizations as he and I are positing might be capable of doing so, but the purpose of doing so is not cost-effective, for it is entirely unnecessary for such a weapon system to be able to move in order to target a specific object, no matter how distant. The targeting is by resonance and interferometry. The “point-aim-and-shoot” model he is implying is not necessary and indeed in a certain sense almost counter to the whole nature of the system. Similarly, such a system would be defensible precisely on the same basis of exploiting the base planetary system’s geometry and local resonance. In short, it is not necessary for it to move in order to be either offensively “predatory” or “defensible” in either case.

Heri’s second critique is far more telling, but suffers from its own shortcomings: “But this strategic flaw is not the most compelling argument against Farrell’s view that the Great Pyramid was originally destined to be a weapon; rather, it is Farrell’s own repeated emphasis that the Great Pyramid is too “over-engineered” to be anything other than a weapon that draws my attention. Farrell makes the point several times in his Giza trilogy that the evidence indicates that the Great Pyramid was able to transmit energy to “Any Possible Receiver in local space” without requiring a complex receiving apparatus at the load end. And he presents some very good evidence and arguments that this indeed was the case. But from this he extrapolates that such a sophisticated device could only be constructed for one purpose and one purpose only — to be used as a weapon of mass destruction — to decimate cities and continents — or to blow up planets. But while such a sophisticated device certainly could be used as a weapon, there is no logical reason that it could only be used as a weapon. Indeed, the very kind of highly sophisticated and sensitive tuning characteristics of such a device suggest to me a more likely constructive use than a destructive one. Sensitive, precise focusing and tuning are the characteristics of careful, constructive manipulation of material substance, not a sledge-hammer disintegration of it. A device that could send energy to "Any Possible Receiver" could send much more than destructive waves — it would have the capacity to send carefully modulated waves of energy that could communicate, nourish, build, and grow. The extreme precision evinced by the Great Pyramid strongly suggests that it was designed to be used as a scalpel, not a sword."

While I am grateful to Heri that he has indeed perceived my arguments accurately and outlined them fairly to a certain extent, and has not resorted to the dismissive tactic of some in the alternative community who simply dismiss the whole hypothesis out of wishful thinking or appeals to "mentors" and "authorities" with access to a presumed millennia-old unwritten tradition, again Heri fails to see the nature of the physics involved, for precision tuning of the very finest surgical precision would indeed be needed — as evidenced by Tesla's own remarks — especially if it were deployed as a weapon, precisely in order to avoid the feedback resonance effects noted by Bearden. So this cannot be used as an argument against the weapon hypothesis.

Similarly, the reverse argument that Heri implies — that all its scalpel-like precision and fine-tuning evince a constructive purpose for its construction and primary use also fails, for as the copious citations of Tesla in the main text I hope make clear, one and the very same physics and technology can be used for either purpose, that is to say, anyone building any such device would know as an inevitable implication of the physics employed and involved that one was building both a "power plant" and a weapon. It is impossible to disentangle the two, and in Tesla's own words, in such a system it is necessary to "grip the earth." I have merely stated the case in the Giza Death Star Trilogy for the weapon hypothesis as being the ultimate purpose of the Pyramid's construction simply because so many wish or choose to ignore this implication of the physics involved. But it is clearly evident in the physics. The true purposes of building such a system would, needless to say, probably be kept secret from the general public at any time, just as Tesla kept the true purpose of Wardenclyffe hidden from J.P. Morgan, and even after revealing it to him, only later and in desperation publicly disclosed its weaponization potential. But that potential was clearly present from the beginning as a logical entailment of the physics, and anyone building such a system would know that. Therefore to exclude the possibility of an intentional construction of a weapon from the motivation or purpose in building such systems is a logical impossibility. In short, at one and the same time as one is building a system for all Heri's wonderful constructive purposes, one is building by the nature of the case, a weapon, whether one builds it in space or not, and at the very moment that system becomes operational for all those wonderful and constructive purposes, it also becomes operational as a weapon.

But the motivation that Del Mar gives for this migration-expansion is rather different than most: "At a very remote date we find bodies of men — Lydians, Phrygians, Phoenicians, Greeks, and others belonging to Aryan races — pushing out in all directions into the desert wilds of aboriginal Europe in search of gold, silver, and copper." (p. 126). In other words, the migration was driven by monetary considerations.

I coined the term "paleophysics" in the books of my Giza Death Star trilogy to refer to this effort to examine ancient texts and monuments for their modern-day scientific analogues in an attempt to reconstruct aspects of a much more sophisticated lost physics. This examination emerged as a methodological assumption from the supposition that there once existed a very sophisticated Very High Civilization predating ancient classical civilizations in Egypt, Mesopotamia, the Indus Valley, and China, civilizations that were declined legacies of that precursor. In Lockyear's hands no such assumption is made, so his effort does not attempt a reconstruction of that lost science.

A breast ornament worn by the high priest of Memphis, as figured in an Egyptian relief, consists of twelve small balls, or crosses, intended to represent Egyptian hieroglyphics. As it cannot be determined that these figures were cut from precious stones, the only definite connection with the Hebrew ornament is the number of figures; this suggests, but fails to prove, a common origin. The monuments show that the high priest of Memphis wore this ornament as early as the fourth Dynasty, or, approximately 4000 B.C.” (p. 282) Kunz also notes that after the Babylonian captivity a second breastplate was most likely made. (p. 280). It is possible that the Hebrew association of the 12 stones of the breastplate and of the 12 tribes to the 12 zodiacal signs received an impetus from Babylonian preoccupations with astrology and the associations of gemstones with celestial bodies and their influences.

An important consideration in this regard is that the Emperor Justinian, who made it his deliberate and conscious goal to restore Roman rule over Rome itself, would most likely, through his brilliant military mastermind Belisarius, have exacted from the Vandals the return of all treasure they took from the Western Rome.

Consider only the fact that in the United States, since the establishment of the Federal Reserve system, there were initially several types of paper notes in circulation: the state's silver and gold certificates and United States bills, and the private bank's "Federal Reserve notes." It should also be noted that it is now all but impossible to find any of the former notes in general circulation, since the Federal Reserve makes it a policy to pull and destroy any bills that are not the interest-bearing debt notes it does not issue privately, and since collectors, knowing this, themselves often pull such notes for their collections or to sell to other collectors.

Springmeir states that "According to their own secret family genealogy, which is recorded in a sacred secret book, the Rothschilds are descended from Nimrod, the great Babylonian warrior leader." Of course, a "secret sacred book" means that there is no substantiation of these claims. However, as will be seen in a subsequent chapter, there is a case that can be made of a generalized contextual nature in which such claims may be interpreted, and in which they find a more or less very loose corroboration.

Rohl clearly identifies the Mesopotamian god Ninurta with Nimrod, based on various considerations. In doing so, he clearly highlights the massive chronological problems that I alluded to in the Preface to The Cosmic War, for the archaeological record, as Rohl notes, would not support a very ancient dating for the event, such as I implied in that book. Contrariwise, as I also noted, if one takes the ancient texts themselves seriously, and reads them in the backdrop of the Exploded Planet Hypothesis, then such extreme ancientness is indicated. I believe the way out of this impasse is once again to recognize that the ancient texts and myths of Sumeria and other cultures may have been deliberately contrived to function on a multitude of levels — including chronological ones — simultaneously.

“Soul and personhood,” this phrasing is not redundant, but is meant to express the author’s opinion that “soul” and “person” are two very distinct things. How they came to be equated in the popular mind of many Westerners would require a tome in its own right.

[507] This would, perforce, imply an astonishing thing, namely, that Dr. Li’s Gaussian copula formula failed for yet another reason than those advanced in the Prologue, and that the failure was due to not recognizing a deeper physics in play. The data compiled by the Foundation for the Study of Cycles, as well as other data presented here, would seem to indicate also that at least some in the international finance “community” are fully aware of this hypothesis, and plan their actions accordingly.

[P]ower and dominion over all that is on earth, both that which is above and that which is beneath, are in my hand.

—Melek Taus,

from Al-Jilwah (The Revelation),

Yezidi scripture

Preface

… I believe the despite its cerebral dementia and its alvine madness, this book, by virtue of its very subject, rendered a service. It refocused attention on the machinations of the Evil One who had succeeded in making people disbelieve his existence; it was the starting-point for all the renewed studies of the eternal advance of Satanism. By revealing the hateful practices of necromancy it has helped to annihilate them… .

J-K Huysmans, Preface to the Second Edition of Against Nature, regarding his book The Damned

What you are about to read is the product of over ten years of obsession and sacrifice. While I first wrote on the subject of Baphomet in 1999 for Dagobert ’s Revenge (the magazine I published at the time), my true obsession started when I was contacted by this entity through the Ouija board after a series of encounters with other spirits. This contact subsequently happened dozens of times over the course of several years, as it aided the research I was doing on the Holy Grail and the sacred bloodlines of Europe. Through those conversations (detailed in my 2014 book Clock Shavings) I got to know this personality well, and became intrigued by the complexity of its nature. I decided to research the subject of Baphomet itself: where it came from, what it meant, and how it had influenced history.

This led to the writing of my first book on the esoteric history of money, 2005 ’s Solomon ’s Treasure. The subject of that book is, believe it or not, intimately connected with that of Baphomet, as the book itself explains. This was a bit of a detour from my main goal, but my research of Baphomet had led me there, so I went with it. Then in 2007 I started in earnest writing a book on the topic of Baphomet alone.

This has proved to be the most challenging effort I have ever made. The subject defies exact interpretation. The clues lead down tortuous footpaths deep into labyrinthine forests where one becomes easily lost. “Facts ” that seem to be taken for granted by most other authors fall apart under scrutiny, with no evidence pointing to where the real truth is, or how and why the lie was constructed and perpetuated. In addition, both I and several of the people I ended up working with on this project found that a sense of fogginess would descend upon the brain whenever a serious attempt was made to sort out the details. It seemed as if Baphomet was playing hard to get. He wanted to be seen and credited for his influence, but never pinned down.

It required the help of a partner to complete this task. My mind simply could not display all of the conflicting information about Baphomet on a single desktop for analysis. That is why I was very grateful when in 2014, Gnostic writer Alexander Rivera joined me in this quest. From that point on, things quickly began to take shape. Throughout the process, it seemed like our efforts were both helped and hindered by forces from without: like there was a supernatural entity putting us in the right place at each step to receive the information we needed next, yet at the same time unexpected obstacles would come along to thwart our efforts.

A crucial element of the research, the translation of Joseph von Hammer- Purgstall ’s Mysterium Baphometis Revelatum from Latin into English, almost didn ’t happen for numerous reasons. First the translator suffered a sudden and severe decline in his health, requiring him to finish the rest of the work with an assistant to help in the typing of the words. Then he almost quit near the end because of spiritual attacks he endured involving disturbing mental images and poltergeist activity. Even his assistant experienced the haunting. Finally, the discovery of the artifacts in the British Museum was a fluke, particularly the second casket, which I wasn ’t even looking for because I didn ’t know it existed. (All of this is covered thoroughly in the final chapter of this book.)

I must stress that, although my obsession with Baphomet began because of an encounter on the Ouija board (which I did not ask for, mind you, as I was simply trying to contact a dead French artist at the time), and some of my early research was inspired by clues given to me in this manner, all of the information that you find here was discovered and analyzed the old-fashioned way, pouring through books in various languages, some over two thousand years old, utilizing inter-library loan programs, and purchasing (at great expense) rare out-of-print volumes. We also utilized the plethora of old material scanned into Google Books, as well as the catalogues of display listings for several museums. Of course, we made good use of our network of friends all over the world, many of whom truly went out of their way to help, including, notably, Karl James Smith and Christopher Knowles.

It goes without saying that we could not have done this without our mysterious translator (who wishes to be anonymous). We are also forever indebted to Philip Gonzalez, who tracked down a copy of the Hammer-Purgstall book, scanned the images, helped us find a translator, helped us with analysis, and in the end provided crucial proofreading and fact-checking of the final manuscript. The people at the British Museum have been extremely helpful as well, including Parveen Sodhi in the Images Department, and Virginia Smithson in the Department of Britain, Europe & Prehistory. Also, thanks must go to the talented Jesse Peper for providing the cover art and frontispiece.

Today “Baphomet ” is almost a household name, thanks to the prevalence of conspiracy theories that have spread widely on the internet. It is even pre- loaded into the dictionary on my smartphone, unlike a lot of normal English words that I am surprised to find missing. Nevertheless, despite the great many words being written about Baphomet, very few seem to understand it as anything more than a symbol of Satan. It may be that, but it is a lot more also. In fact, as Masonic writers have hinted in the past, it may be the preeminent mystery of the Western spiritual tradition. Understanding Baphomet sheds light not only on the motivations of the Devil, but on the mind of God as well. I hope you find reading this book to be almost as enlightening as it was for us to write it.

Chapter 1:Pacts with the Devil

It is established from their monuments that three capital crimes brought against them by the Articles of Accusation — the crimes of apostasy, idolatry and pederasty —are foundation teachings of the Ophitic doctrine of which the Templars were followers.

—Baron Joseph von Hammer-Purgstall, Mysterium Baphometis Revelatum It was, in many ways, the greatest political scandal of European history, and certainly the most bizarre. The charges included sodomy, infanticide and other murders, kissing a goat ’s behind, spitting and urinating on the cross, invoking the Devil, and worshipping a demonic idol, as well as denying Christ, the Virgin, the Saints, and God himself. The alleged perpetrators were the members of one of the richest and most powerful entities on the continent, an enormous transnational business enterprise that had begun as a holy order of fighting monks receiving its authority directly from the Pope, largely responsible for the success, and then the failure, of the Crusades to capture Jerusalem for Christendom. After 200 years, their power and wealth had swelled to the point where it seemed they feared no one, not even the king of France himself. That was about to change.

At dawn on Friday the 13th, 1307, the Knights Templar in France were arrested en masse by King Philip IV ’s seneschals. Philip was out to get the order. He owed them a lot of money, and they had embarrassed him by refusing him membership to their club. Now he planned to use his influence on the papacy to have them disbanded. He had already sent in spies to join the order and see if there was any truth to the rumors: that there was something unholy about the Templar initiation ceremony. What his spies reported back would make anyone ’s hair stand on end.

When the stories of the spies are combined with the confessions of the tortured knights, a remarkably cohesive, if horrific, pattern begins to form. The Templars apparently had a secret Rule, different than the one given to them by their patron, Saint Bernard of Clairvaux. Outwardly, they were Christian warrior- monks, pledged to fight for the protection and expansion of Christendom, and to adhere to an extremely ascetic lifestyle. Inwardly though, it seemed, they practiced anti-Christian rites.

It was said that at initiation new recruits were forced to kiss the naked behind of one of their new brothers, although sometimes the backside of a goat or a cat was substituted. They were made to spit upon the Cross, revoke their Christian baptism, and denounce Jesus. They were then introduced to their new savior, whom they were to worship. It was a “head ” of some sort named “Baphomet. ” None of the inquisitors knew what that meant at the time, and no translation was offered by any of the confessors.

This “Baphomet ” head was variously said to be that of a bearded man, a woman, a goat, or a demon with leathery skin. Some said that it had two or three faces, or that it had “feet. ” While it was generally described as a mummified flesh-and-blood relic of some sort, others said that it was a skull, or that it was made of brass or gold, or that it was merely a painting of a head. All witnesses agreed that it was terrifying to behold. They said that the head “prophesied ” to them during the ceremonies, and gave them “wisdom. ” They believed that it “made them rich ” and “caused the land to germinate. ”

By November 1307, even the Grand Master of the Templars himself, Jacques de Molay had confessed to these charges, and more. Pope Clement had heard enough. He issued a bull ordering the arrest of all Templars in eight countries, including England, Ireland, Portugal, Italy and Germany. On August 12, 1308, he drew up a list of 127 offenses with which they were charged. In addition to the various acts of blasphemy, heresy, sodomy and murder already discussed, they were also accused of treasonous dealings with the Muslim enemy during the Crusades, the Saracens. Trials dragged on for another five years. Many recanted their confessions, including that of the Grand Master, and those knights who did so were put to death in brutal ways. As he burned at the stake in 1314, Grand Master Jacques De Molay uttered a curse against Pope Clement and King Philip, prophesying that they would both die within a year. They did.

Other knights stuck to their confessions, and were rewarded with lenient sentences of monastic penance not much different from the ascetic lifestyle they were already used to. The order was officially disbanded by the Pope, its property given over to other monastic orders. So ended what was once the greatest military and economic power in Europe.

How could things have gone so horribly wrong? In the beginning, nobody could have imagined this. The Templars were thought of as the Special Forces of their day, the elite fighting force at the forefront of the Crusades. The order began when a 22-year-old French knight named Hughes de Payens and eight of his friends took a vow of obedience to the Patriarch of Jerusalem, pledging to live in poverty and chastity. They dedicated themselves to the protection of pilgrims en route to the Holy Land. The knights were given lodging by Baldwin II, King of Jerusalem, who stationed them at the al-Aqsa Mosque next to the Dome of the Rock, site of the original Temple of Solomon. Thus they were named “the Poor Knights of the Temple of Solomon, ” which was rendered “Knights Templar ” in common usage.

Soon the knighthood was adopted by Saint Bernard of Clairvaux, leader of the Cistercian order of monks. Membership blossomed. In 1128 the knights assembled at the papal Council of Troyes in France, where they were given an official rule and assigned a plain white robe as their uniform. A red equilateral cross was added to the outfit in 1147. The Templar Rule consisted of 72 paragraphs detailing every aspect of life in the monastery and on the battlefield.

At most meals they were allowed only bread with no water, although meat was served three times a week. Scriptures were read aloud during meal times, but all other talking was forbidden. New members had to give up their wives and donate all of their property to the order, so as to live in perfect poverty and chastity. They slept on the floor communally, always with a candle left burning to discourage “immoral acts ” at night.

In battle the Templars were forbidden to retreat, required to fight to the death of their last man. This made the Templars very formidable foes at war. Because of this, they were feared and respected by their Muslim Saracen enemies. In 1148, as the Second Crusade commenced, King Louis VII of France put the Templars in command of all European armies, and they led every major battle of the Crusades from then onward.

However, the most important moment for the Templars had come in March of 1139, when Pope Innocent II issued a papal bull entitled “Omne Datum Optimum ” (usually translated “Every Best Gift, ” although a “datum ” is actually a “fact ” or “object of knowledge ” more than a “gift. ”). In it, the Knights Templar were declared the “true Israelites, ” and the Pope ’s private army, answerable to him alone. No other king, bishop or nobleman had any ultimate authority over them. They were granted the right to form their own priesthood, with full authority to forgive sins and to raise tithes. They were also given the right to lend money with interest, something that the Church ’s anti-usury policy forbade all other Christians from doing.

The Templars began to amass wealth and power quickly. Their membership was taken from the cream of European aristocracy, so each new initiate remitted to the order what was often considerable money and property. Wealthy families from all over Europe also donated lands and money as the Second Crusade mounted. The Templars set up “preceptories ” throughout the continent. These were conducted like semi-autonomous city-states, where the knights farmed their own food, ran their own hospitals, and engaged in the manufacture of arms, textiles, and other goods. They also ran their own banks. This network of preceptories created ideal routes of travel for European pilgrims seeking the Holy Land, whom the Templars had sworn to protect at their inception.

Indeed, it was the way these preceptories operated, particularly their banking operations, which provided a form of protection for the pilgrims. Instead of loading themselves down with gold and provisions, which were likely to be stolen, the pilgrims would simply deposit some money in the form of gold or silver at the Templar preceptory nearest to their point of departure. From there they would make their way to Jerusalem, traveling from one preceptory to another. At each stop the pilgrim would present the banker with a “chit ” —a piece of paper that was encoded with ciphered information regarding the pilgrim ’s deposit at the originating bank. The pilgrim ’s account would then be charged for all the accommodation he received while staying at that particular preceptory, and he could also make cash withdrawals if he wished. A new chit, encoded with his new balance, would then be given to him to present at the next preceptory. In this way the word “check ” or “cheque ” entered into the French and English languages.

It was thus by donations, money-lending and industrial trade that the Templars were able to expand their empire to become Europe ’s most powerful economic influence. They were able to maintain this even after the Holy Land was finally lost in the Eighth Crusade in 1271. But now they were without a cause. Some of Europe ’s kings and nobles, and well as many within the Church, began to wonder what the Templars were going to do next. They had money, property, authority, horses, weapons, and a standing army with nothing to do. Many European crown heads were heavily indebted to the Templars financially, and since they were also banned by papal decree from exercising any political authority over the knights, many of these kings understandably felt threatened.

There was another potential threat as well, of a more metaphysical nature. Not everyone understood exactly how the Templars had become so wealthy and powerful. It was rumored that there must have been a secret to this. One rumor popular now, which may have circulated at the time, was that the original nine founding Templars had discovered a treasure within or beneath the Al-Aqsa Mosque in Jerusalem, perhaps a cache of King Solomon ’s fabled wealth. After the arrests, King Philip had the Templar properties in France turned upside down looking for treasure, but found very little money at all, something that has always puzzled Templar scholars (as noted in the book The Warriors and the Bankers by Alan Butler and Stephen Dafoe).

Theories of a secret Templar treasure have been the subject of hundreds of books throughout the years, and this idea is even at the heart of some rituals performed by modern Freemasons. It is often suggested that the knights might have found the lost Ark of the Covenant underneath the Temple

Mount. How this would have made the order wealthy, however, is something that really remains unexplained by the theorists. Some suggest that it would have given them negotiating power with the Church, which would have been eager to possess such a relic.

Another rumor floating around at the end of the 13th century was that the Templars acquired their wealth because their founders had made a pact with the Devil. According to this theory they allegedly kept the Pope under their control and compelled others to give them money through the power of witchcraft. Stories had begun to leak from disgruntled ex-knights about the secret initiation rituals. Word was getting around about the idol worship, the obscene kisses, the homosexual orgies, and the desecration of the Cross. Why would men in such important, respectable positions do such things, unless they were benefiting from it in some tangible way?

It would be so easy to dismiss these rumors as typical tall tales of the Middle Ages. But in their confessions the knights admitted that they did these horrible things in their rituals. They said it was all part of the worship of their demonic idol, a head named Baphomet. As Michael Baigent, Richard Leigh and Henry Lincoln put it in Holy Blood, Holy Grail :

Subjected to interrogation by the Inquisition … a number of knights referred to something called “Baphomet ” —too many, and in too many different places, for Baphomet to be the invention of a single individual or even a single preceptory.

The knights also voluntarily proclaimed that it was the worship of the head which made them wealthy. Is this the “secret of the Templar treasure ” for which King Philip was looking? Did he perhaps think that by forcing the knights to describe their rituals in detail, he would discover a method of getting rich through witchcraft?

When Philip ’s police raided the Templar properties in France, they found very little gold or silver bullion. They certainly did not find the Ark of the Covenant. But they did find, in the Paris Temple, the large bust of a female figure made out of silver. It was hollow. Inside were two head bones wrapped in white and red cloths, with a label attached that, according to the authors of Holy Blood, Holy Grail, quoting, in translation, Raymond Oursel ’s French language Le Proces des Templiers, 1955) read “Caput LVIIIm ” — “Head 58m. ” Another source, Jules Michelet ’s History of France, Volume 1 (as translated by GH Smith, 1860), says that the head was labeled “LIII, ” meaning “53. ” From this evidence, we can presume that there were at least 52 other heads somewhere that the police did not find. So what was the true purpose of all these heads? What does the name “Baphomet ” actually mean?

The Oxford English Dictionary says that the first appearance of the name “Baphomet ” in English text was in the May 12th edition of the Classical Journal, Volume 5, published in 1812, in an article by Charles Villers called “Some Account of the Researches of the German Literati on the Subject of Ancient Literature and History. ” There, in a footnote on page 88, a French scholar referred to only as “M. Lentz ” is quoted, from an essay of his entitled “On the goddess of Paphos as represented on ancient monuments and on the Baphomet. ” This referred to a goddess worshipped in the coastal city of Paphos on the island of Cyprus, where the Templars were stationed. Idols of the goddess were used as land markers, just as statues of Hermes, the Greek wisdom god, were also used in ancient times. These images of the goddess had gradually combined with and then transmuted into images of Hermes himself. M. Lentz suggested that the name of these markers — metae —got fused with that of Paphos to form “Paphometa, ” and thus, Baphomet. Jules Michelet referred to Francois Just-Marie-Raynouard ’s The Templars: Tragedy in Five Acts (1805) regarding the origin of the word:

M. Raynouard considers the word Baphomet in these two depositions, as an alteration of that of Mahomet, mentioned by the first [Templar] witness; and sees in it a desire on the part of the examiners to confirm the charges of a good understanding with the Saracens, so generally reported of the Templars… . [In their depositions] the Templars admit nothing more serious than that they have felt alarm, that they have fancied they saw a devil ’s head, a mauffe ’s head, that in these ceremonies they have seen the devil himself under the shape of a cat, or of a woman… .

The word “Mauffe ” appears to originate in French as a way of spelling this alleged alteration of Mahomet, the name of the Muslim prophet, more frequently spelled “Mohammed ” or “Muhammad, ” which supposedly morphed into the word Baphomet. Variations seen in print also include “Maufe, ” Mauffez, ” and “Maphumet ” (according to the Bulletin de la Societe Academique de Laon, Vol. 21, 1876). In the book The View of the State of Europe During the Middle Ages by Henry Hallam, published in 1818, the author concurs that the word is “an early French corruption of ‘Mahomet. ’ ” This goes along with the reports, mentioned by Raynouard and Michelet, that the Templars were suspected at the time of their trials of having been secret converts to Islam, and secret friends of their supposed enemies, the Saracens. In one knight ’s confession he mentioned that he had been taught to exclaim the word “Yallah ” during the blasphemous ceremonies, which he said was “a word of the Saracens. ” Also, according to the Online Etymology Dictionary, “Mahomet ” was used in the Middle Ages as a generic word for “idol. ”

But there have been other interpretations as well. The writer responsible for our modern understanding of Baphomet was a mid-nineteenth-century occult author named “Eliphas Levi. ” Born Alphonse Louis Constant, he was the son of a shoemaker in Paris, and had studied in the Seminary of St. Sulpice, a known hotbed of occultism and heretical thinking. He eventually dropped out, got married, and began writing books about ritual magic that were published in the 1850s under the Hebraicized version of his name.

Levi ’s main thesis was that all forms of occultism and mysticism held a common, secret doctrine. Ritual magic, he said, utilized the existence of what he called the “Astral Light, ” defined in Magic: A History of Its Rites, Rituals, and Mysteries, as:

… a natural and divine agent, at once corporeal and spiritual, a universal plastic mediator, a common receptacle for vibrations of movement and images of form, a fluid and a force which may be called, in a sense at least, the imagination of nature.

It was this agent which, he said, reflected the magician ’s will, expressed during a ritual, and actualized it into existence. He illustrated this concept with a hieroglyphic form which he called “Baphomet, ” claiming that this was the spiritual principle secretly revered by the Templars. Levi used this picture as the frontispiece for a number of his books.

At first glance Levi ’s Baphomet looks like the Devil himself. That is partially because the most common modern depiction of the Devil is based on the card of the same name in the popular Rider-Waite tarot deck, and this card is itself based on Levi ’s depiction of Baphomet. (In other words, the modern conception of the Devil has been influenced by Levi ’s illustration.) Certainly the creature presented by Levi looks demonic and evil, with the head and legs of a goat, along with a human torso sporting both male and female sexual organs. On its forehead is that foremost symbol of witchcraft, the pentagram, and between its horns issues forth an inflamed torch.

Levi repeatedly stated that Baphomet was not the same as the Devil, however. Rather it was a symbol of a transcendental power beyond good and evil, man and beast, or male and female energies. Baphomet was in Levi ’s view the synthesis of all energy, both on Earth and in Heaven, forming something greater than the sum of its parts, capable of performing any transformation of matter which the human mind could conceive. As for the meaning of the word, Levi suggested it was a code, made up of abbreviations for the Latin words Templi omnium hominum pacis abhas, meaning “abbot of the temple of universal peace (or ‘understanding ’) among men. ”

Eliphas Levi wrote many books in which he proclaimed the virtues of Baphomet, and of the universal agent which he said the figure represented. His writings, translated into English by AE Waite, helped to spread the occult revival which swept Europe in the mid-1800s. His ideas contributed greatly to the type of magic that was practiced by the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn. Later, at the turn of the twentieth century, one Golden Dawn student, Aleister Crowley, not only adapted many of Levi ’s ideas, but saw himself as a reincarnation of Levi. He took on “Baphomet ” as his own initiatory name in the magical order he headed: the Order of Oriental Templars (a.k.a. “Ordo Templi Orientis, ” or “OTO ”) Interestingly (for reasons which will soon become obvious), Crowley also chose to use Islamic terminology when he proclaimed himself the “Caliph ” of the OTO.

Towards the end of his life, Eliphas Levi himself had come to question his dabblings in the occult. When he had quit the seminary as a young man, his mother had actually committed suicide, perhaps because of her disappointment in her son ’s life choice. Levi had apparently carried that guilt with him his whole life, and as he neared death, he converted back to Catholicism. His final book, Magic: A History of Its Rites, Rituals and Mysteries , was a sad attempt to reconcile the faith of his family with the occult ideas he had promoted all along. The text is full of statements which contradict those found in his previous works. He came to describe Baphomet as a false idol, and the Templars as practitioners in Black Magic:

For their better success, and in order to secure partisans, they fostered the regrets of every fallen worship and the hopes of every new cultus, promising to all liberty of conscience and a new orthodoxy which should be the synthesis of all persecuted beliefs. They even went so far as to recognize the pantheistic symbolism of the grand masters of Black Magic, and the better to isolate themselves from obedience to a religion by which they were condemned beforehand, they rendered divine honors to the monstrous idol Baphomet, even as of old the dissenting tribes had adored the Golden Calf of Dan and Bethel. Certain monuments of recent discovery and certain precious documents belonging to the thirteenth century offer abundant proof of all that is advanced here. Other evidences are concealed in the annals and beneath the symbols of Occult Masonry.

There are two very interesting lines in this last quote. The first is his description of the secret Templar doctrine as “the synthesis of all persecuted beliefs. ” This indicates the exact same thing that our own investigation came to reveal: that, just as the figure of Baphomet is formed by a conglomerate of occult symbols, the Templar belief system (represented by Baphomet) is a conglomerate of all the most noteworthy of the heretical beliefs that plagued the early days of the Christian church. Or it could be seen as the other way around: all Christian heresies are corruptions of the original Baphometic wisdom that the Templars somehow tapped into.

The second interesting point in the above-quoted passage from Levi is his claim that “monuments of recent discovery ” and “precious documents belonging to the thirteenth century ” proved that the Templars were guilty of worshipping this demonic idol. This may indicate where Levi got his idea of the Baphomet image from. After all, the Templar confessions described Baphomet mainly as a head. True, some of them told of rituals in which the behind of a goat was kissed. But where did Levi get the idea for a winged half-human, half-goat androgyne? According to various writers, Levi based his depiction of Baphomet on a gargoyle that he found on a former Templar property, either in Saint Bris le Vineux in Burgundy, Lanleff in Brittany, or St. Merri in Paris.

The “certain precious documents belonging to the thirteenth century ” refer to the Templars ’ alleged “secret rule, ” which we will discuss in a later chapter. The “monuments of recent discovery ” that he was referring to were undoubtedly those documented by nineteenth-century Austrian Orientalist scholar Joseph, Baron von Hammer-Purgstall, and his book Mysterium Baphometis Revelatum (Mystery of Baphomet Revealed), published in 1818, about 30 years before Levi ’s first writing on Baphomet. In it he documented a number of objects discovered at former Templar properties throughout what are now Austria, Germany, Hungary, and the Czech Republic. This curious document, written in Latin, is part of a larger book entitled Fundgruben des Orients (usually translated “Treasures of the Orient ”).

Although a great many writers have leaned upon Purgstall-Hammer ’s work on the subject in the last two centuries, most have merely consulted other books that mention him, rather than actually looking at what he wrote. We found that in order to complete our study of Baphomet, we really needed to find out what the book actually says. Therefore, we hired as a translator an excellent, well- rounded scholar in Latin who wishes to take no credit, but who painstakingly worked through the text over a period of several months (with the help of Philip Gonzalez). We can now present the world ’s first English translation of Mysterium Baphometis Revelatum , which will be published shortly after the book you are currently reading.

Hammer-Purgstall ’s “Baphometic Idols, ” as they were later called by other authors, consisted mostly of statuettes, coffers and cups presenting strange images of inhuman figures. Seven of the images show only a head, and in two of these cases it is a head with two faces, much akin to the descriptions given by some Templars of the Baphomet head. Many of them were decorated with scenes of bizarre sexual ceremonies of a seemingly religious nature. The figures presented were in some cases covered all over their bodies with multiple eyes, or with serpents.

One image that Hammer-Purgstall found used repeatedly was said by him to represent Baphomet, or, rather, “Mete, ” as he decoded it. The images he found show an androgynous figure wearing a cape, often crowned with towers a la the goddess Cybele of the ancient world, though sometimes with horns instead. In several versions this person is holding in each hand a chain connected to the sky. While the figure appears female in one version, in the others it is shown with a beard, making it quite clear that it was meant to be taken as androgynous. Other items found by Hammer-Purgstall in the form of statues, which he called “idols ” of Mete, also depict a bearded and horned figure with breasts. This, then, may have been why Eliphas Levi chose to depict Baphomet in this way.

Arabic, Greek, and Latin inscriptions were found among these images too. One in particular brings to mind the confessions of the Knights Templar about Baphomet. Hammer-Purgstall translated it into Latin, and then 1865, Thomas Wright, in his book Worship of the Generative Powers , translated it thusly:

Let Mete be exalted, who causes things to bud and blossom! He is our root; it is one and seven; abjure (the faith), and abandon thyself to all pleasures.

You will recall that some confessing Templars said Baphomet “caused the land to germinate. ” Hammer-Purgstall believed that the Templars had been secret practitioners of a fringe religious movement called “Ophite Gnosticism. ” The word “Mete ” in the translation above was a Greek word for “wisdom. ” He believed “Baphomet ” was an allusion to a Gnostic rite of “Bapho Metis, ” a “Baptism of Wisdom. ”

The root syllable “met ” in “Baphomet ” has also been connected by some linguists to the name of the sun god Mithras, worshipped by some Gnostics as an incarnation of divine wisdom. Thus Aleister Crowley ’s alternative interpretation of Baphomet as meaning “Father Mithras ” can be considered part of the same family of translations. More recently Dr. Hugh Schonfield, known for his work on the Dead Sea Scrolls, also proffered an interpretation that again led back to this concept of divine wisdom or Gnosis. He said that “Baphomet, ” when transliterated into Aramaic and fed through the Atbash cipher (in which the value of the alphabet is inverted, it yields the word “Sophia, ” another Greek word meaning “wisdom. ” In a similar vein, Sufi scholar Idries Shah has suggested that the Templars were influenced by Islamic Sufism, and that the word “Baphomet ” came from the Arabic abufihamat , meaning “father of understanding. ” This, again, connects to Eliphas Levi ’s interpretation of Baphomet ’s name, involving the code that supposedly yields the words “father of universal understanding among men ” (in Latin).

It seems as if all of these translations and interpretations of Baphomet, although arrived at in entirely different ways, all yield the same sort of meaning. So exactly what is this hidden “wisdom ” principle that Baphomet has always been associated with, which the Templars allegedly venerated and utilized? It will take the rest of this book for us to unravel this for you as best we can. Our story starts where, supposedly, time and space began: at the Tree of Knowledge of Good and Evil in the Garden of Eden.

Chapter 2: Seed of the Serpent

Notwithstanding, the devil entered into a wicked serpent and seduced the angel that was in the form of the woman, and he wrought his lust with Eve in the Song of the serpent. And therefore are they called sons of the devil and sons of the serpent that do the lust of the devil their father, even unto the end of this world. And again the devil poured out upon the angel that was in Adam the poison of his lust, and it begetteth the sons of the serpent and the sons of the devil even unto the end of this world.

— Interrogatio Johannis (a.k.a. The Secret Supper or The Book of John the Evangelist)

In The Book of Genesis there are a number of mysteries that have always puzzled scholars and vexed religious apologists. One of the most bothersome issues occurs right in the first two chapters. It appears that there are two separate tellings of the creation of the human race!

The first version can be found in Chapter 1: 26-28 (KJV), where on the sixth day of creation, after he created the heavens and the earth, the flora and the fauna, God says:

Let us make man in our image, after our likeness: and let them have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over the cattle, and over all the earth, and over every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth. So God created man in his own image, in the image of God created he him; male and female created he them.

And God blessed them, and God said unto them, Be fruitful, and multiply, and replenish the earth, and subdue it: and have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over every living thing that moveth upon the earth.

The use of a plural possessive pronoun here by the supposedly singular “God ” is telling, and indicates that there was more than one creative being involved. This is another mystery often explained away by Christian apologetics as unimportant, but, as we will see, it tends to corroborate the Gnostic or Ophite view of creation being a joint process.

Yet that isn ’t the only deliberate misinterpretation of the text commonly made by Christian apologetics. A key detail of this first creation story is when the Lord informs the newly created mankind that all vegetation has been created for their consumption, and they are free to eat whatever they want, as we read in verses 29-31 of the same chapter (KJV):

And God said, Behold, I have given you every herb bearing seed, which is upon the face of all the earth, and every tree, in the which is the fruit of a tree yielding seed; to you it shall be for meat. And to every beast of the earth, and to every fowl of the air, and to every thing that creepeth upon the earth, wherein there is life, I have given every green herb for meat: and it was so. And God saw every thing that he had made, and, behold, it was very good. And the evening and the morning were the sixth day.

So it would appear then that God created man on the sixth day. Furthermore, he apparently created man and woman at the same time. It is unspecified whether there is only one human couple created at first or several, but let us just assume there was only one. Why, then, does God seem to re-create mankind later in Chapter 2? That chapter starts out with a description of God resting on the seventh day. Then in verses 4-9 of the second chapter (KJV) we are told:

And the LORD God formed man of the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life; and man became a living soul. And the LORD God planted a garden eastward in Eden; and there he put the man whom he had formed. And out of the ground made the LORD God to grow every tree that is pleasant to the sight, and good for food; the tree of life also in the midst of the garden, and the tree of knowledge of good and evil.

This is the first mention of the Tree of Knowledge and the Tree of Life. A few verses later (2: 15-17, KJV) Adam is given charge of tending the garden and also told specifically not to touch the fruit of one of those two trees:

And the LORD God took the man, and put him into the garden of Eden to dress it and to keep it. And the LORD God commanded the man, saying, Of every tree of the garden thou mayest freely eat: But of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, thou shalt not eat of it: for in the day that thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die.

It is only at this point in verses 18-25 (KJV), in this second version of the story of mankind ’s creation, that the female is mentioned at all:

And the LORD God said, It is not good that the man should be alone; I will make him an help meet for him… . And the LORD God caused a deep sleep to fall upon Adam, and he slept: and he took one of his ribs, and closed up the flesh instead thereof; And the rib, which the LORD God had taken from man, made he a woman, and brought her unto the man.

And Adam said, This is now bone of my bones, and flesh of my flesh: she shall be called Woman, because she was taken out of Man.

So in the first creation, man and woman were created at the same time. They were apparently created the same way, from the dust of the Earth. In the second creation, the man was created first and then the female was created secondly out of Adam ’s rib. In the first version, God created man “in his own image. ” In the second creation, God breathes into Adam “the breath of life,” something not mentioned in the first version. In the first creation, there is no mention of a garden, and no mention of forbidden fruit. Rather mankind is specifically told to eat whatever they want –that all vegetation had been created for that purpose –and it is all “good ” in the Lord ’s eyes.

Perhaps most importantly, since only the creatures of the second creation are given rules to follow, only they can transgress those rules. The first mankind is blessed and told to “be fruitful and multiply. ” It is only the second mankind that experiences the fall from grace after eating from the Tree of Knowledge, and it is only after this that they begin to breed, seemingly as a result of the sexual awareness that they gain after the Fall.

The rabbinical school known as the Pharisees believed that the first creation was of Adam Kadmon, the perfect Primordial Man, a mirror image of the divine Logos (“the Word ”), and a hermaphroditic being. Philo wrote that Adam Kadmon, whom he also called “heavenly man ” or “original man ” was “born in the image of God ” with “no participation in any corruptible or earthlike essence; whereas the earthly man is made of loose material, called a lump of clay. ” The second creation, they teach, was when the female half was split apart from the whole, to become Adam and Eve.

The Pharisees thought that the Primordial Adam was created and destroyed prior to the actual creation of the universe. The cabalistic text known as The Zohar says that within his body were contained all of the elements of creation. That text even indicates that God patterned existence after the image of Adam Kadmon, and that perhaps God himself was made in Adam ’s image, not the other way around. Or perhaps Adam Kadmon is God, in this view, and the creator of Adam and Eve. As The Zohar says, “The form of man is the image of everything that is above and below; therefore did the Holy Ancient select it for His own form. ” This seems to agree with what the apostle Paul wrote in 1 Corinthians 15:45-47 (KJV):

And so it is written, The first man Adam was made a living soul; the last Adam was made a quickening spirit. Howbeit that was not first which is spiritual, but that which is natural; and afterward that which is spiritual. The first man is of the earth, earthy: the second man is the Lord from heaven.

Paul referred to Adam Kadmon as the “second man ” because he thought that, although he was conceived as a spirit prior to the creation of the earthly Adam, he wasn ’t created in the flesh until afterwards. This is because Paul believed that Adam Kadmon incarnated for the first time as Jesus Christ. In a similar vein, members of the Judeo-Christian Gnostic sect known as the “Elcesaites ” believed that when Adam Kadmon split in two, the male side became the Messiah, and the female part the Holy Ghost.

This may all be a bit confusing. However, the most important points, for our current inquiry, are these:

1. There were forms, primordial entities, and events that took place between them prior to what we consider the actual creation of our present universe

2. These primordial entities were hermaphroditic, and split apart into male and female entities during creation.

3. Creation was a fall from the perfection of the prior state.

Herein lies the key to our investigation about Baphomet: to hear many cabalists tell it, the first pair was not Adam and Eve, but rather Adam and Lilith. The story of Lilith is an epic saga all its own, and it all takes place prior to the events of Genesis , in a time before time, in what is referred to in Yiddish as “Yenne-volt ” (the Other World). Lilith ’s name means “spirit of night, ” which is undoubtedly connected to the darkness of the “Great Supernal Abyss ” (the nothingness prior to creation) out of which she is said to have sprung spontaneously.

Lilith and Adam allegedly quarreled over sex, specifically about who would be on top. When Adam insisted on being on top, Lilith left him. She is said to have disappeared from Paradise by pronouncing the secret and sacred name of God (the “Tetragrammaton ” of cabalistic lore), which bestows godlike power on those who can speak it. Some legends even state that she obtained the divine name from God himself by seducing him! According to one version of the story, upon speaking the name, she shape-shifted into an owl and flew away to the Red Sea, which, according to the legend, has been her abode ever since.

Nocturnal emissions were believed by Jews to be evidence that the man had been visited by Lilith in the form of a succubus. It is said that she is cursed to give birth to children continuously, but that they are malformed half-demons who die at birth. As a way of getting revenge for that against the sons of Adam, they said that Lilith also visited infant boys in their sleep to suffocate them. Thus, every instance of the mysterious malady known as “crib death ” (which affects mostly boys) was attributed to Lilith, and superstitious Jews would leave magical amulets on the walls of their children ’s bedrooms to ward off these attacks. The word “lullaby ” is believed to derive from the incantations that Jews would sometimes say over their children while putting them to bed, again to protect them from Lilith. This is also the origin of the Jewish and European custom of letting boys grow their hair long until age three: to trick Lilith into thinking that they are girls. Some even dressed their sons in girls ’ clothes during this vulnerable period in their lives.

Amazingly, Lilith is not just a figure in Jewish cabalistic demonology, but appears in the mythologies of other cultures as well. In ancient Sumer she was called “Lilitu, ” which means “Queen of the Night, ” and they believed that she preyed on people during their sleep, just like the Jews did. She was called by the Babylonians “Lamashtu, ” meaning “the Daughter of Heaven. ” Lamashtu was known for strangling babies and drinking their blood. In ancient Greece she was called “Lamia ” and was said to have had an affair with Zeus. In jealousy, Zeus ’ wife Hera killed all of their children, so it retaliation, Lamia began to kidnap and murder human babies. This is similar to the Jewish Lilith ’s motivation to kill infants.

However, the real reason why Lilith desires the sons of Adam as sexual partners is actually because Adam wasn ’t her first consort, or the lover whom she is truly pining after. In fact, rabbinical sources maintain that the first hermaphroditic pair was not Lilith and Adam but Lilith and the demon Samael. The creature that they formed together was a monstrous serpent, apparently equivalent to the one that later tempted Adam and Eve in the Garden. The cabalists called this Lilith-Samael creature “the Beast ” and “the Other God. ” (This is especially interesting because, as we will soon discuss, some Gnostics referred to the “Demiurge ” who they believed had created physical reality by the name of “Samael ” also.) It is clear from the cabalists ’ texts that they saw this Lilith-Samael monster as the serpent that tempted Adam and Eve in the Garden of Eden. They even saw it as the father of Eve ’s son Cain. Treatise on the Left Emanation by R. Isaac b. Jacob Ha-Kohen and Tr. Ronald C. Kiener describes Samael as evil, but specifies that this is:

… not because of his nature but because he desires to unite and intimately mingle with an emanation not of his nature… .

A sigil (a magical insignia) designed for Baphomet by nineteenth-century occultist Stanislas de Guaita includes the names of the demons Samael and Lilith. The opposite side of this sigil shows the figure of a man, with the names “Adam ” and “Eve ” written around it. We read in Treatise on the Left Emanation that:

In this tradition it is made clear that Samael and Lilith were born as one, similar to the form of Adam and Eve who were also born as one, reflecting what is above.

In this instance the text seems to be saying that Adam Kadmon —the Adam-Eve hermaphrodite being —cast a reflection (or perhaps more appropriately, a shadow) that created the monstrous hermaphrodite entity of Lilith-Samael. However, while the human pair are described as “above ” (and therefore, presumably, superior to) the serpent pair, cabalistic writings suggest that the serpents represent something older and more primordial, as the Abyss (nothingness or chaos) that they come from is considered older than creation.

It appears that the fathers of Western occultism were well aware of the legends about Lilith and Samael. Why else would their names have been included on De Guaita ’s Baphomet sigil (particularly with the names of Adam and Eve included on the other side of the sigil)? We also can presume that it is these two snakes who are being represented by the caduceus staff that Eliphas Levi depicted rising from Baphomet ’s crotch region. The caduceus (the ancient symbol of a pole encoiled with two snakes) has been connected not only to Hermes and alchemy (both things associated with Baphomet), but also with the image of a crucified serpent, and of the snake coiled around the Tree of Knowledge in the Garden of Eden. Now we know why!

The fact that the Baphomet sigil is also presented frequently with the word “Leviathan ” indicates that some occultists have been aware that this is also another name for the same figure. Leviathan, described in the Old Testament as a giant sea dragon capable of encircling the Earth, is said to be either female, or part of a hermaphroditic beast just like Lilith and Samael. Sometimes Leviathan ’s male counterpart is said to be Behemoth, a land beast. Sometimes the pair is just referred to in the plural as “the leviathans. ”

Very similar things are said about Leviathan and her consort as are said about Lilith and Samael. They are clearly just different names for the same figures. In both cases, it is said that they were once together physically, but that God separated them, because the act of their mating was somehow dangerous to the well-being of the universe. So, in both cases, they were cleaved apart, castrating the male, and preventing them from ever uniting sexually again. With both sets of characters, it is written that if they ever come together again, all of existence will somehow be annihilated.

In the case of the leviathans, it is said numerous times in the Bible that at the End of Times, God will slaughter them and feed their flesh to the righteous among men. This will take place at a feast with the messiah in the New Jerusalem, inside of a tent made from the monsters ’ skin. This is what the Jewish festival known as the “Feast of the Tabernacles ” is meant to celebrate, and it is probably why the early Christians adopted the fish as their symbol.

Because Samael and Lilith (a.k.a. Leviathan and Behemoth) are constantly longing for each other, they found a way to mate via an “intermediary ” called “Tanin ’iver ” (“Blind Dragon ”) or “the Groomsman. ” We read about it in Treatise on the Left Emanation :

> You already know that evil Samael and wicked Lilith are like a sexual pair who, by means of an intermediary, receive an evil and wicked emanation from one and emanate to the other… . The heavenly serpent is a blind prince, the image of an intermediary between Samael and Lilith. Its name is Tanin ’iver. The masters of tradition said that just as this serpent slithers without eyes, so the supernal serpent has the image of a spiritual form without color —these are “the eyes. ” The traditionists call it an eyeless creature, therefore its name is Tanin ’iver. He is the bond, the accompaniment, and the union between Samael and Lilith. If he were created whole in the fullness of his emanation he would have destroyed the world in an instant.

Now this is getting really kinky! This Tanin ’iver is a “slithering serpent ” without eyes who somehow enables the castrated Samael to have sex with Lilith. But if he were to “manifest fully, ” then the destruction of the universe, which happens whenever these two “truly ” mate, would come about anyway. So whatever Tanin ’iver does for them, it has the capability of being just as good as the real thing. But mercifully, right now, it is not, or else we would all be dead.

More detail on this subject comes from The Zohar (I.152b-153a, as quoted by Andrei Orlov in Dark Mirrors), where the “intermediary ” is described as none other than “Azazel, ” the goat demon who figures so prominently in the Old Testament (as we will explain shortly):

Now observe a deep and holy mystery of faith, the symbolism of the male principle and the female principle of the universe… . [T]here is the line where the male and female principles join, forming together the rider on the serpent, and symbolized by Azazel.

So here the Tanin ’iver is likened to a “line ” that unites the two creatures, and is said to be “riding ” them, and to be symbolized by the goat-demon Azazel. Another passage from The Zohar (Vayetze 116, as quoted by Mark Biggs in The Case for Lilith) goes on further with the same language:

The unholy filth grasps the male above and the female below. Here, male and female join together. They are the rider on the serpent… . This is the secret of Azazel, which includes the male and female of defilement.

This exact same role —riding shotgun in-between a male-female pair that were formerly one hermaphroditic creature —was played by Azazel in another sacred text as well: the Slavonic pseudepigraphal Apocalypse of Abraham . Here he is described doing this with Adam and Eve. A vision is related of Adam and Eve standing under the Tree of Knowledge, entwined with each other physically, and with Azazel between them, feeding them both grapes. In his book Dark Mirrors: Azazel and Satanael in Early Jewish Demonology , Andrei A. Orlov compares this to a sexual menage a trois , and suggests that it may be an allusion to the first couple being “ridden ” via demonic possession.

Is this, then, what the work of the Tanin ’iver really entails? Is his function to facilitate the possession of human bodies by demons so that the spirits can “hook up ” with each other sexually? Couldn ’t it be that Baphomet is the Tanin ’iver, the Azazel that joins the serpent? Isn ’t he then like the “Philosophical Mercury ” —the “Azoth ” —of the alchemists which, they said, could bind any chemical marriage, no matter how unlikely? The product of alchemical marriage has always been represented as a Frankenstein chimera monstrosity like Baphomet, composed of many different types of animals and people. But, we must wonder: is it that the ultimate “chemical wedding ” is between angels or spirits and men, like what the cabalists seem to be saying has happened between Adam, Eve, Samael and Lilith?

In addition to being the primordial sex goddess, Lilith, is a path to divine wisdom —the forbidden wisdom of the Tree of Knowledge of Good and Evil, which, according to Genesis , opens the eyes of a person and allows them to see things like God does. The thirteenth century Spanish Kabbalist R. Isaac Hacohen said that Lilith is “a ladder on which one can ascend to rungs of prophecy. ” Similarly, we read in Left Emanation :

Concerning this point there is a received tradition from the ancient Sages who made use of the Secret Knowledge of the Lesser Palaces, which is the manipulation of demons and a ladder by which one ascends to the prophetic levels.

There are many other parallels as well between the cabalistic legends of Lilith-Samael in the Garden of Eden and the creation stories of the Gnostics. Gnostic cosmology describes creation as happening in a series of “aeons ” (just as in Genesis it happens over a period of “days. ”) However, the word “aeon ” not only means a lengthy span of time, but can also be thought of as a universe unto itself, with a living intelligence of its own too. Each aeon is generated by a “syzygy, ” a hermaphroditic male-female pair of intelligences. In the beginning, all of the primordial intelligences were together inside uncreated totality, which was called the “Pleroma. ”

However, just as Lilith wanted to be “on top ” of Adam sexually, Sophia refused to submit to the dominance of a sexual partner. Instead, she tried to generate an aeon parthenogenically, on her own. The result was a deformity, an “abortion, ” that was “cast outside of the Pleroma ” because of its hideousness, like a teen mother might discard her baby in a trash can or a toilet.

As the story goes, after Sophia ’s “abortion, ” the real “Father ” of all made a new pair, called “Christos-Holy Spirit, ” to clean up the mess that had been made outside of the Pleroma. He then created a new, unpaired aeon named “Jesus, ” and he formed the abortion into the new entity, “Sophia Achamoth ” (the lesser Sophia). Her name is related to the Hebrew word for wisdom, “Hokmah. ” Her pain at being separated from the Pleroma actually became the substance that Jesus then used (according to the Gnostics) to form the physical matter of the cosmos.

Achamoth, then, created the Demiurge out of that, and made him king of everything outside of the Pleroma, as well as the chief artificer in charge of rearranging matter. Then the Demiurge created the seven heavens below him, each with a god in charge of it. These seem to correspond with the planetary intelligences.

Note that, in this case, just as in Judaism, the “Fall ” from perfection is caused by knowledge (which the cabalists say created a false universe of “shells ” represented by the infernal “Qlipoth ” tree), in Gnosticism the Fall is caused by wisdom (Sophia) giving birth to a malformed creation. Sophia ’s “abortion ” can be thought of as parallel to the fact that, after being cast out of the Garden of Eden, Lilith was cursed to continue giving birth to demonic children (with no father, apparently) who would die as soon as they were born. Lilith is described in The Zohar as a “husk ” covering divine light, just as Gnostics said we are divine light trapped inside husks (our physical bodies).

Just as the Gnostics had stories about Sophia and the “aeons, ” cabalists have stories about hermaphroditic beings (Lilith-Samael and Adam-Kadmon) that personified primordial forces existing in a netherworld of chaos prior to the present creation. The cabalists infer that the Fall occurred when the first male- female pair was split apart. The Gnostics said it was when the female Sophia tried to be independent without her male half.

In Mesopotamia, Lilith ’s companion was the screech-owl. In the Old Testament, references to this animal are used to denote Lilith. Note that owls are seen as symbols of wisdom in the West, as an owl was the sidekick of the wisdom goddess Minerva (Athena to the Romans). You may recall that Minerva sprang spontaneously from the head of Zeus, just as Lilith is said to have randomly popped into existence from the Great Supernal Abyss. So Zeus fathered Minerva without a mate just like Sophia created the Demiurge in that same manner.

The legend of Lilith becomes even more complex when we learn that, according to cabalistic texts, there are in fact two Liliths: Lilith the Matron and Lilith the Maiden. The latter is described as the “slave ” or “handmaiden ” of the former. Lilith the Matron is said to be both the mate of Samael, and of God himself, seemingly the same as the Jewish concept of the Shekinah or “Matronit ” as the bride of God. It also seems analogous to the idea of Sophia as the bride of Jesus that some Gnostics adhered to. Lilith the Maiden comes across as her dark doppelganger, and also subordinate, just like the relationship between Sophia and Sophia-Achamoth in the Gnostic system.

Another Jewish legend that seems to be connected with these concepts asserts that the Shekinah was for a time “exiled, ” while a slave woman, her “handmaiden, ” took her place. The “handmaiden ” appears to be equated with the Egyptian kingly line. The Zohar (3:19a, as quoted by Alan Humm in his online article “Lilith in Kabbala: Zohar ”) tells us:

One day the companions were walking with Rabbi Shim ’on bar Yohai. Rabbi Shim ’on said: “We see that all these nations have risen, and Israel is lower than all of them. Why is this? Because the King sent away the Matronit from Him, and took the slave woman in her place. Who is this slave woman? The Alien Crown, whose firstborn the Holy One, blessed be He, killed in Egypt. At first she sat behind the handmill, and now this slave woman inherited the place of her mistress. ” And Rabbi Shim ’on wept and said: “The King without the Matronit is not called king. The King who adhered to the slave woman, to the handmaid of the Matronit, where is his honor? He lost the Matronit and attached Himself to the place which is called slave woman. This slave woman was destined to rule over the Holy Land of below, as the Matronit formerly ruled over it. But the Holy One, blessed be He, will ultimately bring back the Matronit to her place as before. And then, what will be the rejoicing? Say, the rejoicing of the King and the rejoicing of the Matronit. The rejoicing of the King because He will return to her and separate from the slave woman, and the rejoicing of the Matronit, because she will return to couple with the King. ”

Occult writers Nigel Jackson and Michael Howard, in their book The Pillars of Tubal-Cain , equate the slave woman mentioned here with Lilith. The metaphor is commonly thought to refer to the time of destruction of the Temple of Solomon and the exile of the Israelites to Babylon in the 6th century BC. But why then the reference to the “Egyptian slave woman ”? Although it was the Hebrews who were at one point the slaves of the Egyptians, several Egyptian women are depicted as slaves to important Old Testament figures, including Hagar, Abraham ’s slave and the mother of his disowned son Ishmael.

Interestingly, Hagar was said by cabalists R. Ya ’aqov and R. Yitzhaq to “resemble ” Lilith. Hagar and Ishmael were exiled to the desert to die of thirst after Abraham ’s wife Sarah became jealous of them. God miraculously saved them. This story of a slave woman as the mistress of the matron ’s husband, whom the legitimate wife is afraid of being displaced by implies the relationship of the younger Lilith as the slave or handmaiden of the elder.

Lilith the Maiden is said to be the consort of the demon Asmodeus. Her mother is purportedly a demoness named “Mehetabel, ” meaning “something immersed, ” which brings to mind the meaning of Baphomet ’s name, according to Hammer-Purgstall: “Baptism of Wisdom. ” The Zohar says that Lilith the Maiden incarnated in human form as Naamah, the daughter of the Cain ’s descendant Lamech (who accidentally killed Cain). Thus, the race of Lilith ’s human descendants are sometimes referred to by cabalists as the “sons of Naamah. ”

The Zohar further tells us that it was originally Naamah who first seduced the angels or “sons of God ” referred to in Genesis Chapter 6 (which we will talk about soon), causing them to lust after human females and incur God ’s wrath. Lilith the Maiden/Naamah also allegedly incarnated as Moses ’ Egyptian wife, Zipporah. Both Liliths were said to have taken form as the two prostitutes who approached King Solomon to judge in their dispute over the parentage of a young child (for which he famously ruled that the child should be cut in half and shared between them).

Others see Lilith and Naamah as just two of a quartet of concubines for Samael. According to cabalist Nathan Nota Poira:

Samael was given four kingdoms, and in each of them he has a concubine. The names of his concubines are: Lilith, whom he took as his consort, and she is the first one; the second is Naamah; the third, Even Maskit; and the fourth, Igrat daughter of Mahalath. and the four kingdoms are: first the kingdom of Damascus, in which is found the house of Rimmon; the second, the kingdom of Tyre, which is opposite the land of Israel; the third, the kingdom of Malta, which formerly was called Rhodos; and the fourth, the kingdom called Granata, and some say that it is the kingdom of Ishmael. And in each of these four kingdoms dwells one of the four aforementioned concubines.

These four “concubines ” are taken by other authors to be separate incarnations or emanations of the same goddess, Lilith. Besides Naamah and Lilith, the names of the other concubines vary according to the source. The above-quoted source names them as Even Maskit and Igrat. Other names that have been listed include Mahalath and Nega ’. They appear to be demons like Lilith, but some of them also specifically correspond to women mentioned in the Bible.

Mahalath is the daughter of Abraham ’s son Ishmael, whom he sired by the daughter of Kasdiel, the Egyptian sorcerer. Ishmael ’s father disapproved of the marriage and successfully pressured him into divorcing her before the baby was born. Mahalath —who is also known as Bashemath , interestingly enough — is said to have performed “sorceries ” in the desert with her mother, evoking a spirit named Igratiel, who had sex with Mahalath and conceived a daughter named Igrat. Mahalath later married Esau, the son of Isaac and brother of Jacob. Esau was the first of the kings of Edom.

Igrat went on to have sex with King David one night while he was sleeping, and conceived a child named Adad who was a duke of the nation of Edom. According to the cabalists, Adad is the same as the demon Asmodeus, or “Ashmodai, ” which comes from the Hebrew words “Sh ’mi Ad, Ad Sh ’mi, ” meaning “My name is Ad, Ad is my name. ” Of course, you will recall that Asmodeus was said to have been the husband of “Lilith the Maiden. ”

Asmodeus was the chief architect in a team of demonic stonemasons that Solomon allegedly enslaved to build his famous temple, according to Louis Ginzberg ’s Legends of the Jews . This makes him analogous to the figure of Hiram mentioned as the architect in the Bible, whom the Freemasons call Hiram Abiff and venerate in rituals. Another Jewish legend tells how Asmodeus took over King Solomon ’s throne for a while. If we consider the cabalistic legends mentioned above, this story could have been a memory of a real coup that occurred, as Asmodeus may have been, legitimately, the son and heir of David, and thus Solomon ’s brother and rival to the throne. To bring things full circle, although there were many historical kings of Edom named Adad (which was also the name of one of Ishmael ’s sons, and of an ancient storm god worshipped in that region), one in particular is said to have been married to a woman named Mehetabel. This, as we mentioned, is also the name of the mother of Lilith the Maiden.

Another human incarnation of Lilith was, allegedly, the Queen of Sheba, that mysterious woman described in I Kings Chapter 10 who came to visit King Solomon. “Sheba ” is thought to correspond to the ancient kingdom of Saba in Southern Arabia, which included Eritrea, Ethiopia and Yemen. Allegedly this queen visited Solomon because she had heard of his renowned wisdom and wanted to test it, for she too was a wise woman. She arrived bearing an enormous tribute of gold, spices and precious stones. She presented Solomon with a series of riddles to assay his wisdom, all of which he answered easily. She was so awestruck by his sagacity that she decided to convert to Solomon ’s religion of worshipping one God. Solomon, quite enamored of her, presented her with loads of expensive gifts in return, which she took home with her when her visit was over.

But according to extra-biblical references, there was much more to the relationship between Solomon and the Queen of Sheba. All of these legends agree that they were lovers. Stories originating in Ethiopia say that Solomon sired a son with her named Menelik, or, according to Nigel Jackson and Michael Howard, Mardek (meaning “son of the wise ”). Many scholars believe that the Song of Solomon or “Song of Songs ” found in the Old Testament was meant to be a poem about Solomon and the Queen. The text of the poem is overtly sexual in nature. References to sexual organs, as well as human body fluids like semen, vaginal secretions, female ejaculate, and menstrual blood, are disguised as “spikenard, ” “wine, ” “myrrh, ” “living waters, ” “the Rose of Sharon, ” and “the Lily of the Valley. ” The “bride ” in this poem describes herself as “black, ” which makes sense if she was an Ethiopian.

The Queen of Sheba is the subject of a number of bizarre folk tales, as related in The Pillars of Tubal-Cain by Jackson and Howard. One says that when she was a girl she was tied up in the branches of a tree as a sacrificial offering to a dragon. Seven “holy men ” came to rescue her by slaying the dragon. Some of the dragon ’s blood splashed on her left foot and leg, turning it into that of a goat. Solomon first caught sight of the leg when she walked across a mirrored floor in his palace. As the authors relate, “Solomon decided that she must be one of the desert demons known as the seirim, who follow Azazel, or the demonic vampire Lilith. ” The goat imagery directly relates to Baphomet, and the goat-demon Azazel will be discussed in greater detail later on.

Other stories about the Queen of Sheba include one stating that Solomon gave her the emerald Grail stone that fell from Lucifer ’s crown, which was later carved into the cup used by Jesus at the Last Supper. The Grail legends tell us that Sheba built the “Ship of Solomon,” which was made from timber taken from the Tree of Knowledge, and could travel through time. There is also a Masonic tradition that King Solomon had three of his stonemasons murder the Master Mason of his temple, Hiram Abiff, because the Queen of Sheba had fallen in love with him and Solomon was jealous.

Of course, we know that in Jewish folk tales, the architect of Solomon ’s Temple was the demon Asmodeus, consort of the lesser Lilith. So really, if the Queen of Sheba was actually a lesser Lilith figure incarnated, the personality whom Solomon might have been jealous of, then, was Asmodeus. The meaning of the story told in the paragraph above is that Sheba was of the bloodline of the Dragon (Lilith-Samael), and of Azazel the Goat. So that could have been why her body had features of that genetics (like a goat ’s legs).

Interestingly, many self-professed practitioners of witchcraft (which tended to run in families in Old Europe) considered Lilith to be their queen, and an ancestor. There were also rumors that she was the great ancestress of the fairy race. The Inquisition referred to Lilith as “the Mother of the Witches. ”

As Howard Schwartz demonstrates in his book Lilith ’s Cave , Jewish folk tales are full of stories about such demonic marriages to Lilith. In these stories, any man may fall prey to being seduced by Lilith and, once married to her, cannot betroth another without incurring her perpetual curse. The seduction of the young man is most likely to take place just when he is about to be wed, which is the origin for the superstition that a man cannot see his bride before his wedding day. He must be kept under watch during this vulnerable time, for Lilith may take the form of his bride and seduce him.

In one recurring version of the story, a boy who is about to be wed is walking through a forest with the wedding ring, and in jest slips the ring on the branch of a log, or on a stray finger found sticking out of a log, whilst saying the wedding vows. After saying the words, the log either comes to life as Lilith, or else the finger is revealed to belong to that of a corpse that was buried in the log. Either way, the boy is now married to a lady of the underworld, an incarnation of Lilith. This was dramatized in Tim Burton ’s film Corpse Bride . In most versions of the tale, Lilith curses the young man ’s family until they all agree to share him. He is condemned to spend half of his time in the underworld with his demon wife, and half of his time on the surface with his other wife.

What these stories represent is the idea that Lilith was the first wife of Adam, or of God. But she got supplanted by another woman, just like Eve became Adam ’s new lover, and like the cabalist stories where God let his wife go so that he could shack up with a slave woman. Of course, she could say that she has more right to her husband than the new interloper. But in the end, she has to share him with the new woman, because she is from the unreal kingdom of chaos. Her claim on him isn ’t entirely enforceable, but it isn ’t entirely dismissible either.

Isaiah 34:14 refers to Lilith as a screech-owl, and says that she lives “in the desolate wilderness with wild cats, jackals and satyrs for company. ” These satyrs are the seirim (“hairy ones ”), descendants of the goat demon Azazel. A story from The Epic of Gilgamesh again suggests that Lilith can shape-shift into an owl. As retold in The Pillars of Tubal-Cain , the story is:

… of the goddess Inanna, the Queen of Heaven, and how she found a sacred willow tree on the banks of the Euphrates that had been uprooted in a violent storm. The goddess rescued the fallen tree and replanted it in her garden. She planned to use the wood for a new bed and throne. However after it was planted the tree refused to grow because a snake had nested in its roots, the fierce Azu or Zu thunderbird was roosting in its branches and Lilith had built a house in its trunk. Inanna was distraught and tearfully enlisted the help of semi-divine hero Gilgamesh. He slew the snake and cut down the tree so Zu and Lilith lost their habitats. Lilith grew owl wings and flew off to the wilderness cursing the goddess and her champion.

This connection of Lilith to a serpent and a tree brings to mind the story of the Garden of Eden again. The cabalists say it was Lilith and Samael who combined to play the role of the adversarial serpent tempting the protoplasts, Adam and Eve, with the fruit of God-like knowledge. But what is really meant by this imagery?

Although Lilith (nicknamed by cabalists the “Woman of Whoredom ”) seduced Adam, and bred a race of demons with him, Samael allegedly seduced Eve as well. So according to the cabalists, Adam and Eve both had their first sexual experience at the hands of the hermaphroditic serpent. There would seem to be a connection between these occurrences and the act of disobedience that caused Adam and Eve to fall from grace. Genesis Chapter 3:1-7 (KJV) tells us:

Now the serpent was more subtle than any beast of the field which the LORD God had made. And he said unto the woman, Yea, hath God said, Ye shall not eat of every tree of the garden?

And the woman said unto the serpent, We may eat of the fruit of the trees of the garden:

But of the fruit of the tree which is in the midst of the garden, God hath said, Ye shall not eat of it, neither shall ye touch it, lest ye die.

And the serpent said unto the woman, Ye shall not surely die:

For God doth know that in the day ye eat thereof, then your eyes shall be opened, and ye shall be as gods, knowing good and evil.

And when the woman saw that the tree was good for food, and that it was pleasant to the eyes, and a tree to be desired to make one wise, she took of the fruit thereof, and did eat, and gave also unto her husband with her; and he did eat.

And the eyes of them both were opened, and they knew that they were naked; and they sewed fig leaves together, and made themselves aprons.

It seems that, in part, the wisdom gained by eating the fruit of the Tree of Knowledge was awareness of their own sexuality, “carnal knowledge. ” Indeed the Hebrew word “yada,” meaning “to know,” also means “to have sex with,” and is used in that sense dozens of times throughout the Torah. This was the wisdom that the Serpent wanted to share with Adam and Eve. Upon becoming aware of their separate bodies, and of their differing genitals, they became anxious to cover them, so they made clothes for themselves. But when God saw that they had realized their own nakedness, he knew that they ’d eaten the forbidden fruit of knowledge. Genesis 3:8-11 (KJV) says:

And they heard the voice of the LORD God walking in the garden in the cool of the day: and Adam and his wife hid themselves from the presence of the LORD God amongst the trees of the garden.

And the LORD God called unto Adam, and said unto him, Where art thou? And he said, I heard thy voice in the garden, and I was afraid, because I was naked; and I hid myself.

And he said, Who told thee that thou wast naked? Hast thou eaten of the tree, whereof I commanded thee that thou shouldest not eat?

In a way, the serpent was telling the truth when he told Eve that eating the fruit of knowledge would not kill her, at least not immediately, and that it would make her like unto a god. Not only did she and Adam gain the awareness that had heretofore been forbidden to them, but they also gained the godlike power to produce life “in their own image. ” But this transgression did bring death into the world for the first time as well.

The state of being that seems to have existed before the Fall was one of timeless eternity: the perfection of undifferentiated oneness. That is alluded to not only by the words of Genesis , but also by the interpretations of it found in the traditions of Gnosticism and the Cabala. Perhaps this is why the chronology of the events in the first three chapters of Genesis is hard to follow in linear time. This story is a representation of how our universe, including linear time, was created. Thus the events themselves did not occur inside of linear time, but outside of it.

Like the aeons of the Gnostic creation, the “six days ” of creation as told in Genesis may represent the stages of development of a universe coagulating from a state of pure chaos. The first man, Adam Kadmon, existed prior to the creation we currently live in. Within this hermaphroditic being were all of the elements needed for the creation of the human race and maybe even the broader universe. The Garden of Eden could be thought of as a petri dish in which those elements were placed so that they could evolve into the first separate male and female. When the male and female elements separated into two distinct beings, they began to procreate, and that was when they were cast out of the Garden. That is when sexual generation, including life and death as we know it, began, as implied in the story of Genesis .

Perhaps this is why Eve is only given her name, which means “life,” in Chapter 3, Verse 20, after they were cursed by God for their transgression. The verse says that Adam called her that “because she was the mother of all living. ” Later, in Chapter 4, after they are driven from the Garden, Adam "knows " his wife for the first time, and she conceives both Cain and Abel. God makes it pretty clear in Chapter 3 that sexual reproduction is one of the curses that will haunt their lives now that they have eaten of the Tree of Knowledge. Eve will now be burdened with the pains of childbirth.

By the same token, Adam is cursed to forever struggle to harvest food to eat from the ground. Prior to the fall, in the Garden of Eden, all of his needs had been provided for effortlessly. But in a world of birth and death, one must work hard in order to survive. Genesis Chapter 3: 16-19 (KJV) states:

Unto the woman he said, I will greatly multiply thy sorrow and thy conception; in sorrow thou shalt bring forth children; and thy desire shall be to thy husband, and he shall rule over thee.

And unto Adam he said, Because thou hast hearkened unto the voice of thy wife, and hast eaten of the tree, of which I commanded thee, saying, Thou shalt not eat of it: cursed is the ground for thy sake; in sorrow shalt thou eat of it all the days of thy life;

Thorns also and thistles shall it bring forth to thee; and thou shalt eat the herb of the field;

In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread, till thou return unto the ground; for out of it wast thou taken: for dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return.

In the story of the Garden of Eden, the character known as “the serpent ” (the hermaphroditic demon Lilith-Samael) appears to be an ancestral spirit that follows the bloodline of the Biblical patriarchs in order to mate with them and to be incarnated into the bodies of their children. The biblical texts allude to these clandestine demonic marriages and the children that resulted from them but do not overtly explain what happened, as the cabalistic interpretations try to do. Lilith-Samael seems to specifically represent a lineage that the authors of the biblical texts would rather not discuss.

As we have mentioned before, many witches see Lilith as one of their main spiritual patrons, an ancestral mother-goddess figure, from the distant past to modern times. These people believe that witches are essentially a race of humans with magical powers that have been passed down the generations through blood. The origin of these powers, they believe, comes from the demons of the underworld, which they actually see as their ancestors. For a look into this worldview, see The Dragon Legacy by Nicholas de Vere.

Just as Adam and Eve were cast out of the Garden and laden with various curses as punishment for their transgressions, the serpent was also cursed because of its role in the deed. Genesis 3:14-15 states:

And the LORD God said unto the serpent, Because thou hast done this, thou art cursed above all cattle, and above every beast of the field; upon thy belly shalt thou go, and dust shalt thou eat all the days of thy life:

And I will put enmity between thee and the woman, and between thy seed and her seed; it shall bruise thy head, and thou shalt bruise his heel.

One of the mysteries of Genesis , if it is taken by itself and at face value, is that there are people —the spouses of certain people, and entire bloodlines descended from them —that are mentioned or hinted at, but whose names, origins, and ultimate destinies are not specified. So when the text refers to the serpent ’s “seed, ” we have to look elsewhere for clues.

God told the serpent that he would put “enmity ” between the serpent ’s “seed ” and that of the “woman. ” What “seed ” are we talking about? Well, again, Cain, destined to murder his brother Abel, is said, in cabalistic tradition, to have been the son of Eve seduced by Samael. So he was really half-human and half-demon. He and his descendants were the “seed ” of the serpent, and there was indeed enmity between him and his brother Abel, presumably a child of Adam and Eve. The cabalists even said that Lilith drank the blood of Abel after Cain murdered him.

There was also a continuing blood feud, according to extra-biblical texts like The Book of the Cave of Treasures , between the children of Cain and those of his second brother, Seth, who was born after Cain murdered Abel. Seth ’s birth was mentioned at the end of Genesis Chapter 4, after the story of Cain and Abel is told. But then the conception and birth of Seth is told of again in Chapter 5. That chapter begins with a yet another reiteration of the story of man ’s creation, and it is mostly similar to the Chapter 1 version. Genesis 5: 1-2 states:

This is the book of the generations of Adam. In the day that God created man, in the likeness of God made he him;

Male and female created he them; and blessed them, and called their name Adam, in the day when they were created.

The third verse then tells us that when Adam conceived Seth, he begat him “in his own likeness, after his image. ” Clearly it is being indicated that Seth was conceived using a special creation process modeled on the way in which God created Adam “in His own image, ” for this phrase was not used regarding the conception of Cain and Abel. Seth went on to have children of his own. With what women, it isn ’t specified, but a Jewish legend recounted by Ginzberg states that each of Adam and Eve ’s sons were born with a twin sister, whom they married. The line of Seth eventually resulted in Noah and from him the rest of the biblical patriarchs, all the way up to Jesus Christ.

Abel apparently died without progeny, while Cain, who was exiled to “the land of Nod,” went on to bear children and established several cities. All of Cain ’s descendants were credited in Genesis , Chapter 4 with inventions key to civilization, including agriculture, animal husbandry, metalworking, and music. Now here ’s a strange thing though: the names of Cain ’s descendants and those of his brother Seth are almost identical. Cain ’s descendants are listed as Enoch, Irad, Mahujael, Methusael, and Lamech. Meanwhile, Seth ’s descendants are said to be Enos, Cainan, Mahalaleel, Jared, Enoch, Mathuselah, and Lamech. It appears that there is again an attempt by the author of Genesis to cover up something disturbing, while still leaving coded allusions to the truth for clever readers to pick up on. It would seem that the author has attempted to write off the descendants of Cain as extinct and historically insignificant.

The land of “Nod ” to which Cain was banished seems like an imaginary parallel shadow-world, like the chaos that Lilith came from and lives in. Genesis makes it out to be a “wilderness. ” Jewish legend describes Cain ’s descendants as double-headed, dwarf-like creatures that literally live underground. Only six generations of Cain ’s descendants are given in Genesis . Lamech, the patriarch of the fifth generation after Cain, is said in Chapter 4 to have slain a “young man, ” with no further explanation. One has to look to extra-biblical Jewish legends to find out what this is about. As it turns out, there is a story stating that Lamech accidentally killed his ancestor Cain while hunting in the woods one day, mistaking him for an animal because for some reason he had horns on his head, like Baphomet.

After this brief reference to the slaying of the “young man, ” there is no further mention of the descendants of Cain, and the text abruptly segues to the birth of Seth. The implication is that Cain ’s race died off. But none of Seth ’s descendants, with names so similar to those of Cain ’s, are mentioned in Genesis as having invented any of the primary arts of civilization, as Cain ’s children did. The next thing that happens in the narrative of Genesis is the Deluge. Seth ’s seed supposedly survived this through the family of Noah, while Cain ’s would have presumably been wiped out.

Who then passed on the crafts of farming, metallurgy, and music-making? Did Seth ’s descendants learn these from the Cainites before the Flood? Or is it true that the story of the births of Seth and his children was invented to cover up the fact that it was Cain ’s descendants on board the Ark —which the serpent ’s lineage continued after the Deluge? This possibility seems more likely when we realize that the whole purpose of the Flood was God ’s attempt to exterminate this controversial lineage in the first place.

The story of the allegedly global Deluge begins at Mount Hermon. This is on the border between Syria and Lebanon, the tallest peak in Syria and the summit of what is called the Anti-Lebanon Mountain Range. A UN base lovingly nicknamed “Hermon Hotel ” is stationed there. This was the very place that The First Book of Enoch (a Jewish scripture dating back to 300 BC) refers to as “Ardis. ” According to this text, it was here that the group of 200 “Grigori ” or “Watchers ” descended for a meeting of what may have been the first secret society. There, they made a pact together, binding themselves with mutual “imprecations ” (oaths or curses), swearing that they would all take wives from “the daughters of men ” and breed children with them. The leader of the Grigori was said to be a figure named Samyaza.

From the descriptions in The First Book of Enoch , it seems that these Watchers are a form of angelic being from Heaven. Their act of seducing human women in this manner is portrayed as a transgression against God, just like the rebellion of Satan or Lucifer in Heaven is seen in the Christian tradition. Indeed, it seems that what is described here in The Book of Enoch is an explanation of what caused the so-called “war in Heaven ” of Christian theology, fought between the rebellious angels and those loyal to God. The actions portrayed here, corresponding to a shorter version of the story in Genesis Chapter 6, are shown as the real reason why God decided to cleanse the Earth by bringing about the Flood.

In The First Book of Enoch , the defiant angels are quite aware that their transgression will incur God ’s wrath. This is why they swear the oath to one another before they begin, promising to go through with the act. As it states:

It happened after the sons of men had multiplied in those days, that daughters were born to them, elegant and beautiful. And when the angels, the sons of heaven, beheld them, they became enamoured of them, saying to each other, Come, let us select for ourselves wives from the progeny of men, and let us beget children.

Then their leader Samyaza said to them; I fear that you may perhaps be indisposed to the performance of this enterprise; And that I alone shall suffer for so grievous a crime.

But they answered him and said; We all swear; And bind ourselves by mutual imprecations, that we will not change our intention, but execute our projected undertaking.

Then they swore all together, and all bound themselves by mutual execrations. Their whole number was two hundred, who descended upon Ardis, which is the top of mount Armon.

That mountain therefore was called Armon, because they had sworn upon it, and bound themselves by mutual imprecations.

“Mount Armon, ” or Mt. Hermon, has been said to mean “Mount of the Curse, ” because the angels took their oath, and thus cursed themselves, upon that mountain. The word “Hermon ” is also similar to the name of the Greek god “Hermes, ” who holds many mythological parallels to the Biblical figure of Enoch, the purported author of this text. There is another Enoch listed as the son of Cain in Genesis , as previously mentioned. Cain allegedly built a city that was named after this son. But the Enoch of the book that bears his name is said to be a descendant of Seth —grandson of Mahalaleel and great-grandfather of Noah.

The First Book of Enoch says that giants were born from the human-angel unions, and that they ravaged the earth with their ravenous appetites:

And the women conceiving brought forth giants, Whose stature was each three hundred cubits. These devoured all which the labor of men produced; until it became impossible to feed them; When they turned themselves against men, in order to devour them; And began to injure birds, beasts, reptiles, and fishes, to eat their flesh one after another, and to drink their blood.

At this point in the story another figure enters the picture. He is named Azazel, and he is said to be guilty of teaching mankind forbidden knowledge. The text says:

Moreover Azazyel taught men to make swords, knives, shields, breastplates, the fabrication of mirrors, and the workmanship of bracelets and ornaments, the use of paint, the beautifying of the eyebrows, the use of stones of every valuable and select kind, and all sorts of dyes, so that the world became altered.

Another quote from The First Book of Enoch demonstrates that this forbidden teaching was offensive to God, and that people were not meant to know these things. Referring to the iniquity and rebellion that caused God to bring about the Flood, Enoch tells Noah:

They have discovered secrets, and they are those that have been judged; but not thou, my son. The Lord of Spirits knows that thou are pure and good, free from the reproach of discovering secrets.

As a punishment for his sins, Azazel is cast into a dark prison that is also described as “the desert, ” in a place named “Dudael ” (Hebrew for “Cauldron of God. ”) We read:

Again the Lord said to Raphael, Bind Azazyel hand and foot; cast him into darkness; and opening the desert which is in Dudael, cast him in there. Throw upon him hurled and pointed stones, covering him with darkness; There shall he remain for ever; cover his face, that he may not see the light. And in the great day of judgment let him be cast into the fire.

Interestingly, even though the instigator of the sexual crimes committed by the angels is said to be Samyaza, the teaching of secrets was instigated by Azazel. So Jehovah decided to lay the blame most heavily upon him. The First Book of Enoch quotes God as saying:

All the earth has been corrupted by the effects of the teaching of Azazyel. To him therefore ascribe the whole crime.

As for the giants born of angels and men, God decided to bring about the Flood in order to rid the Earth of them. But he also decided to thin their population as much as possible first, by sending his angels to instigate violence amongst the giants, so that they killed each other off. As it states:

To Gabriel also the Lord said, Go to the biters, to the reprobates, to the children of fornication; and destroy the children of fornication, the offspring of the Watchers, from among men; bring them forth, and excite them one against another. Let them perish by mutual slaughter; for length of days shall not be theirs.

After the Watchers are forced to watch their children die, they are cast into the pit under the earth, where they are cursed to suffer and await the Final Judgment:

To Michael likewise the Lord said, Go and announce his crime to Samyaza, and to the others who are with him, who have been associated with women, that they might be polluted with all their impurity. And when all their sons shall be slain, when they shall see the perdition of their beloved, bind them for seventy generations underneath the earth, even to the day of judgment, and of consummation, until the judgment, the effect of which will last for ever, be completed.

Then shall they be taken away into the lowest depths of the fire in torments; and in confinement shall they be shut up for ever. Immediately after this shall he, together with them, burn and perish; they shall be bound until the consummation of many generations.

Although it is not told in so much detail, this same story is alluded to in The Book of Genesis . In Chapter 6 (KJV) we read:

And it came to pass, when men began to multiply on the face of the earth, and daughters were born unto them, that the sons of God saw the daughters of men that they were fair; and they took them wives of all which they chose… .

There were giants in the earth in those days; and also after that, when the sons of God came in unto the daughters of men, and they bare children to them, the same became mighty men which were of old, men of renown.

The Hebrew word that has been translated as “giants ” is “Nephilim. ” What this word specifically means in Hebrew is “those who were cast down, ” “those who caused others to fall, ” or “those who battle ” (i.e., “those who fall upon others ”). The Deluge narrative is told in Chapter 6 also, immediately after the reference to the sons of God mating with human females. Suddenly God declares that he regrets mankind ’s creation because of its inherent “wickedness, ” and because “the Earth was filled with violence. ” He decides to destroy all life on Earth, except for Noah and the rest of the passengers chosen to board the Ark. Man was deemed wicked not because of sin in the ordinary sense (which had not actually been invented yet), but because they had interbred with angels and created a hybrid race, of which God did not approve.

The part about Azazel teaching forbidden knowledge to man is not specified in Genesis , as it is in The First Book of Enoch . Also, the picture of Azazel as an intermediary between Samael and Lilith, as described in The Zohar , is also not mentioned (nor are the names of Samael and Lilith). However, Azazel is mentioned in Leviticus . Here the temple rituals for the Israelites are specified. One of them involves the sacrifice of two goats on the holy day of “Yom Kippur, ” the Day of Atonement. In Chapter 6, God tells the high priest Aaron to “place lots upon two goats, one marked for the Lord, and the other marked for Azazel. ”

The Azazel goat was marked with a red string tied around his head. While the goat for the Lord was killed at the temple as an atonement sacrifice, the Azazel goat, or “scapegoat, ” as it is often termed, was forced, like Azazel in The First Book of Enoch , to bear the burden of everyone else ’s sin. The priest would confess the sins of the community with his hands placed on the head of the goat, laying the weight of those sins upon him. The goat was then led off into the desert and pitched over the side of a rocky cliff. A white cloth was also affixed to the door of the temple sanctuary, and it would supposedly turn red the moment the goat hit the bottom.

Azazel ’s name has been given several interpretations. These include “rugged and strong, ” which accurately describes the disposition of a mountain goat. Others are “he who is sent away, ” or “goat that disappears. ” The ceremony is clearly mimicking God ’s punishment of Azazel as related in The First Book of Enoch , by casting him in the desert prison of Dudael (or else The First Book of Enoch was written to explain the ritual). Parallels can also be seen with the story of Cain, cast into the land of Nod, which we described earlier as possibly a nebulous, ephemeral state of existence, or even non-existence. Indeed, the word “Nod ” means “to wander ” in Hebrew. Perhaps not coincidentally, “nod ” means “to sleep ” in English. So the land of Nod appears to represent a dream-like world of confusion and chaos, like the Abyss of the cabalists where the demons are said to live and which creation came out of.

In The Case for Lilith , author Mark Wayne Biggs makes the case that Samyaza in The First Book of Enoch is the same figure as Samael. He argues that Azazel is not one of the Watchers so much as a son of Lilith and Samael. He believes that before the angels could breed with humans, they needed to know how to speak the true name of God. This, as we mentioned, can purportedly be used to create magical effects, including bringing things to life, when pronounced correctly. Biggs theorizes that Samyaza/Samael gained his knowledge from Lilith, his lover, and then used it to bring their son Azazel to life by pronouncing it during their mating. This same process, writes Biggs, was then subsequently used by the rest of the Watchers when breeding the Nephilim giants with human women.

None of these connections seem far-fetched, although the idea of Azazel being Lilith and Samael ’s son doesn ’t entirely square with the idea that he is needed to facilitate their sexual union in the first place. At any rate, in a sexual union between a creature of flesh and a spirit, it seems reasonable that a magical process might be required to bring forth fleshly progeny. Note that both Azazel in The First Book of Enoch and the descendants of Cain in Genesis are credited with teaching mankind forbidden arts and crafts such as metallurgy. As noted, the descendants of Cain are a bloodline cast off into the wilderness by God ’s curses— just as Azazel was cast into the desert. This could also be said of Hagar, the slave woman and mother of Ishmael through Abraham, who, as we said, were both were cast off by Abraham and left to die in the desert (but miraculously lived), and whose bloodline was disinherited. We know that Hagar is considered by cabalists to be an incarnation of Lilith.

Interestingly, there is a sect in Iraq called the Yezidis who worship and claim biological descent from a “half-angel ” whom they alternately refer to as “Yazd, ” “Azazil, ” or “Melek Taus ” (“Peacock King ”). The Yezidi faith is an interesting mix of Jewish, Christian, Islamic, and seemingly satanic traditions. However, they believe that any enmity between the Peacock King and the Most High God will be reconciled at the Final Judgment, and the souls of the Yezidis will be forced into Heaven through the pronouncement of magical formulae that will somehow compel God ’s will. This can be gleaned from reading Isya Joseph ’s commentary on the Yezidi scripture called The Black Book, published as Devil Worship: The Sacred Books and Traditions of the Yezidis .

Twelfth-century Jewish scholars Nahmanides and Abraham ibn Ezra both wrote that Azazel was the chief of the seirim , or “goat demons. ” As previously mentioned, these beings are described as satyrs, the word for the half-goat creatures of Greek mythology, and they live in the desert. They are considered analogous to the jinn of Islamic legend, spirits of “smokeless fire, ” some of whom rebelled against God and now curse mankind with mischievous tricks. Among other things, the jinn possess people, seduce people, and sometimes even breed with them. Sometimes they are very malicious, causing harm to infants, for example. In these ways, the jinn, and thus the seirim , seem the same as the descendants of Lilith.

Indeed, in the word “jinn ” there may be an etymological vestige of “Cain. ” Sumeriologist L.A. Waddell thought him to be the same figure as “Kan, ” “Gan ” or “Gin, ” found on the kings lists of the Sumerians, Babylonians and Chaldeans. It may be also that this family of words is connected to the English words “king ” and “kin. ” He describes him as one of the first kings on Earth. But the cabalists also saw him as part of a family of goat-demons, along with Azazel and the “serpent ” Lilith-Samael. The political implications of this are interesting, for the Devil is considered the “Lord of the Earth. ” It would seem, perhaps, that the serpent, by possessing and seducing humans, was successful in not only penetrating the bloodline of Adam, but also putting his/her descendants in line to inherit the thrones of the world.

This is the real idea behind conspiracy theories, popular for centuries and now more so than ever, that the elite of the world serve the agenda of Satan, meeting in secret to plot the downfall of most of humanity. The fraternity most commonly associated with this plot is the Freemasons. It is to the symbolism of their mascot —not coincidentally, a goat —that we turn our attention to next.

Chapter 3: The Goat-Faced Wild Man

He [Satan] taught women the art of seduction, men to satisfy their feelings in their double sexual desires, he ran rim in color, discovered the flute and set the muscles in rhythmical movement, until the divine mania embraced the heart and the divine Phallus with its opulence sowed the fruitful womb.

Stanislaw Przybyszewski, The Cult of Satan ’s Church

The relationship between the Freemasons and the Knights Templar is one of contention. Detractors of both organizations often accuse them of being part of a united anti-Christ conspiracy of occult secret societies spanning the last nine centuries. Meanwhile “debunkers ” who wish to demystify the origins of Freemasonry claim that any connection is purely mythical, a product of a romantic imagination. Most scholars admit that the Masonic tradition received inspiration from the Templars, as they did from many old traditions. The rituals of the Freemasons pertain to the secrets of Solomon ’s Temple, the site of which the Templars originally called home, and which they named their organization after. The fact that there is a rank in York Rite Masonry explicitly called the “Knights Templar degree ” makes the connection seem rather overt.

If the Freemasons are continuing the secret doctrine of the Templars, one would expect the rituals to Baphomet to have continued on in the Masonic order as well. Indeed the subject of Baphomet is addressed in the handbook for Scottish Rite Freemasons entitled Morals and Dogma by Albert Pike. Echoing the thoughts of Eliphas Levi, he wrote of Baphomet as the magical force of the universe:

There is in nature a most potent force, by means whereof a single man, who could possess himself of it, and should know how to direct it, could revolutionize and change the face of the world… .

This force was known to the ancients… . If science can but learn to control it, it will be possible to change the order of the seasons, to produce in night the phenomena of day, to send a thought in an instant around the world, to heal or slay at a distance, to give our words universal success, and make them reverberate everywhere.

This agent … is precisely what the adepts of the Middle Ages called the elementary matter of the great work. The Gnostics held that it composed the igneous body of the Holy Spirit, and it was adored in the secret rites of the Sabbat or the Temple, under the hieroglyphic figure of Baphomet or the hermaphroditic Goat of Mendes.

There is a life-principle in the world, a universal agent, wherein are two natures and a double-current of love and wrath. This ambient fluid penetrates everything. It is a ray detached from the glory of the Sun, and fixed by the weight of the atmosphere and the central attraction. It is the body of the Holy Spirit, the universal agent, the serpent devouring its own tail. With this electro-magnetic ether, this vital and luminous caloric, the ancients and the alchemists were familiar. Of this agent, that phase of modern ignorance termed physical science talks incoherently, knowing naught of it save its effects; and theology might apply to all of its pretended definitions of spirit… .

Far beyond the mere fertility of vegetation that most scholars have viewed Baphomet as a symbol of, Pike seems to be describing this figure as representative of the root of all physical powers and energies, now described, as Pike contemptuously states, according to the schematics of modern physics. While the prevailing model was by no means settled in Pike ’s day, we imagine he was saying that what we now describe as electromagnetism, as well as gravity and the strong and weak nuclear forces, are all derived from this root. We can understand, then, why occultists still think of the knowledge of how to master this power as the ultimate mystery, and the ultimate wisdom.

In the book The American Quarterly Review of Freemasonry and Its Kindred Sciences, Volume 1 (1858), edited by Freemasonic scholar Albert Mackey, an article entitled “Horae Esotericae ” by Giles F. Yates refers to an Arabic book called Sun of Suns and Moon of Moons that Yates found untranslated in the library of his Masonic lodge. There, he says, the author identifies an entity named “Bafumed or Karuf [calf] ” symbolizing “the secrets of the nature of the world, or secret of secrets. ” This book apparently was known in the past, and may have been lost.

We know it existed because of the work of ninth to tenth-century alchemist Ibn Wahshiyya, most famous for translating the mysterious Book of Nabathean Agriculture into Arabic. He wrote a book called Ancient Alphabets and Hieroglyphic Characters Explained , which was translated into English by none other than Joseph von Hammer-Purgstall, who published his version in 1806, twelve years before his Baphomet essay. Ancient Alphabets also makes reference to “Bahumed, ” “Bahumed, ” or “Bahumet ” and to the Sun of Suns book, which Ibn Wahshiyya claims to have translated from Nabathean into Arabic.

He says the subject of the book is “the discovery of the Hermesian alphabets, ” and then provides, presumably from that source, a hieroglyph of a beetle-like creature which he says is:

…expressive of the most sublime secret, called originally Bahumed and Kharuf (or calf), viz. The Secret of the nature of the world, or The Secret of Secrets, or The Beginning and Return of every thing.

This all-encompassing interpretation of the meaning of Baphomet as “the biggest thing ever, ” seemingly shared by so many revered Masonic scholars, may explain why, according to Freemasons for Dummies by Christopher Hodapp:

Some early ritual books from the fraternity referred to God as “God of all Things ” and abbreviated it as GOAT. That was quickly changed, and God is now referred to by Freemasons by the acronym GAOTU, for Grand Architect of the Universe.

The change was made because outsiders to the club viewed their use of the word “GOAT ” to symbolize the creator God as blasphemous and satanic. But there is much more linking Freemasonry and goats. The animal is widely claimed by non-members to be part of the hazing rites for initiation into Freemasonry, during a ceremony supposedly called “Riding the Goat. ” Most Masonic literature on the subject makes it out to be a joke, based on the accusations of a secret doctrine of Satanism that have been made against the brotherhood by anti- Masons throughout the years. As we read from Albert Mackey ’s Encyclopedia of Freemasonry and its Kindred Sciences (1917):

The idea that “riding the goat ” constitutes a part of the ceremonies of initiation of a Masonic lodge has its real origin in the superstition of antiquity. The old Greeks and Romans portrayed their mystical god Pan in horns and hooves and shaggy hide, and called him “goat-footed. When the demonology of the classics was adopted and modified by the early Christians, Pan gave way to Satan, who naturally inherited his attributes, so that to the common mind the devil was represented by the he-goat, and his best-known marks were the horns, the beard, and the cloven hoofs. Then came the witch stories of the Middle Ages, and the belief in the witch orgies, where, as it was said, the devil appeared riding on a goat. These orgies of the witches, where, amid fear of blasphemous ceremonies, they practiced initiation into their Satanic rites, became, to the vulgar and illiterate, the type of the Masonic mysteries; for, as Dr. [George] Oliver says, ‘It was in England a common belief that the Freemasons were accustomed in their lodges ‘to raise the devil. ’

In Volume 14 of The Short Talk Bulletin of the Grand Lodge of New Brunswick in May 1936, the same argument was made, tracing the Masonic goat back to Pan via Satan, but also, back to Azazel. As it states:

The idea that the sins of the people might be transferred to a goat, which, driven into the wilderness to die, carried away the moral trespasses with which he was symbolically loaded, doubtless had much to do with the change which came over the complexion of the Great God Pan, when Christianity commenced to rewrite the ancient heathen mythology. Gently Pan, who harmed no one beyond creating terror, became first Satanic, and then, in the end, Satan himself.

A similar analysis is found in Thomas Wright ’s Worship of the Generative Powers (1865), one of the first works in English to examine Joseph von Hammer- Purgstall ’s “Baphometic Idols. ” In it, Wright demonstrates amazing similarity between the rituals that the Knights Templar were accused of doing, and the rites of the pre-Christian cult of Priapus. Also remarkably similar were the purported activities of many Gnostic groups, the Cathar heretics of France, and the European witch cults of the Middle Ages. We even see the same symbolism in the Satanic “Black Mass, ” allegedly celebrated throughout the centuries by the supposed “fifth column ” of Satanist priests who purportedly lurk in secret within the upper echelons of the Catholic Church. Wright believed that the Christian image of “Satan ” was in fact largely based on images of Priapus, and attempted to demonstrate that the traditions of underground “Satanist ” and “witchcraft ” cults were actually sublimated forms of Priapism.

After cataloging the widespread use of votive phalluses throughout Pre- Christian Europe, Wright describes how what he called the “cult of Priapus ” spread deep into Europe. In Greek mythology, Priapus was of divine parentage (variously fathered by Pan, Hermes, or Zeus, depending on the story). He was cursed by Hera to be ugly and to have a dirty mind. He was so unpleasant to the other gods that they pitched him over the side of a cliff, like the Azazel goat on Yom Kippur. He landed on Earth and was raised by shepherds as one of their own.

Just as Hera cursed him to be, Priapus shared the stereotypical interests of pastoral Greek herdsmen: bestiality and the rape of passers-by. As part of his affliction, Priapus had a giant penis with an almost-perpetual erection, which he would nonetheless lose at certain key moments, much to his frustration. For instance, as he was attempting to rape the sleeping nymph Lotis (or the goddess Hestia, in the version told by Ovid), a donkey brayed, waking the victim just in time and causing the loss of his erection. In retribution, Priapus is said to have raped the donkey to death, and the brutal sacrifice of these animals was part of his cult from that point onward.

It is interesting that Priapus was considered a symbol of fertility, despite his association with impotence as well. This is a problem that the she-demon Lilith was said by Jews to cause. The association of the Priapian cult with dildos also reminds us of Samael ’s need for an “intermediary ” to simulate sex with his bride. One can see a parallel here between the unfulfilled lust of Priapus and the yearning that the castrated Samael has for Lilith. Perhaps his gigantic erection symbolizes potential energy unspoiled, stored up for future use, its magnitude only increased by repeated frustration of desire.

Statues of Priapus were traditionally placed in gardens, where they were believed to engender the crops. They also fulfilled a scarecrow-like function, protecting the crops not only from rapacious fowl, but also from people who might steal or otherwise tamper with them. Placards placed in gardens warned that Priapus would rape trespassers —vaginally, anally, or orally —if the crops were harmed in any way. The Priapian tradition was also related to the use of “herms, ” which consisted of the head of a satyr on top of a squared-off column with a large erect phallus jutting out the center. These were rubbed for good luck.

Likewise, Thomas Wright documents the continuation of Priapism throughout Christian Europe with the use of amulets and coins featuring disembodied penises, sometimes with hands, feet, and even penises of their own. These were worn for good luck, or, rather, for the warding off of the evil eye.

Likewise the “fig ” hand signal fulfilled a similar function, which could be performed either by making a fist with the thumb pushed between the middle and index finger, or else sticking the middle finger up alone, a la the modern “flipping off ” gesture. The true meaning of this signal, then, is a curse, to say “May Priapus (that is, the Devil) fuck you. ” But originally, it was done to ward off evil, or bring good luck at a time of need, just like “crossing your fingers ” is done now.

The Priapus statues called herms were so named because the features of Priapus and Hermes were in many ways conflated. For one thing, some genealogies had Hermes as the father of Priapus, or his grandfather via the half- goat, half-god-man known as Pan. All three of them have been depicted with horns and a goaty-looking beard in different instances —Pan most consistently, and Priapus quite often. Pan actually had the hairy legs and hooves of a goat, and was a full-blown satyr living in Arcadia, the unspoiled wilds where his father Hermes ruled. His mother and nurse were said to have fled in fear when they first saw him, because of the uncanny nature of his appearance. Despite this, they say, the gods of Olympus thought he was beautiful and may have named him “Pan ” (“All ”) because to them he was perfect.

However, another, less flattering, origin of his name is given by Servius, a commentator on the writings of Virgil, who tells us that his mother was Penelope, wife of Odysseus. In this version of the story, she purportedly had sex with all 108 of her suitors and somehow conceived Pan from all of them. This fits with Pan ’s association with sexual promiscuity. But many other sources, including Herodotus, Cicero, Apollodorus and Hyginus, claim that Pan ’s parents were Hermes and Penelope, which makes us wonder if the 108 suitors in Homer ’s epic were somehow symbolic of different aspects of Hermes.

Either way it is obscene, as Hermes was said by Homer to be Odysseus ’ great-grandfather. After he killed the suitors, Hermes led their souls to Hades personally.

Pan was a physical embodiment of the spirit of the wilderness, and is invoked as such even today. He inspired wonder and lust, as well as madness. A visit from him— invited or unprovoked, usually in some wild or desolate place — would bring crazy visions, “panic attacks ” (the word “panic ” stemming from his name), and sometimes permanent insanity. It is the madness that comes upon seeing the raw, wild, and androgynous root of sexual energy —the undivided, unpolarized energy of life itself that divides and ignites creation. Weird horror author Arthur Machen described a vision of this entity in his short story The Great God Pan :

Though horror and revolting nausea rose up within me, and an odour of corruption choked my breath, I remained firm. I was then privileged or accursed, I dare not say which, to see that which was on the bed, lying there black like ink, transformed before my eyes. The skin, and the flesh, and the muscles, and the bones, and the firm structure of the human body that I had thought to be unchangeable, and permanent as adamant, began to melt and dissolve.

I know that the body may be separated into its elements by external agencies, but I should have refused to believe what I saw. For here there was some internal force, of which I knew nothing, that caused dissolution and change.

Here too was all the work by which man had been made repeated before my eyes. I saw the form waver from sex to sex, dividing itself from itself, and then again reunited. Then I saw the body descend to the beasts whence it ascended, and that which was on the heights go down to the depths, even to the abyss of all being… .

Stories about frightening encounters with a Pan-like creature persist today with both urban and rural legends still being told about satyrs that rape, kill, and inspire madness. The deadly “Pope Lick Monster ” of Kentucky is one such example. The flying, blood-sucking “Chupacabra ” (“Goat-sucker ”) of South America is another (although he mostly chooses livestock for victims). The Native North American figure of the Wendigo has a similar reputation, as he lives in the deep woods and drives his prey crazy before he kills them. But his horns are described as deer antlers.

Having heard such stories in our youth many times before, we were quite surprised to come across a far more ancient version in The Book of Nabathean Agriculture . Here a creature called “Al-Ghul ” is described that sounds very similar to both Pan and Baphomet. It was said to be a human female from the waist up, with the legs and hooves of a donkey. Ghuls were described as living “in underground dens and dry, barren deserts, where people do not travel, ” just like Azazel and Lilith. The ghuls would only come out at night because the sun harmed them. Like the giant offspring of the Sons of God in Genesis or the Watchers in The First Book of Enoch , ghuls had a rapacious appetite for flesh and blood.

But their favorite prey was said to be humans. According to Nabathean Agriculture , ghuls can smell humans from far away, and “the utmost pleasure and lust of this animal is to get a human being in its power. ” Anyone who “looks attentively ” at it for a while will die of fright. In particular, if anyone under the age of 20 looks a ghul in the face, it was said that “he will become paralyzed ” upon seeing it and “will not be able to move until it takes him and cuts his throat and drinks his blood, ” after which the man, still living, had the horror of watching his penis and testicles get eaten by the creature, before it finally gobbles up his intestines. Arab astrologers identified a constellation in the heavens as “the head of the Ghul, ” and one of the blinking stars within as the eye with the deadly stare. The Greeks called this same constellation the head of the Gorgon monster, Medusa, a woman with a serpent ’s tale instead of legs (like Lilith), and serpents on her head, as well as a paralyzing stare like Al-Ghul.

Indeed, the whole story of the Gorgon and the “Aegis ” —the magical shield that it was affixed to —has an interesting tie-in regarding the goat symbolism that we are examining. According to the Greeks, their highest God, Zeus, was raised in hiding, exiled on the island of Crete for fear of being eaten by his father, Kronos. His wet nurse during his infancy was a she-goat named Amalthea. Her name means “tender,” specifically referring not to the financial term, but to that definition of “tender ” as “a person who attends to or takes charge of someone or some thing ” (Webster ’s College Dictionary , 1999). Some sources say the god Pan (also called “Aegipan ”) was nursed there alongside Zeus as well.

Having little thanks for the favors of Amalthea, Zeus had her slaughtered as soon as he was fully grown, and fashioned from her skin the “Aegis, ” an impenetrable shield. The word “aegis ” (or aigis) literally means “goat-skin. ” Zeus would shake this shield in the air in order to create thunder and lightning that could cause men to die of fright. Thus he earned the epithet “Aigiokhos,” meaning “wielder of the goat-skin. ” He also made the “cornucopia ” or “horn of plenty, ” from one of Amalthea ’s horns. This magical object contained an inexhaustible supply of fruits and flowers.

The Aegis is also the subject of other myths involving the figures of the bright-eyed wisdom goddess Athena, the cunning blacksmith god Hephaestus, and the Gorgon Medusa. Poet and mythographer Robert Graves believed that the Aegis originally belonged to Athena only, and that the myth was transposed onto Zeus at a later date. He also theorized that the reason why a goat was sacrificed at the Acropolis in Athens every year was because the Greeks saw the goat as a representation of Athena. He conjectured that the skin of the animal might have been placed on the shoulders of a statue of Athena after the sacrifice, as the Egyptians did with a ram skin to statues of their ram god Ammon. He thought that this may have been the origin of the ritual goatskin that would later be fashioned into the Aegis shield and associated with Zeus.

Eventually, the Aegis had the head of the Gorgon Medusa fixed to it, purportedly by Hephaestus, its real builder according to Homer. Euripides said that the Aegis was made from a goatskin that originally belonged to Medusa. You will recall that she had serpents on her head instead of hair and that one look at her face would turn a man to stone instantly. As we said, this was very similar to how the face of a ghul could cause mind-bending terror that paralyzed and sometimes even killed instantly. This was a property that was retained even after the head was severed by the hero Perseus, and affixed to the Aegis shield. The face was permanently frozen in a grimace of pain, its eyes rolling upward.

Could this unique state of madness and terror caused by things like Pan, Al-Ghul and Medusa be thought of as similar to that terrible “Baptism of Wisdom ” which Baphomet is named for: a realization of the horror of existence, like the Knowledge of Good and Evil that the Serpent blessed and cursed Adam and Eve with? Traditionalist Julius Evola, in his classic book The Mystery of the Grail , gave us a relevant description of how the vision of Baphomet affected the Templars:

The central ritual of Templar initiation was kept very secret. From one of the proceedings of the trial we learn that a knight who underwent it returned as pale as a corpse, and with a lost expression on his face, claiming that from then on he could never be happy again. Shortly after, the same knight fell into a state of invincible depression and died… What produces an extreme terror in some knights and causes them to flee… is the vision of an idol… the Baphomet.

Thomas Wright believed that the Knights Templar were practicing Gnostic rites of Priapism when they worshipped Baphomet, whom he saw as just another incarnation of Priapus. He found confirmation of this in the artifacts and images of Gnostic sex orgy rituals purportedly discovered by von Hammer-Purgstall on former Templar properties. These include images of the famous osculum inflame —the “obscene kiss ” of the rear end of a statue of a goat-headed entity, corresponding to the accusation that the Templars “kissed the anus of a goat ” during their rituals.

The Templar rites, as described by the knights under confession, were identical in many ways to the elements of the alleged “Witches ’ Sabbath ” that accused witches have confessed to attending throughout centuries of persecution in the Christian world. From the Middle Ages of Europe, to sixteenth century England, to colonial America, the descriptions of the Sabbath in these confessions are remarkably uniform. These ceremonies were officiated by a dark figure, usually described as a man dressed in black with a goat ’s head, or a man who could transform into a goat. There was a mock Eucharist with a black Host, blaspheming of God, and ritual trampling upon the Cross (just as the Templars are said to have done). New initiates were made to sign a black book pledging their soul to him, and they received a mark from the goat god that tagged them as belonging to him.

These witches had a number of different nicknames for this figure. According to The God of the Witches by Dr. Margaret Alice Murray, these include: the Black Man (or Man in Black), the Antecessor, Robin Artisson (or Robinus Filius Artis), Christsonday, and Janicot (supposedly meaning “Little John ” in Basque). Dr. Murray correctly connects this figure to a pre-Christian horned god:

The great Gaulish god was called by the Romans Cernunnos, which in the English parlance was Herne, or more colloquially “Old Hornie. ” In Northern Europe the ancient Neck or Nick, meaning a spirit, had such hold on the affections of the people that the Church was forced to accept him, and he was canonised as St. Nicholas, who in Cornwall still retains his horns. Our Puck is the Welsh Boucca, which derives either directly from the Slavic Bog “God ” or from the same root.

Puck and Cernunnos, along with the aforementioned Priapus, Pan, and Hermes (the Roman Mercury), all seem to be different versions of the same horned personality. To this we can also add the Greek Dionysus (the Roman Bacchus), the Roman Silvanus and Faunus, and the Celtic Green Man. What they have in common includes association with fertility, sexuality, luck, wealth, magical transformation, initiation, mischief, trickery, and the wilderness.

Puck (also related to bucca , a “male goat ” in Old English) was a mischievous fairy (or “pixie, ” another word related to his name). He was known for his “merry jests. ” He could be invoked by witches to perform small tasks in exchange for food and drink. He could also show up uninvited and perform mischief, such as causing milk to spoil. Depictions of him show him looking very much like both Baphomet and Priapus, with a goat head and goat legs, a gigantic erect phallus, and protruding breasts. Witches are shown in some of these images dancing around him, and he does seem to have been the figure invoked at a Witch Sabbath. Shakespeare named him both “Puck ” and “Robin Goodfellow ” in A Midsummer Night ’s Dream , calling him a “Hobgoblin ” and a “shrewd and knavish sprite. ”

As we mentioned, he was apparently known to witch covens as “Robin ” as well. He seems to have influenced the stories of the thief Robin Hood and his Merry Men (thieves like Hermes), including “Little John ” (whose name corresponds to Janicot, the Basque name for the goat god of the Witch Sabbath). Interestingly, a Robin Hood play was once performed at May Day (a witch holiday) every year by gypsies on the grounds of Rosslyn Chapel in Scotland (allegedly built by Templars who escaped persecution in France) under the patronage of the chapel ’s hereditary curators, the Sinclairs (a Templar-descended family).

Very similar goat man imagery is associated with several other figures, although their animal symbolism is not always that of a goat. For instance, the Roman Faunus eventually became amalgamated with Pan, as he was a wild god of the woods with horns and animal legs, but originally he was more of a wolf than a goat. There is also the horned Dionysus, the god of wine, who was more associated with the bull. To the Greeks, Dionysus was the god of divine madness, who revealed epiphanies to his followers when they were in a state of religious ecstasy. This was achieved through wild, drunken orgies in which sacrificial animals were torn to pieces by the teeth and claws of the worshippers. These rituals would have made the Priapists proud, undoubtedly setting the standard for the excesses of later Gnostic, Satanist, and witch cults. Dionysus was called “Eleutherios ” (“the Liberator ”) and “Lyaeus ” (“he who unties [the mind from worry] ”).

Purportedly, one of the items “revealed ” to initiates of the cult of Dionysus was a giant dildo, supposedly crafted and used anally by the god himself! The story of its origin states that a shepherd named Prosymnus helped Dionysus rescue his mother Semele from the underworld on the promise that he and the god could have sex afterwards. However, the shepherd died before the promise could be consummated. As a way of making amends, Dionysus made a phallus out of fig wood (the tree associated with Priapus because its fruit was seen as symbolic of the penis). He then placed it on the shepherd ’s tomb and proceeded to sit upon it!

Dionysus was often depicted as an androgynous or even feminine youth. When he made his appearance at these rituals (as a manifested spirit), he was described as disheveled with a manic look in his eyes, as if returning from a realm beyond known existence. This was the true “wilderness ” where he reigned, although it was symbolized by the forest, thus his epithet “dendrites ” (“of the trees ”). He was said to have come from the mythical “Mount Nysa, ” always described by the Greeks as someplace very far away and foreign to them. Just like the Gnostics and the witches of later times, the Dionysian mystery cults were at best just barely tolerated by the authorities, and frequently outlawed.

Other gods of the wilderness are usually shown as having a relationship to Dionysus. Silenus was one such figure, a wild man of the woods who is said in some myths to have raised Dionysus, or at least to have been in charge of finding him suitable foster parents. This happened after his mother was killed by the goddess Hera while he was still in utero , and his father Zeus had to carry him in his own testicles until he was ready to be born. Silenus was often portrayed as being part of the procession that would parade down the street during Dionysian festivals, along with satyrs and women with wild hair, their mouths still dripping blood from the brutal sacrifice.

Moving on to the myths of other cultures, the Celtic figure of Cernunnos is interesting for many reasons. He sits cross-legged like Eliphas Levi 's Baphomet. His epithet “Herne the Hunter ” sounds similar to Hermes. He was known as the “Lord of Wild Things. ” His name seems to mean “the Horned One. ” He has been connected by scholars to Mercury. Busts of his head showing two faces, back-to- back like the Roman Janus, have been found.

Cernunnos and Robin Goodfellow have both been connected to the Green Man, a.k.a. “Jack-in-the Green, ” whose foliage-sprouting face can be seen in gardens and greenery throughout Europe and the British Isles. Like the ritual phalli of Priapus, these fertility totems were omnipresent there at one time. They show the face of a man grimacing, seemingly almost under torture, as plants sprout from his face, and even from his nose and mouth. In a sense, it is reminiscent of the Gorgon head on the Aegis. He is frequently shown horned, and seems somewhat similar to the bearded faces of Bacchus or Dionysus that most of us have seen at one time decorating a garden gate. These Green Man masks are purported to ensure favorable circumstances to the crops nearby when given proper homage, just like the herms mentioned previously. The oldest known version has been found in France dated to 400 AD.

This “Green Man ” is probably connected to several others in Celtic folklore. Most notably, the story of the “Green Man of Knowledge ” is quite interesting. In this story, the title character, whose face is described as similar to that of the Green Man totem mask mentioned above, rules over a netherworld called “No Man ’s Land, ” which like the chaos that Lilith sprang from, doesn ’t really exist. He is, as a title implies, as wise man, but he uses his wisdom for ill, to keep the land enchanted under his spell, and rules as a tyrant.

Fascinatingly, there is a figure from Islamic legend that ties in with the Green Man mythos. His name, “Al-Khadir, ” is usually taken to be a misspelling of al-akhdar , and he is known for wearing green clothing. Like Hermes, he is a psychopompus . He shows up suddenly when worthy people need guidance, and imparts wisdom (usually strange wisdom against common logic). He will steer you into unforeseen luck, or away from danger, as he wishes. He is known to appear to pilgrims on the Hajj pilgrimage in Mecca, where he “gives power ” to the holy Black Stone on display in the shrine called the Kaaba. Like Mercury, he can appear and disappear quite suddenly because his movements are very quick. He is said to look like a young man, but with a white beard. He features in many stories having to do with the Fountain of Youth and immortality. He lives at the junction of two rivers.

Al-Khadir is mentioned in The Koran as the “Servant of God ” whom the deity granted divine wisdom to. Al-Khadir then met Moses at the crossing of two rivers, and taught him what he knew. He is also associated with the Prophet Elijah. According to a hadith, the spirit of Mohammed spends the month of Ramadan every year in Jerusalem with those of Al-Khadir and Elijah. Sufis also believe that Al-Khadir is the ruler of the rijalu ’l-gyab (“the men of the unseen ”), a panel of saints and angels who actually make some of the more important decisions regarding the fate of the universe and the things in it. This makes him part of the “Qutb, ” the spiritual pole of the universe that holds everything up properly, and around which everything rotates.

In addition to his connection to the European Green Man, Al-Khadir has been associated with the prophet Elijah, John the Baptist, St. George, Enoch and Metatron. As the personal “Servant of God, ” divine messenger, and patron of prophets, he is similar to the biblical figure of Enoch, who purportedly wrote 366 books based on his experiences traveling through various heavens, as well as the underworld. Enoch has been interpreted by some scholars as being the same personage as Hermes, as we will soon discuss. Enoch ’s body of written work, which includes details of how everything supposedly works, both on Earth and in the many heavens, has been compared to the famed “Emerald Tablet of Hermes, ” which likewise is said to contain the secrets of the universe. Al-Khadir supposedly had a staff that could turn into a snake, bringing to mind the caduceus of Hermes and the alchemical symbol of the crucified serpent (featured, among other places, on the “star jewels ” worn by nineteenth-century members of the “Knights Templar ” degree of York Rite Freemasonry). It is also reminiscent of the incident from Exodus Chapter 7, in which Moses and the Egyptian court magicians all turned their staves into snakes.

Al-Khadir had the secret of immortality, and could resurrect the dead as well. He was often depicted holding a golden goblet that contained the alchemical Elixir of Life, the drink of the immortals. He purportedly went on a mission with Alexander the Great (described as “Dhul-Qarnayn ” —the “Man with Two Horns ”) in search of the Fountain of Youth (which Al-Khadir successfully found, they say). From that point on, according to legend, Al-Khadir had been the guardian of the fountain.

Just as he and Hermes were associated with immortality, Enoch did not die but was translated directly to Heaven, where he became the angel “Metatron. ” This figure was said to be a sidekick to God nicknamed “Little Jehovah ” by rabbis because only God himself is comparable to him in power. In this way, the myths connect again to Hermes, who was not only the messenger and slave of the gods, but also the force that would perform miraculous transformations during alchemical operations and magical ceremonies. It also, in a way, confirms Plato ’s speculation that Thoth —equivalent to Hermes and thus to Enoch — was a deified human, although the deification is being said here to have been a supernatural act rather than, as Plato thought, a process of history.

Returning to Al-Khadir, we note that, as a patron of writers, poets and speakers, he is also in that respect like Mercury, Thoth, and Hermes, as well as other gods of writing, poetry, rhetoric and prophecy from other cultures. These include the Babylonian Nebo, father of the Nabatean race. The related word nabu still means “prophet ” in Arabic. It is at the root of the name of Nebaioth, the first-born son of Ishmael, progenitor of the Arabs and ancestor of Mohammed. Nebo ’s special fetish item was the stylus.

To ancient man, writing and speaking were powerful creative acts. Language was considered magical and of divine origin. The Jews thought that God had created the world through pronouncement. This is the concept of the Logos, the Divine Word. As The Gospel of John (KJV) states at its opening:

In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God.

This is why a divine messenger and teacher who can instruct in the holy arts of writing —incantations, law, poetry, mathematics, and all manner of recorded wisdom —is himself likened to a creator God, a “little Jehovah. ”

To the list of wisdom initiator figures we have to add the Babylonian figure of Oannes. The account of third century BC Babylonian writer Berossus on this topic (who himself actually purported to quote the writings of this “Oannes ”) was paraphrased first century BC Greek scholar Alexander Polyhistor, as quoted by Cory's Ancient Fragments from 1876:

At Babylon there was (in these times) a great resort of people of various nations, who inhabited Chaldea, and lived in a lawless manner like the beasts of the field.

In the first year there appeared, from that part of the Erythaean sea which borders upon Babylonia, an animal endowed with reason, by name Oannes, whose whole body (according to the account of Apollodorus) was that of a fish; that under the fish ’s head he had another head, with feet also below similar to those of a man, subjoined to the fish ’s tail. His voice, too, and language were articulate and human; and a representation of him is preserved even to this day.

This being was accustomed to pass the day among men, but took no food at that season; and he gave them an insight into letters and sciences, and arts of every kind. He taught them to construct cities, to found temples, to compile laws, and explained to them the principles of geometrical knowledge. He made them distinguish the seeds of the earth, and showed them how to collect the fruits; in short, he instructed them in every thing which could tend to soften manners and humanize their lives. From that time, nothing material has been added by way of improvement to his instructions. And when the sun had set this being Oannes retired again into the sea, and passed the night in the deep, for he was amphibious... .

Images of this figure are abundant. They very much look like a person has cut open a large fish from tail to snout and then placed it on his head as a cap, with the body and tail of the fish then draped down his back like a cape. If that ’s how Oannes rolled, it must have been smelly indeed. Or maybe he really was a composite creature, as described, an animal endowed with reason and a human voice, a human face underneath his fish head, and feet beside his fish tail.

A similar mythological figure is the Mesopotamian Adapa, who also brought essential wisdom to mankind from the gods in Heaven. He too was depicted with a fish tail, but he also had goat horns on his head! Thus he is probably historically connected to the image of the constellation of Capricorn, which the Greeks portrayed as a goat-fish. Adapa was the son of Ea (a.k.a. “Enki, ” equivalent of the Philistine “Dagon ”), the god of cunning wisdom and “Lord of the Flood. ” He lived in a house called the “Apsu ” underground which was the source of the Tigris and Euphrates rivers. Like Enoch, Adapa was offered the food of the immortals while visiting Heaven, which would have made him immortal as well. However, he did not seem to realize this, as he had been warned by Enki not to eat anything while in Heaven, or he would die, so he passed on the opportunity.

This fish-god Ea was also said to have warned Uta-Napishtim, the hero of the Mesopotamian version of the Deluge story, about the catastrophe that was coming, and instructed him on how to build an ark to survive it. He was granted immortality, and lived at the mouth of two of the rivers of Paradise. Similarly, Hindu legend tells us that the god Vishnu (who in his incarnation as Matsya is depicted as a man with a fish-tail from the waist down) took the form of a giant fish and warned their Flood hero, Manu, about the Deluge. He told him how to build an ark, which Manu then attached to the fish 's horn so that he could be towed safely to the place of landing.

In The Natsarene and Hidden Gnosis , Rene Salm writes about the Gnostic symbolism of the flood myth as well as Ea/Enki:

In the flood story, secret knowledge protects the wise person against that which destroys the entire world. The flood was a divine judgment upon all mankind, one which came suddenly. But god gave Noah secret knowledge in advance: to build an ark. The ark itself represents and symbolizes the secret saving knowledge of god. After all, it was the ark that saved Noah. Thus it is no surprise that in the Akkadian flood story the boat is named Natsirat Napishtim, “Preserver of Life, ” a phrase employing the root n-ts-r. It should also not surprise us that netseru in Akkadian means “secret knowledge, ” particularly that received from the moon god Ea/Enki.

Al-Khadir is also associated with fish. He is often shown in illustrations actually riding on the back of a very large fish. One of the miracles he is said to have performed was making a fish that was dead and already salted come back to life and jump into the river.

Another figure whom Al-Khadir is believed to be connected to is an Ugaritic god named Kothar-wa-Khasis, the bringer of “Hasisu, ” a special kind of wisdom. He was believed to have taught mankind writing, agriculture, and metal- working. He was also called a “servant ” or “slave ” of the god El, the etymological root of the Hebrew “Elohim ” and the Arabic “Allah. ” So like Enoch-Metatron, he was second-in-command to the supreme creator God himself.

Also, like St. George (another form of the Green Man), Kothar famously slew a dragon. All stories of slaying a dragon are, perhaps, symbolic of the same thing as a crucified serpent in alchemy. It represents releasing the power of the prima materia , the original, undifferentiated chaos-matter of the universe. Serpents or dragons are seen as emblems of that chaos, like Samael and Lilith or the Leviathans are to the Cabalists. Stories of slaying a dragon to create a universe go back to ancient Sumer and the story of the dragoness Tiamat. The crucifying of a serpent for magical rituals is described in the ancient Book of Nabathean Agriculture .

The same role played by Al-Khadir in Arabic legend is played in a universal way in the Hermetic figure of the trickster-initiator Hermes, the fullest example of the archetype discussed in this chapter. When a character based on this archetype shows up in stories, both ancient and modern, he is often an agent sent by a hidden hierarchy to lure the protagonist down the path to his fate. He uses deceit to convince the hero of the tale to embark upon an adventure. He is often shown as playful and childish, enjoying his knavish pranks.

Although the earliest depictions of Hermes show him as old and wise with a beard, later renderings presented him as a youth, befitting his reputation. The word “capricious ” means “wily, ” and comes from the Latin word for “goat. ” As we mentioned before, the Greeks sometimes showed Hermes as having partial goat features, especially in the early days, and he was frequently shown with a goat by his side, or being carried over his shoulders.

The satyr-like figure of Puck/Robin Goodfellow was certainly capricious, as were spin-off characters Peter Pan and Robin Hood. The theme of thievery, one of Hermes ’ areas of specialty, comes up quite often, as these stories often have the Hermes/Pan/Puck figure as a bandit. He was usually portrayed as having wings on his sandals and his hat, implying his swift-footed and slippery nature. He was always very sneaky, subtle, and hard to pin down, “the shrewdest and most cunning ” of the gods, as Edith Hamilton wrote. This made him a natural master thief.

However, like Robin Hood, he would usually use his ill-gotten gain to help out an underdog, or he would sacrifice it to the gods, as he did with some of the cattle he stole from Apollo. This is why he is the patron of thieves as well as businessmen, because one of his first acts upon exiting the womb was to steal Apollo ’s cattle. When Hermes is caught, he proposes a deal with Apollo to keep the cattle in exchange for the lyre, a musical instrument he had just invented. One of his sons was Autolycus, literally called “the Prince of Thieves ” (long before the Robin Hood movie). An ancient hymn to Hermes describes him as:

… of many shifts (polytropos), blandly cunning, a robber, a cattle driver, a bringer of dreams, a watcher by night, a captain of raiders, a thief at the gates… .

Though he ’s sneaky and a bit dangerous, “Hermes Dolios ” (“Tricky Hermes ”) is a necessary guide to realms beyond. He is the god of transitions, so just as in alchemy he is the bond which united unlikely pairs, in myth he builds bridges and opens portals between realms that are normally completely separated (such as Earth, Olympus, and the Underworld). In addition to the aforementioned title of “Psychopompus, ” his related epithets included “Oneiropompus ” (“conductor of dreams, ” as he guided the soul through its nighttime adventures); “Hodios ” (“patron of travelers ”); and “Poimandres ” (“shepherd of men ”). He was also called “Hermes of the Ways, ” “Proopylaios ” (“guardian of the gate ”), “Pylaios ” (“doorkeeper ”), “Strophaios ” (“standing at the door post ”) and “Stropheus ” (“the socket in which the pivot of the door moves ”), and was said to be “standing there at the crossroads. ” He was both a guardian of the borders (just as the herms and statues of Silenus were used to mark property boundaries in ancient times), and he was the key to open the gates between them.

One interpretation of the etymology of his name is that it comes from hermai (“boundary marker ”). Likewise, his Roman name of Mercury might be related to the Proto-Indo-European merg (the root of the English “mark ”). The other possible root for Hermes commonly given is ermeneus (“interpreter ”), referring to his skills at speech and communication. He was the “Diactoros ” or “Angelos ” (“the messenger ”) and the “Logios ” (“Speaker ”).

However, these things are not mutually exclusive, in our opinion, for as we know from reading motivational posters in corporate offices, “communication is the key. ” The most common interpretation of Mercury ’s name is that it is related to merx (“merchandise ”), referring to his role as a tradesman, and maker of business deals as the master of persuasion. Also, written “marks ” of words and numbers are vital in business, as is “communication, ” a word directly related to “commerce ”: the trafficking of goods and money. It ’s all about moving energy, words, and physical objects back and forth, between people and places, which it is the job of Hermes to facilitate.

Thus he was called “Agoraeus ” (“of the market ”) and “Empolaios ”

(“engaged in traffic and commerce ”). One of his fetish items was the purse, which served him as both a money pouch and a messenger bag or briefcase. He was also considered the benefactor responsible for arranging the receipt of unexpected boons such as gambling jackpots, inheritances, and other freaky fortunes, the “bringer of good luck ” and “Ploutodotes ” (“bringer of wealth ”). All of this explains why images of him were often placed inside of people ’s money coffers and purses, as the Knights Templar did with images of Baphomet.

However, his most important piece of equipment was his snake-wrapped magic wand, the caduceus, identifying him as the chief of sorcerers and alchemists. With it he could open up a portal to the underworld and reanimate a dead body by reuniting it with its soul. He could pretty much do anything else as well. The wand was actually called the “Porta ” in some cases. It was originally a stick with a figure 8 or infinity sign on top. Later the snakes were placed on the stick and arranged in the same configuration.

This image of the caduceus (the wand with dual serpents) seems connected to the story of Tiresias. According to Hyginus (a Latin author from around the time of Christ known for compiling Greek myths in his Hygini Fabulae), Tiresias was a prophet of Apollo in the court of Cadmus in Thebes. He was blind. One day when he was walking on Mount Cyllene in the Peloponnese, he came across a pair of snakes having sex. He disrespectfully hit them with his staff. This angered Hera, who punished him by turning him into a woman. Seven years later, the female Tiresias came upon snakes having sex once again.

This time, she trampled them, which resulted in her being turned back into a man.

Several interesting associations come up in regard to the story of Tiresias. For one thing, the idea of a staff acting as an instrument of coitus interruptus , preventing the two snakes from mating, brings to mind the story of the demons Lilith and Samael, once a hermaphroditic being, now separated and segregated by God himself to prevent their unholy union. For another thing, Hyginus also brings up a similar story about Hermes. He said that while the god was traveling through Arcadia, he saw two snakes fighting, and used his staff to split them apart. He then prophesied that his staff would be used to bring peace from that moment forward.

Another important detail that comes to mind is the fact that the very word “hermaphrodite ” comes from the name of the child that Hermes purportedly had with the goddess Aphrodite. Ovid wrote that their son was united permanently with the nymph Salmacis at her prayerful request, as she was in love with the boy and never wanted to part from him. From that point on, Hermaphroditus became a patron of marriage, as well as that of a certain sex cult operating in Cyprus in the seventh century BC (according to Yulia Ustinova ’s The Supreme Gods of the Bosporan Kingdom).

Edith Hamilton, in her collection of Greek myths published in 1940

(Mythology: Timeless Tales of Gods and Heroes), says of Hermes that “He appears oftener in the tales of mythology than any other god. ” This makes sense if you consider the fact that Hermes was the messenger and patron of writing, used by the gods on Olympus to bring messages to people on Earth. He was also the author of all wisdom, including poetry, philosophy, science and history. He would have thus been invoked to bring inspiration from the divine realm by anyone authoring a chronicle, a collection of myths, an epic poem, or a play. As the messenger, it is not hard to believe that he would have told the tale to those writing it down in such a way as to make him appear as the central figure.

Hermes was seen very much as a teacher and a mentor to those who invoked him. As such he was the grand “initiator, ” particularly of boys turning into young men. According to David Brooks Dodd ’s Initiation in Ancient Greek Rituals and Narratives , this is also related to Hermes ’ role as the lord of boundary crossings (such as passing from one age group or grade to the next, as well as his being traditionally called as a divine witness during the taking of oaths. He was invoked during initiation rites for young soldiers and hunters as well as for athletic youth training groups connected to the gymnasium, of which he was the patron. His feast time, called the “Hermaea, ” which started being celebrated at least as far back as the fourth-to-sixth century BC, was restricted to young boys only and involved athletic games. So it seems that Hermes was the original youth counselor and coach to pubescent males growing up in classical times.

These of course were the sort of initiation rites that most male citizens would have gone through. However, Hermes was also the patron of other, more arcane initiations. As Marie-Luise von Franz wrote in Projection and Re-Collection in Jungian Psychology , an astrological document from the third century BC, written for King Nechopso by a priest named Petosiris, states that Hermes is the teacher of secret wisdom, which:

> … can be experienced only in a state of ecstasy. This wisdom appears to the prophet as a ‘voice ’ wrapped in a dark garment. As the follower prays, this voice points out to him the paths of the celestial bodies in the universe and reveals to him the wisdom of the cosmos.

This of course makes sense when you consider that, as the guardian of boundaries, one of Hermes ’ duties was to guide dead souls to the underworld, and those of the sleeping to the land of dreams. This earned him the epithet psychopompus : the one who guides the psyche. It follows, then, that the spirit of Hermes would also guide souls reaching for enlightenment from the realms beyond.

As it came to pass, that is what Hermes is currently most well-known for. But rather than being remembered as merely a nebulous spirit, Hermes came to be regarded as a flesh-and-blood person who ruled as a king and brought civilization to the rude masses over which he ruled. In this guise, he became known as Hermes Trismegistus: the “Thrice-Greatest. ” Alchemists claimed him as their patron, using the Caduceus as their symbol. Fittingly, the substance most quintessential to the transformation of elements in alchemy is mercury (a.k.a. “quicksilver ”), named after the Roman name for this fleet-footed god with winged sandals. But how these associations came about is a story in itself.

Chapter 4: The Three Hermeses

The vice of ignorance floods the whole earth and utterly destroys the soul shut up in the body, preventing it from anchoring in the havens of deliverance. Surely you will not sink into this great flood? Those of you who can will take the ebb and gain the haven of deliverance and anchor there. Then, seek a guide to take you by the hand and lead you to the portals of knowledge.

—Hermes Trismegistus, Corpus Hermeticum VII

In Egypt, the god in the pantheon who most resembled the Greek Hermes and the Roman Mercury was Thoth. He was the inventor of the stylus, as well as all alphabets and other forms of writing. He was also the patron and initiator of priests into the closely-connected craft of magic. As such, under the Ptolemaic dynasty (the last royal family of ancient Egypt, who ruled from 305 to 30 BC, during the Hellenistic period), Hermes and Thoth became combined into the hyphenated entity of “Thoth-Hermes. ” Then the legend grew from there. As Garth Fowden writes in The Egyptian Hermes, The Greek Magical Papyri came to “present the new syncretistic Hermes as a cosmic power, creator of heaven and earth and almighty world-ruler. ”

Sometime between then and the second or third century AD (during which time, Egypt went from being in the Greek Hellenic empire into the hands of the Romans), certain works published in Egypt began to be attributed to Hermes as a prophet . This continued throughout the next four centuries as well, as the Roman Empire gave way to Byzantium and everyone began to (ostensibly) convert to Christianity (until vanquished by Islamic armies in 642). During this time of religious and philosophical “syncretism, ” as it has come to be called (influenced by the diverse intellectual milieu of Alexandria), mystic forms of Christianity, Judaism and paganism, along with Persian cults, mixed with the doctrines of classical Greek Philosophers like Plato, Aristotle, and even Pythagoras. Plato had already questioned whether or not Thoth was a deified human rather than an immortal god. Now Hermes came to be thought of as one of the philosophers, in the same camp as the aforementioned, and yet more than that as well.

Already there were a few works written about or attributed to Hermes that are now considered part of the broad category of “Hermetica. ” These include fragments (assembled about 500 AD) that were published in John of Stobi ’s Anthologium and three Coptic texts that were part of the Nag Hammadi library discovered in 1945 in Egypt. There were also several magical, astrological, and alchemical texts from this time, attributed to Hermes (such as Liber Hermetis, The Picatrix, and The Emerald Tablets).

The Picatrix (actually titled Ghayat al-Hakim , or Goal of the Wise) was an Arabic work that talked about the concept of a “Hermetic Man ”: one who, through training and practice in controlling the powers of the planets and stars, could become “the magus, the sage, the master of Heaven and Earth. ” This was possible, it posited, due to the notion that man contained within his own body a microcosm of the universe. Thus through the manipulation of his own mind and body he would purportedly effect the outer world correspondingly, via what anthropologist James Frazer has called “sympathetic magic. ” The name notion was inherent in the alchemical formula cryptically laid out in the Emerald Tablet , which described a process for uniting the powers of the reflective “above ” and “below ” realms of man and macrocosm. “As above, so below ” has become the most quoted maxim from this text.

However, it was only later that the full figure emerged of the philosopher- king “Hermes Trismegistus ” —the latter term generally interpreted to mean “thrice-greatest, ” or “triplicate in wisdom ” when it was written in Arabic (al- mutallat bi-l-hikma). According to Kevin van Bladel, the title is thought to be derived from an older Egyptian epithet of Thoth as the “greatest and greatest great god. ” References to Trismegistus can be traced back to the earliest known texts of Christian philosophy from the second and third centuries.

These were mostly written either by Christian authors seeking antecedents for their new world-view with the wisdom of ancient “pagan philosophers ” (like Plato and Aristotle), or else arguing against and distinguishing Christian thought from these older systems. Christian theologian Tertullian, writing during this time, called Hermes “the master of all natural philosophers. ” Just at the start of the fourth century, Arnobius, another Christian author, argued against the pagan philosophies of “Mercurius ” (the Latin name for Hermes), among others. In the seventh century, Jacob of Edessa ’s Hexameron proclaimed that Hermes ’ philosophy was compatible with Christianity. As Kevin van Bladel writes: “… Hermes was considered a bearer of a primordial philosophy more ancient and closer to God than that of Plato. ”

However, when most writers talk about the “Hermetica ” today, they are usually referring more specifically to a collection of philosophical dialogues between Hermes the philosopher-king and his disciples, most notably “Asclepius ” (named after the Greek god of medicine), “King Ammon, ” and Hermes ’ “son, ” named “Tat. ” (Whether there is any connection between the names “Tat ” and “Thoth ” is unknown.) These writings were obtained as part of a collection of Greek texts by a monk named Leonardo in 1460. They were brought to patron of the Renaissance Cosimo de Medici and translated by Marsilio Ficino, then published in Latin in 1471.

The Corpus Hermeticum was thought at this time to represent a “primordial philosophy ” from before the Flood, or at least from Moses ’ time. In 1614, Isaac Casaubon proved they were derived from the early Christian era, but by that time the Latin version had already gone through twenty-five editions, with a considerable amount of influence on the philosophy of the day. Garth Fowden summarized the view of the universe purported in the Corpus in his book The Egyptian Hermes as:

God is one … the sun, which is the demiurge around which revolve the eight spheres of the fixed stars, the planets and the earth. From these spheres depend the daemons, and from the daemons Man… .

Let us now shift our focus from the Greek Hermetica that was translated into Latin at the time of the Renaissance to the considerable number of Hermetic texts (that is, material written about and/or attributed to Hermes) in the Arabic language. Some of these were translated from the Greek originals, but many of them came as texts written in Middle Persian. Only recently has any of this material been properly catalogued and analyzed, such as the mammoth work done on the subject by Kevin van Bladel in his book The Arabic Hermes: From Pagan Sage to Prophet of Science. (Most of the Arabic material, as the author points out, has yet to be studied at all by modern scholars). These works had a hand in the transformation and magnification of the image of Hermes Trismegistus that eventually emerged from the evolutionary process of history. As Van Bladel states:

Hermes is cited as an ancient authority already in the eighth century in some of the earliest known Arabic scientific works, the writings of Iranian court astrologers of the Abbasids. In the ninth century, Hermes came to be considered in Arabic literature as not just an ancient scientific authority, but an antediluvian prophet whose revelation formed the very beginnings of science. His works were therefore thought to have been transmitted from the extremely distant past… . The European concept of Hermes Trismegistus as a very ancient sage was derived from Arabic tradition as well as from the Church Fathers.

But well before that, during the start of the Sassanid dynasty (the last pre- Islamic Iranian/Persian empire, which ruled from 224-651 AD), a translation of ancient Iranian writings was commenced that included works supposedly written by “Hermes the Babylonian, who had been king over Egypt. ”

This perhaps accords with the references made in the first century AD text Carmen Astrologicum by Dorotheus (originally written in Greek, then translated into Middle Persian before ultimately surviving only in Arabic), which mentions both “Hermes Trismegistus, King of Egypt, ” and a “Babylonian Hermes. ” At that time, the territory known as “Babylon ” was part of the Persian Empire.

It would seem that the Persians had their own tradition of Hermes, which was influenced by the original Greek Hermetica, but which was also uniquely added to by them. It formed part of the basis for the traditions later proliferated in Arabic-language works. As Van Bladel put it:

What is certain is that the earliest appearance of Hermes in Arabic, in the eighth century, is from the Middle Persian tradition, not the Greek.

These traditions include the ones reflected in the Kitab an-Nhmt ’n , translated into Arabic by Ibn Nawbaht. This text tells a story where a panel of twelve scholars corresponding to the houses of the zodiac is appointed by a tyrannical king to help govern the people from a group of twelve citadels situated in Iraq. When eventually their rule was rejected by the people, the sages scattered, and found new lands to rule over. One of these sages was Hermes. As it states:

He was among them one of the most perfect in intellect, most accurate in knowledge, and most subtle in investigation. He went down to the land of Egypt and ruled its people as king, civilized it, improved the conditions of its inhabitants, and revealed his knowledge there.

Indeed, the legend of Hermes was well-known in Iraq during Sasanian times. A magical amulet found in Nippur and dated from this time is dedicated to “Hermes, Lord of the Universe. ”

When most scholars think of Arabic and Hermetics, they think of Harran, a city once in Upper Mesopotamia, the remains of which are now in Turkey. This is because, as Van Bladel put it, “they are the only special group credited with possessing works attributed to Hermes and transmitting them into Arabic. ” The Abbasid caliph Al-Ma ‘Mun (from 813-833), demanded that the inhabitants of the city either claim themselves as one of the “People of the Book ” or convert to Islam. Non-Islamic “People of the Book ” included all Torah-based Abrahamic religions (such as Christianity and Judaism), as well as a group mysteriously referred to in the Koran as the “Sabians. ” It is implied that the latter group might not be strictly monotheists, but are still close enough in their beliefs to be part of the family. Instead of being forced to submit to conversion, People of the Book simply submitted to a social status called “dhimmitude, ” which involved paying a special tax. Other terms sometimes applied in Islamic Arabic texts to the “Sabians ” mentioned in The Koran are “Magi ” and “Hanifa. ” Seemingly in order to avoid religious persecution, the people of Harran were declared “Sabians ” and were spared.

So what exactly was the religion of the Harranians? This is a problem that Van Bladel decided to take up for himself, as, shortly after this Sabian declaration, the Harranians also began to proclaim that the prophet of their religion was none other than Hermes. This claim has been taken at face value, so that through the years, much has been written about the role of the Harranians in the spread of Hermeticism. Van Bladel has taken a critical view of this, and so has taken pains to show exactly what association if any the Harranians actually had with Hermes, and how these “Hermetic ” traditions clashed with what is considered today “Hermetic ” doctrine.

Author Michel Tardieu has written that from the sixth to tenth centuries, a Platonic academy was there, founded by Hellenic philosophers and then later maintained by Harranian Sabians. Scholar Jan Hjarpe also says that later a group of Harranian Neoplatonists moved to Baghdad. They were headed by Tabit ibn Qurra, an astronomer and translator attached to the court of Abbasid Caliph al- Mu ’tadid. He translated many Greek scientific and philosophical works into Arabic. Hjarpe has suggested that what is thought of as the “Hermetic doctrines of the pagan Sabians of Harran ” were actually the beliefs of this one family and their followers. Writer Isetraut Hadot purported that by this time, the Harranian form of “Platonism ” had become one and the same with “Hermeticism. ” John Walbridge, in an article from 1998 in The Journal of the History of Ideas entitled “Explaining Away the Greek Gods in Islam, ” wrote: “It seems that the ancient moon cult of Harran had evolved into a Hermetic sect that worshipped the planets… . ”

The notion that the Harranians worshipped the heavenly bodies is echoed repeatedly by many writers. Theodore Abu Qurrah, an Orthodox Christian Bishop living in Harran in the ninth century, stated:

They claim that they worship the seven planets —the sun, the moon, Saturn, Mars, Jupiter, Mercury, Venus—and the twelve zodiacal houses, because they are the ones that create and govern this creation and give good fortune and prosperity in the lower world, and ill fortune and suffering. They said that their prophet in that is Hermes the Sage.

In more modern times, HE Stapleton, GL Lewis, and F. Sherwood Taylor, in their 1949 work The Sayings of Hermes Quoted in the Ma' Al-waraqi of Ibn Umail , said: “The influence of the star-worshipping Sabaeans of Harran, to whom Thoth- Hermes was the god of all civilizing inventions, was widespread in the Islamic world. ”

Another popular idea is that the Harranians were responsible for “disseminating ” Hermeticism around the global Muslim ummah (community). Seyyed Hossein Nasr, writing in 1967 ’s Hermes and Hermetic Writings in the Islamic World , had the Harranians in mind when he said: “ ‘Hermeticism was propagated by the Sabaeans who made known to the Islamic world the writings that were attributed to Hermes. ” The 1968 book The Thousands of Abu Ma ‘shar by David Pingree tells us that the aforementioned account of the Babylonian Hermes from Ibn Nawbaht was influenced by “Harranians, ” and that the Harranians held Hermes, along with his colleague teacher, “Agathodaemon, ” as their “prophets. ”

Even Sir Walter Scott, in his English translation and commentary on The Corpus Hermeticum , wrote of his belief that the text of the Corpus had appeared suddenly in Constantinople after 1000 years in obscurity just after the “Sabians ” (i.e., the Harranian immigrants practicing paganism) had left Baghdad under Muslim persecution. As he put it:

Is there not something more than chance in this? It may be that one of the Sabians of Bagdad, finding that his position under Moslem rule was becoming unendurable, migrated to Constantinople, and brought in his baggage a bundle of Greek Hermetica — and that our Corpus is that bundle… . The Pagans of Harran almost certainly possessed the whole collection of Hermetica (including many documents that are not now extant) in Greek, at the time when they adopted these writings as their Scriptures, in AD 830… .

Moreover, if we choose to indulge in further conjectures, there is nothing to prevent us from supposing that it was the arrival in Constantinople of a few such Sabian Neoplatonists from Baghdad, and the writings brought with them, that first started the revival of Platonic study.

The image of the Sabians of and from Harran that has been presented for historians to document indicates that they indulged in rituals to stellar and planetary bodies (which would seem, ostensibly, pagan), and held Hermes to be their prophet (who is spoken of as a wise sage and historical king figure but still has everything in common with the old Greek pagan deity as well). Yet they are still somehow monotheists and “People of the Book ” acceptable to Muslim society. The way that Al-Mubassir ibn Tatik ’s Kitab Muhtar al-hikam (written in Fatamid Egypt) described the religion taught by Hermes certainly sounds compatible with this. As Van Bladel tells us:

It included feasts at astrological conjunctions and at the sun ’s entry into a new zodiacal sign, as well as sacrificial offerings to the planets at the appropriate times. Hermes is also said to have commanded them ‘to perform prayers that he stated for them in ways that he described. ’ On the other hand, the religious laws of Hermes given here bear close resemblance to Islamic law: they require ritual purity, abstinence from intoxication, gihad against the enemies of the religion, … and prescribe most of the punishments called hadd punishments in Islamic law. All this leads me to conclude that the “religion of Hermes ” described here was developed and described well after the establishment of Islam and Islamic law.

Van Bladel implies that perhaps the entire misfitted conglomeration of Islam, Platonism, and star-worshipping, as well as the claiming of Hermes as a religious prophet, was concocted (originally, perhaps, by Tabit ibn Qurra, his family, and their followers) to make the Harranians ’ religious practices seem acceptable to their Islamic rulers. However, one very interesting detail put forward by the Kitab Muhtar al-hikam is the suggestion that the name “Sabian ” comes from “Sab, ” one of the nicknames or epithets of Hermes ’ son, Tat, to whom many of the Hermetic discourses are addressed. This notion is echoed by Al-Masudi (tenth century historian), by Al-Mubassir (eleventh century), and by Ibn Abi Usaybia (twelfth century scholar).

The question of whether the prophet Hermes should be considered identical to the deity on the Greek pantheon, or to the Egyptian god Thoth whose name was compounded with his, seems to be a matter on which none of the authors agree. Kevin van Bladel, whilst making a distinction between the two concepts (Hermes the God and Hermes the Prophet), nonetheless acknowledges that over time one became the other in the public mind, and in the opposite order than one would expect. Normally, historians write about the “deification ” of a historical figure through myth-morphing, or a leader being worshipped like a god by his people, not the other way around. But we could imagine that when Ibn Nawbaht wrote in the Kitab an-Nhmt ’n of Hermes being one of twelve ancient ruling sages, corresponding to the twelve houses of the Zodiac, he might have been tapping into some underlying truth behind the myths of the twelve Olympic gods.

The questions becomes further complicated when we realize that in several Hermetic works, we are told that there was not just one Hermes, but three, each born to Earth at a different time in history. Generally, it breaks down to there being one who came before the Flood, one after the Flood, and one who was born in Egypt much later. Of course, there are numerous variations on this theme.

One important source is the ninth century Book of the Thousands from Abu Masar, the greatest astrologer in the Abbasid court of Baghdad. The book itself is no longer with us, but we can read about it from other books, such as Ibn Abi Usaybia ’s thirteenth century Kitab Tabaqat al-atibba (The Generations of the Physicians). Here the summary of Abu Masar ’s Hermetic history is as follows:

The Hermeses are three. The first of them is Hermes who was before the Flood. The significance of ‘Hermes ’ is a title, like saying ‘Caesar ’ … . The Persians named him Wiwanghan, meaning ‘the Just, ’ in their biographies of the kings. He is the one to whose philosophy the Harranians adhere. The Persians state that his grandfather was Gayumart, that is Adam. The Hebrews state that he is Enoch, which, in Arabic, is Idris… . He was the first to give advance warning of the Flood, and he thought that a celestial catastrophe of fire or water would overwhelm the earth. His home was Upper Egypt; he chose that [place] and built the pyramids and cities of clay there. He feared that knowledge would pass away in the Flood, so he built the monumental temples… .

Several important notions are purported here. The first is that “Hermes ” is just a title, which would solve the god/prophet conundrum as well as the questions of whether or not the “Three Hermeses ” are all incarnations of the same soul (the interpretation taken by many modern Hermeticists, such as Dennis William Hauck in his book The Emerald Tablet: Alchemy for Personal Transformation). If we can accept that a “Hermes ” is a type of teacher of fundamental scientific wisdom such as that traditionally associated with the god Hermes, then it all makes sense.

The second important idea we find here is that this first Hermes is identical to the biblical figure of Enoch, known as Idris to the Muslims and mentioned by name in The Koran . (Verse 19:56-57: “And mention Idris in the Book. He was true, a prophet. We raised him to a high place. ”) This Hermes-Idris identification is thoroughly accepted through Islamic teachings, as we shall demonstrate, and is in no way controversial. Van Bladel says that the first Arabic- language reference to Hermes being Idris can be traced back to around 840 AD. He reckons it came from the (now lost) chronicles used as source material by the Christian historians Oanodorus and Annianus, working in Alexandria in the fifth century, since their goals were to synthesize various characters in history recorded at different times and places. The tradition that Idris was Enoch had already been established in the early eighth century by Wahb ibn Munabbin, who catalogued isra Iliyat (“Jewish traditions ”) in Arabic. He said Idris was the first to use a pen and that he received directly from God thirty scrolls of wisdom material that he was instructed to bring to humanity. Furthermore, Idris is also considered in Islamic lore to be the same as the mercurial character of the “Green Man ” Al-Khadir, mentioned in the previous chapter.

The connection between Enoch and Hermes seems logical when you consider that they both are purported authors of books containing the heavenly wisdom of the stars (Hermes with his alchemical Emerald Tablet, and Enoch the author of 366 books of divine knowledge). Enoch was indeed the first to give warning of the Flood in the Judeo-Christian tradition. This is what The First Book of Enoch is largely all about.

However, the Judeo-Christian tradition of Enoch also purports that he is a descendant of Adam ’s third son Seth several generations removed. He is supposedly a completely different person from his cousin Enoch, the eldest son of Cain with the same name, who was born after Cain ’s exile to Nod, and after whom Cain named the first city he built. Yet it seems to be implied by Ibn Abi Usaybia that it is the Cainite Enoch who is identified with Hermes and who warned of the Flood, because he states that the Persians call Hermes the grandson of Adam. This same genealogy of Enoch-Idris is also given by Mutahhar ibn Tahir al Maqdisi in the 966 AD. work The Creation and the Chronicle . Based on this evidence it can be speculated that both Enochs were originally one figure in earlier versions of the story. This would be one more piece of evidence indicating that. However, several other Arabic scholars clearly identify Idris with the Sethian Enoch, such as thirteenth-century Gregory Bar Hebraeus (a.k.a. Ibn al- ‘Ibri), and before him, tenth-century Abu Hatin ar-Razi, who said that “between him [Idris] and Adam were five patriarchs. ” Meanwhile, from a Latin translation of a Spanish translation of Al-Mubassir ’s sayings from the 13th century, called Liber philosophorum moralium antiquorum , we read:

Hermes was born in Egypt, and he is called Hermes in Greek, Mercury in Latin, and in Hebrew, Enoch. He was the son of Jared, son of Machtalaleb, son of Quenam, son of Enoy, son of Sed, son of Adam.

“Sed, ” clearly, is Seth, with the rest corresponding essentially to the genealogy of the Sethian Enoch found in Genesis.

The third important point here is the idea that Hermes built the pyramids of Egypt, referred to here as the “monumental temples, ” in order to preserve the scientific wisdom he ’s taught for future generations after the Flood (which would, implicitly, be somehow written on the walls, encoded into the geometry, written on scrolls hidden inside, or something like that). This is a detail mentioned several times in other Arabic Hermetica. Ibn Abi Usaybia also writes that Abu Masar attributed another monument to the first Hermes. This is the “birba ” temple at Ankmim in Egypt, the city of the Priapian fertility god Min. Always shown with an erect phallus, Min was identified by the Greeks with their god Pan, thus the Greek name for the city, “Panopolis. ” (Recall, of course, that Pan was the son of Hermes in many versions of the myth.) The ruins of this temple have yet to be excavated but it is thought by historians to have actually been built during the reign of Ramses II. However, Ibn Abi Usaybia says that Abu Masar claimed it was the first Hermes who did it. The motivation, just as alleged with the pyramids, was supposedly to preserve fundamental knowledge through the coming cataclysmic Deluge. So he “chiseled out ” a mountain there:

> … portraying in it in carvings all the arts and their uses, and pictures of all the instruments of the artisans, indicating the features of the sciences by illustrations, out of desire thereby to preserve the sciences forever for those after him, fearing that all trace of it would perish from the world.

The same exact thing was written by Said al-Andalusi in his eleventh century text Tabaqat al- ‘Umam (Exposition of the Generations of Nations), but he specifies that this first Hermes was the Enoch descended from Seth, and gives his genealogy. The same details were seconded by Syriac writer Gregory Bar Hebraeus in the thirteenth century, who actually said there was only one Hermes, the Sethian Enoch. This is interesting, for Josephus wrote in Antiquities of the Jews that it was Seth who preserved the pre-diluvian knowledge of his father Adam by engraving the secrets on two columns, one of brick and one of stone, which were allegedly erected in a place called “Terra Seriadica. ”

This notion of preserving knowledge through cataclysms with engraved pillars (one meant to withstand fire and the other built flood-proof) comes up repeatedly in mythology, and we find it in the lore of Freemasonry. Plato mentions Egypt as the place where the story of Atlantis was preserved, along with other ancient pre-Flood wisdom, in Timaeus and Critias . Also, in the Greek Hermetica, we read of the Egyptian goddess Isis (mistress of magic and wisdom) telling her son Horus that Hermes wrote down his extensive knowledge of the universe with hieroglyphs, which he hid for posterity.

So that, purportedly, was the legacy of the first Hermes. The job of the second Hermes was to recapture the preserved knowledge of the first Hermes and use it to rebuild human civilization. Not only that, they say this Hermes personally taught Pythagoras himself everything he knew! Note that the birth of this Hermes in Babylon probably links him up with the aforementioned “Babylonian Hermes ” identified by Dorotheus in the Carmen Astrologicum . As the text states:

The Second Hermes, of the people of Babylon: he lived in the city of the Chaldeans, Babylon, after the Flood in the time of Naburizbani, who was the first to build the city of Babylon after Nimrod the son of Kush. His student was Pythagoras the Arithmetician. This Hermes renewed the knowledge of medicine, philosophy, mathematics that was lost during the Flood at Babylon.

The third Hermes, as described by Ibn Abi Usaybia and Abu Masar, certainly seems less accomplished than his illustrious forebears. In fact, he almost doesn ’t seem to qualify for the “title ” of Hermes. But what they say about him is in fact exactly the same as what all other Hermetica which purport the existence of three Hermeses tell about the third (the earliest such account being from Ibn Gulgul ’s tenth century work, The Generations of the Physicians and Philosophers). They all agree that he was born in Egypt, he taught the science of alchemy, and he wrote a book called Poisonous Animals . To this, Ibn Abi Usaybia simply adds: “He had a student who is known, whose name was Asclepius. ”

Asclepius, like Hermes, is the name of a Greek god. He was always shown carrying a staff entwined with a single serpent (just one snake shy of a Hermetic caduceus). His nickname was “the Healer ” because he could resurrect the dead, and he was associated with the practice of medicine. His name was invoked in the original Hippocratic Oath. Even today the rod of Asclepius is still used as a symbol of healing by dentists and veterinarians (while regular physicians tend to use the double-snaked caduceus instead).

Consistently, Hermes has been said to have tutelary relationships with characters named Asclepius, Ammon, Agathodaemon, and Tat (a.k.a. “Sab ”). Tat is usually said to be the son of one of the Hermeses. The Book of Sothis — attributed to the second century historian Manetho, but probably forged more than 100 years later —says that Tat is the son of the second Hermes and the grandson of Agathodaemon through his father. The Greek Hermetica talks about Tat, “Asclepius-Imouthes ” and “Ptah ” (another spelling of Thoth) as being the first of Hermes ’ “successors. ” The second-third century text The Asclepius : The Perfect Discourse calls Asclepius, Ammon, and Tat Hermes ’ “disciples. ” Gregory Bar Hebraeus agreed that Hermes was the teacher of Asclepius.

This was all presaged by Plato ’s Philebus , where he says that the Egyptian “god ” Thoth taught the Egyptian “god ” Ammon the craft of writing. Interestingly, it was Ammon, a ram-headed god, whom Alexander the Great claimed to be the biological son of, as revealed to him by the oracle at Siwa (the reason why Alexander was alleged to have had horns on his head). The Greek syncretists compounded Ammon ’s name with that of Zeus, and showed the Olympian god with ram ’s horns.

As for Agathodaemon, this was the name of a minor Greek deity of good fortune, as well as the name taken by the author of a third century Egyptian text on alchemy, The Anepigraphos. Jean Doresse, in her Secret Books of the Egyptian Gnostics , suggests that the basis of both the god and the alchemist Agathodaemon can be equated to none other than Seth! This is an interesting idea when you consider that, again, Hermes, allegedly Enoch, is being listed as the son of Agathodaemon, allegedly Seth, when the Bible says that the Sethian Enoch is removed from Seth by several generations, and that the other Enoch ’s father is Seth ’s brother Cain. Others, such as Dennis William Hauck, have claimed that Agathodaemon is really the god Thoth.

It is also fascinating when you consider what was written by tenth century historian Abu l-Hasan al-Masudi, following up on the notion that the Hermeses built the pyramids at Giza. He took it a step further, writing:

One of the two pyramids is the tomb of Agathodaimon, the other one is the tomb of Hermes. Between the two 1000 years elapsed, Agathodaimon was the older one.

Could it be that the alleged “pillars of Seth ” are in fact the two large pyramids themselves, one believed at one point to house the body of Agathodaemon, who is Seth (and who may well actually be the same person as his purported brother Cain), and the other covering the body of his son Hermes, who is Enoch?

The Arabic traditions of Enoch ’s trip to Heaven are fascinating when added and compared to the Judeo-Christian tradition of Enoch, as well as the known traditions of Hermes. According to seventh century Koranic scholar Abdallah ibn al-Abbas, the “angel of the sun ” gave Idris the secret name of God. He purportedly used it to ascend to the “Fourth Heaven ” (that of the sun).

Other chronicles give other interesting details. Abu Hatim ar-Razi said that God took Hermes-Idris to a high mountain in the center of the Earth, where an angel taught him astrology. Third-century historian and astrologer Manetho wrote that God took Enoch so “high ” up into the heavens that he could see and actually walk upon the celestial sphere. Thus he was able to see and understand the entire system of the zodiac and the planets. The Book of the Apple (Kitab at- Tuffaha) —author unknown but ascribed erroneously to Aristotle and dated sometime before the tenth century —simply says that “Hermes ” ascended to Heaven and came back, bringing down with him philosophy and other heavenly secrets from the “Noble Record ” shown to him by the angels. The tenth or eleventh-century author of the Hermetic ar-Risalaal-falakiya al-kubra (Great Treatise of the Spheres) also speaks of Hermes ' heavenly journey. Likewise, the Brethren of Purity, a secret society of Muslim philosophers in eighth-century Basra, Iraq, wrote in their encyclopedia of science and philosophy:

It is related about Hermes the Triplicate in Wisdom, who is Idris the prophet —peace be upon him—that he rose to the sphere of Saturn and turned together with it for thirty years until he witnessed all the states of the heavenly sphere.

As Van Bladel points out, in the astrology system they were using at the time, Saturn was the seventh and highest of the planetary spheres. Thirty years is amount of time it takes for Saturn to travel through all of the houses of the Zodiac. This is the source of the natal astrology term "Saturn 's return " (a thirty- year cyclical pattern that people purportedly experience throughout their lives).

Incidentally, Van Bladel seems to think that after Hermes became identified with Enoch and assumed his biography, Hermes-Enoch-Idris ' trip to heaven began to be taken as the method by which he learned astrology. This accords with other traditions that Enoch was the first astrologer. One source of these is third century Syrian philosopher Bar Daysan, who credited Enoch with inventing the "Chaldean art " of astrology himself. This is perfectly in line with Christian tradition. In The Second Book of Enoch 44:5, Enoch makes the following statement about himself:

I have arranged the whole year. And from the year I calculated the months, and from the months I have ticked off the days, and from the day I have ticked off the hours. I, I have measured and noted the hours. And I have distinguished every seed on the earth, and every measure and every righteous scale. I have measured and recorded them.

Incidentally, The Second Book of Enoch 1.217 also shows Enoch playing the role of the judge for the "measurement " of each person at Final Judgement, much like Osiris did in the Egyptian pantheon, using the "Scales of Thoth. " Here, Enoch says:

… In the great judgement day every measure and weight in the market will be exposed, and each one will recognize his own measure, and in it he will receive his reward… . Before humankind existed, a place of judgment, ahead of time, was prepared for them, and scales and weights by means of which a person will be tested.

Michael the Elder, twelfth century patriarch of the Syriac Orthodox Church, also said that Enoch was the first to bring writing into the world, presumably from Heaven, just as Hermes and Thoth are credited with doing. In Christian tradition, Enoch is said to have written a total of 366 books, just one more than the number of years he purportedly lived: 365 (also the number of days in a solar year). The closeness of these two numbers (how many books he wrote and how many days he lived) seems to be a coincidence with some sort of meaning. So too is the fact that, according to Manetho, Hermes wrote 365,000 books. Perhaps also of note is the fact that the Gnostic entity of Abraxas, a composite chimera like Baphomet, with the head of a chicken and snakes for legs, is taken as a representation of the Demiurge and, for some reason, is associated with the number 365. We will discuss this more in a later chapter.

Moving along, we find another account of Hermes ' heavenly journey in The Book of the Secrets of Creation (Kitab Sirr al-haliqa), written in Arabic between 813 and 833 AD and falsely attributed to the authorship of Apollonius of Tyana (a.k.a. Balinas). This was the name of a Cappadocian mystic who lived at the time of Christ and had a surprisingly similar biography, including a career of healing the sick, resurrecting the dead, casting out demons, and the claim of his followers that he ascended to Heaven bodily at the end of his life. The book purports to tell the story of how, as a youth, Apollonius discovered the tomb of Hermes in a secret underground chamber, and in it the Emerald Tablet, with its unsurpassed alchemical mysteries inscribed upon it. It also describes what seems to be the story of Hermes rising to Heaven, but at the same time it resembles a description of a substance being transmuted from a lower, denser matter into the higher, subtler form of the Philosopher 's Stone. In this sense, Hermes seems to be equated with the transmuted substance itself.

The story of Apollonius, and how he allegedly used the tablets wisdom to perform miracles, is told in great detail in The Life of Apollonius of Tyana by second to third-century Greek Sophist Flavius Philostratus. Dennis William Hauck 's The Emerald Tablet: Alchemy for Personal Transformation gives a shortened version (also drawing from other, more imaginative modern sources such as twentieth-century Theosophist GRS Mead). Hauck claims that Apollonius was himself the Third Hermes, on unclear authority.

However, Ibn Nubata, in his eighth-century Commentary on the Epistle of Ibn Zaydun , does say that Apollonius was Hermes ’ student, and traveled with him personally. He also says that “Asclepius ” was another name for Apollonius. As for which of the three Hermeses Apollonius was apprenticed to, Ibn Nubata quotes varying sources that name each of the three. None of his sources seem to agree on that detail. He didn ’t say that Apollonius was a “Hermes, ” but he did say, “The Sabians claim that Asclepius had the prophethood after ” his teacher, as though he was in the same line of “apostolic succession ” as the Hermeses. He also said people thought Apollonius was an angel or descended from angels, that he was taken to Heaven “on a pillar of light ” at the end of his life, and that “Euclid traced his ancestry to him. ”

The issue of the alleged “Hermeticism ” of the Sabians of Harran, as discussed previously, has been a cause celebre among modern multiculturalist occultists and other writers looking to pointing out contributions from any seemingly “Islamic ” source to the history of humanity in general and Western mysticism (largely based on Hermetics) in particular. This cause has also been embraced by certain authors with Islamic backgrounds looking to put a pleasant face on the often harsh fundamentalist image of the religion ’s traditions by pointing out the heterodox variety of belief systems that have operated under the umbrella of “Islam ” (often under threat of persecution from fundamentalists). Seyyed Hossein Nasr wrote in 1967 that, “In the Muslim world, Hermeticism must be considered as one of the most important factors which aided in the construction of the Muslim worldview. ” Complaining about the desperate reaching on some of the commentators about this subject, Kevin van Bladel has said:

In the context of Arabic literature, modern scholars generally use the word Hermetic to refer not just to works associated with the name Hermes, but also to all manner of works with allegedly “Gnostic, ” “Neoplatonic, ” “Neopythagorean, ” or “esoteric ” tendencies or practically any early Arabic pseudepigraph. Above all, it is used to refer to the beliefs of the Sabians of Harran.

As we have already discussed more briefly above, in order to be accepted by Islamic rulers, the Harranians adopted the moniker “Sabian ” from The Koran to claim a protected status in their society. Literature was circulated which purported that they were followers of a prophet named Hermes, and that his teachings were compatible with Islam. As we demonstrated earlier, this may have begun with the family of Harranian Tabit ibn Qurra, who immigrated to Baghdad. Ninth century philosopher Ysaf al-Kindi quoted from a book he had access to called Chapters of Hermes on the Doctrine of Monotheism, which he wrote for his son most expertly . The word “At-tawhid, ” translated here as “monotheism, ” is most often used to indicate Muslim belief specifically. This idea of Hermes as a proto-Islamic prophet had become the accepted norm. Then in the thirteenth century, Al-Mubassir ibn Fatik ’s Liber philosophorum moralium antiquorum reported the following:

Hermes left Egypt and went around the whole world… . In seventy-two languages he called the people of the entire earth ’s population to worship the Creator, the Mighty and High. God granted him wisdom so that he spoke to them in their different languages, taught them and educated them. He built for them a hundred and eight great cities, the smallest of which is Edessa. He was the first who discovered astrology, and he established for each region a model of religious practice for them to follow which corresponded to their views. Kings were his servants, and the whole earth ’s population and the population of the islands in the seas obeyed him.

Note that the number of cities be built (108) corresponds with the number of suitors Penelope had in The Odyssey , who, in an alternate version of the story, all combined their semen in her womb to conceive the god Pan, elsewhere thought to be a son of Hermes the god. The next paragraph of Liber philosophorum makes the worship of the creator that this Hermes taught seem very Islamic indeed:

He preached God ’s judgment, belief in God ’s unity, mankind ’s worship [of God], … and saving souls from punishment. He incited [people] to abstain piously from this world, to act justly, and to seek salvation in the next world. He commanded them to perform prayers that he stated for them in manners that he explained to them, and to fast on recognized days of each month, to undertake holy war (jihad) against the enemies of the religion, and to give charity from [their] possessions and to assist the weak with it. He bound them with oaths of ritual purity from pollutants, menstruation, and touching the dead. He ordered them to forbid eating pig, ass, camel, dog, and other foods. He forbade intoxication from every type of beverage, and stated this in the most severe terms.

Al-Mubassir goes on to add that at one point, everyone in the world converted to this religion, which was called din al-qayyima (“the right religion ”), and that they prayed to the south along the line of the meridian. As Van Bladel notes, “We encounter here again the notion that the religion of Hermes was the universal, primordial religion. ” The phrase din al-qayyima comes from The Koran , Sura 98, Verses two through five, where it says that this doctrine would be preached by:

… an apostle from God reciting purified scrolls in which are right scriptures. Those who received the book went their separate ways only after the clear proof came to them. They were ordered only to worship God, sincerely practicing his religion as hunafa, and to practice prayer and to bring alms. That is the right religion… .

The implication in The Koran is that Mohammed learned his teachings from divinely-written scrolls, just as The Book of the Apple says Enoch-Idris- Hermes learned his wisdom from reading the “Noble Record ” in Heaven. Al- Mubassir ’s implication is that the doctrine taught by Hermes is the same one found by Mohammed on the purified scrolls, or that the apostle referred to in Sura 98 is not Mohammed but Hermes.

In The History of Learned Men from twelve to thirteenth century Egyptian scholar Ibn al Qifti, a document is duplicated called Testament of Ammon , which shows Hermes giving advice to Ammon on how to be a just and effective king. It makes him into a defender of a rather harsh form of Islamic sharia (law).

… Take care not to delay battle and holy war (jihad) against those who do not believe in God —His name is most high — and those who do not follow my custom and my law (sunnati wa-sari ’ati), because of your desire that they enter into obedience to God the Exalted… . Whoever defames your rule, decapitate him and make it known so that others will beware. Whoever steals, cut off his hand. Who robs on a path, cut off his head and crucify him so that news of it spreads and your roads be safe. Whoever is found with a male like himself, fornicating with him, must be burned in fire. Whoever is found with a woman committing adultery with her, strike him with fifty lashes and stone the woman with a hundred stones after establishing sure proof of it.

Van Bladel, who believes this text was written by a Harranian Sabian trying to “argue for the legitimacy of his religion ” among Muslims, writes sneeringly:

Here we seem to have found at last an example of the “Hermeticism ” of the Harranians in Baghdad so much speculated about. Instead of cosmic sympathies and revelatory initiations, we find corporal punishments, holy war… .

These aren ’t the only sources to make Hermes seem somewhat less than politically correct by modern standards. Ninth to tenth-century Iranian writer Al- Tha ’alibi says that Hermes “was the first to make use of weapons, make war and capture people as slaves. ” It seems that these texts ’ authors were eager to present Hermes as the primordial prophet, king, and lawgiver, whose students (the Harranian Sabians who attended court in Baghdad) were fit to be advisors to kings, like Aristotle had been to Alexander. Therefore the type of law he was seen as promoting was whatever Islamic potentates of the day wanted to hear, to make them feel like they were doing it right. Thus the declarations quoted above were cobbled together with the sayings of other known philosophers, but here all attributed to Hermes, in order to establish his wisdom bona fides.

When the Neoplatonic Enneads of Plotinus, IV-VI were translated into Arabic in the ninth century, a great deal of other material was interpolated into it, and it was given a new name which translates to The Theology of Aristotle . In it, Aristotle himself is presented as having been influenced by the teachings of Hermes. Also, in the tenth century Kitab at-Tuffaha , Aristotle is shown recommending the words of Hermes to his students while on his deathbed. There are even Arabic books on talismanic magic ascribed (erroneously, of course) to Aristotle (but in reality written by a Harranian Sabian), in which the author cites the wisdom of Hermes on the subject of occult practice. (According to Van Bladel, Hermes was more well-known in Arabic-speaking lands as the source of books on talismanic magic, astrology and alchemy, rather than The Corpus Hermeticum and other books of mysticism that made him famous in Europe.) Another text called As-Siyasa al-ammiya shows Alexander quoting Hermes to Aristotle the equivalent of the well-known Hermetic maxim “As above, so below. ” As he put it:

Hermes the preeminent in knowledge spoke well when he said, “Man is a microcosm and the celestial sphere is the macrocosm. ”

In a similar vein, twelfth century Persian poet Nizami, in his Iqbal-nama , shows Hermes appearing before Alexander on a panel of sages that includes Aristotle, Plato, and Socrates. Later in the same work, a group of seventy Greek philosophers becomes jealous of Hermes ’ wisdom, and all agree to ignore him, for which he curses them with being frozen in place until they die (like the effect of the deadly gaze of Medusa or Al-Ghul).

Other Arabic sources also claimed Hermes as the ultimate historic source for the fount of philosophy. Ninth-century historian As-Masudi wrote that Pythagoras and Plato got their knowledge from Hermes by reading his tablets. Tenth to eleventh-century philosopher Ibn al-Haytam, whilst arguing in favor of Greek philosophy, said that their sages were “followers ” of the “prophet ” Hermes-Idris, whom he credited with the revelation of astrology and math as well. Also, the twelfth century Andalusian thinkers Ibn Bagga and Yahuda ha-Levi wrote that Hermes had achieved a special relationship with something called the “Active Intellect, ” a divine emanation that they believed, as Van Bladel describes it, “gave rise to the celestial spheres, [and] was regarded as the cause of all human understanding, frequently described by the visual metaphor of light… . ” They said that Hermes, along with Socrates, Plato, Aristotle, and Asclepius, had attained the level of “perfect human, ” and thus were able to connect with the Active Intellect.

However erroneous and deceptive its origins are, this material influenced the development of Islamic theology. The Ismaili sect (from which the Assassins arose) was, by the ninth century, according to Van Bladel, “the first organized group with an official doctrine about Hermes ” as a legitimate prophet. However, the fourth century poet Ephraem from Syria had already written that the Persian religion of Manicheanism embraced Hermes as a prophet, along with Jesus and Plato.

In the twelfth century, Sihabdin Yahya as-Suhrawardi, founder of the “Israqi ” school of thought and associated today with the mystical Islamic movement broadly known as “Sufism, ” claimed to be continuing the philosophical tradition of Hermes, as, he purported, Plato, Empedocles, and Agathodaemon had done before him. He said that Hermes gained his wisdom because he had the power to “doff his body and rise up ” to “the higher world. ” This tradition of citing Hermes as a philosophical ancestor was continued by the thirteenth century Sufi writers Ibn Sabin and As-Sustari as well.

What became known as “Hermeticism ” seems to have been cooked in the same crucible as what became known as “Gnosticism, ” and the two terms (while significantly different) are often associated with each other. Indeed, there is quite a bit of overlap. The Gnostic idea that a Demiurge apart from the highest deity created the material world is common in many writings attributed to Hermes. The first discourse of The Corpus Hermeticum , entitled “Poimandres, ” describes creation thusly:

The mind who is god, being androgyne and existing as life and light, by speaking gave birth to a second mind, a craftsman, who, as god of fire and spirit, crafted seven governors; they encompass the sensible world in circles, and their government is called fate.

This would go along with As-Sarahsi ’s description of the Harranian religion, as paraphrased by Van Bladel, “that the Sabians sacrificed to the planets, and not to the Creator, because the planets, and not god directly, actually administered the world. ” Similar notions are expressed in the aforementioned magical text The Book of Nabathean Agriculture . There, instructions are given to pray to idols of the planets (what Gnostics viewed as the “archontic powers, ”), whilst still recognizing the supremacy of the One God, because it is the planets who actually manage the day-to-day matters of the universe, and whose job it is to listen to such prayers. One gets the idea that there is a call queue directing calls to customer service representatives (the planets), which can, at times, be escalated to the supervisor (the Demiurge), but almost nobody ever speaks to the company owner, the Father of All, who just sits in his office alone being God.

The third to fourth century Gnostic-Hermetic alchemist Zosimos of Panopolis made explicit references to a book supposedly written by Hermes called Physika , which is lost to us now. It deals with the same story as The First Book of Enoch , regarding fallen angels having intercourse with women. Ninth- century Byzantine historian George Synkellos also wrote about this in his Ecloga Chronographica :

It is stated in the holy scriptures or books, dear lady, that there exists a race of daimons who have commerce with women. Hermes made mention of them in his Physika ; in fact almost the entire work, openly and secretly, alludes to them. It is related in the ancient and divine scriptures that certain angels lusted for women, and descending from the heavens, they taught them all the arts of nature. On account of this, says the scripture, they offended god, and now live outside heaven —because they taught to men all the evil arts which are of no advantage to the soul.

Is it possible that this Physika was actually The First Book of Enoch itself? It would make sense, considering that Hermes is purportedly the same person as Enoch, the author and main character of that book, which appears to have the same subject matter as the now lost Physika of Hermes. Also note that in the story of The First Book of Enoch , the mountain which the angels land on when they come to Earth, and upon which they make their pact together to breed with humans, is called “Mount Hermon. ” The name is usually translated “Place of the Curse, ” but it is worth considering that it might have somehow been based on the name of Hermes. Since his name is thought to refer to “boundary-posts ” (and the crossing of them), perhaps both interpretations are correct, as Mount Hermon is where the angels crossed their God-ordained boundaries and defiled themselves as well as the Earth.

We note here that the Harranian Sabians are not the only group to officially take on the label of, and be officially recognized as, the Sabians of The Koran . The Mandaeans of Iraq have also identified themselves as such. For them, they claim that the name actually applies to them because of their their baptismal rite, called “Seboghatullah ” — “immersion in the divine mystery ” which seems very similar in meaning to “Baptism of Wisdom. ” While the Mandaeans are sometimes described as a “quasi-Islamic ” sect, they are also commonly, and more accurately, described as a Gnostic religion —one of the few surviving Gnostic faiths in the world. Interestingly, the word “Hanif ” is sometimes used to denote a “Sabian ” in the Islamic world. But Hanif is also a common first name in Muslim lands, and is listed in books of baby names as a variation of “John. ” As it turns out, Mandaeans take as their chief prophet not Mohammed, but John the Baptist, who they credit with starting having started their group in the first place. This, as we shall see, is very significant. But before we explore these topics, let us learn a bit more about Gnosticism, and the wisdom goddess Sophia for whom, it is said, the name of Baphomet stands as a cryptic code.

Chapter 5: Divine Knowledge

And it happened this way because of the will of God that men be better than the gods, since, indeed, the gods are immortal, but men alone are both immortal and mortal. Therefore, man has become akin to the gods, and they know the affairs of each other with certainty. The gods know the things of men, and men know the things of the gods. And I am speaking about men, Asclepius, who have attained learning and knowledge. But (about) those who are more vain than these, it is not fitting that we say anything base, since we are divine and are introducing holy matters.

— Asclepius 21-29

There is no simple definition of Gnosticism. Scholars have debated over it for years. Few religions are built upon such a provocative and complex mythos. Discovered by accident in the desert sands of Egypt, the Nag Hammadi Library has given religious scholars the world over a glimpse into the ideology of this faith that has long been mysterious and misunderstood. Prior to 1945, the only things we knew about Gnosticism came from their sworn enemies in the Christian clergy. Although some of the Gnostic gospels found in the Nag Hammadi were among the earliest Christian texts, all were banned from the orthodox canon that would become the sanitized New Testament from the fourth century.

When studied objectively, Gnostic myth actually tells us a great deal about the social views of its time, as well as the evolution of the early Christian Church. It must also be said that not all of the texts found at Nag Hammadi are even Gnostic and many of them are quite orthodox (although an earlier variant of Christian orthodoxy). The scholar Robert M. Price gives us a brief history on the true significance of the Nag Hammadi in his article “A Survey on Some Recent Books on Gnosticism ”:

Scraps used for binding the Nag Hammadi codices attest that the work was done by the monks of St. Pachomius. We can ascertain the precise circumstances in which the texts were hidden away: the Festal Letter of Athanasius of Alexandria in 367 would have spelled trouble for the brethren of St. Pachomius with their exotic library. Indeed, it must have been just such currency of “heretical ” apocrypha that led Athanasius to frame his canon list in the first place! When we read the Nag Hammadi texts we are no doubt reading the very books Athanasius wanted to exclude! The texts tend to confirm all the major theories as to Gnostic roots. That Gnosticism is Platonic is implied by the fragment of the Republic discovered there. Reitzenstein ’s claim of interchangeability between Gnosis and the Hermetic Mysticism is confirmed by the presence of the Asklepios and other Hermetica at Nag Hammadi.

While there are Gnostic religious doctrines, there really is not one single monolithic Gnostic religion. The term refers to a set of specific metaphysical doctrines on spirituality. This peculiar spiritual orientation arose in Egypt around the time of Jesus ’ birth. Gnostics purported to engage in direct contact with a transcendent God through initiatory rites, embracing the belief that an inner spark or seed of divinity exists inside man which is consubstantial with God. They also had a transgressive take on scripture (particularly the Old Testament), the pagan gods, and a philosophical attitude taken from the varied religious and social environment of Late Antiquity. Carl Jung, as quoted by Murray Stein in Jung on Christianity , said:

The central ideas of Christianity are rooted in Gnostic philosophy, which, in accordance with psychological laws, simply had to grow up at a time when the classical religions had become obsolete. It was found on the perception of symbols thrown up by the unconscious individuation process which always sets in when the collective dominants of human life fall into decay. At such a time there is bound to be a considerable number of individuals who are possessed by archetypes of a numinous nature that forced their way to the surface in order to form new dominants.

As stated above, the term “Gnosticism ” has become something of a source of contention in academic circles. Some scholars have still held to the term as a useful category while others desire to eschew it altogether. Michael Allen Williams wrote in Rethinking Gnosticism , that the category should be entirely dismantled. The words “Gnostic ” isn ’t found at all in any of the codices found in Nag Hammadi, Egypt in 1945. The Church Father Irenaeus uses the word very loosely and inconsistently. Tertullian, another Church father and Latin lawyer from Carthage, doesn ’t use it at all in his writings against the heretics.

When all the statements are sorted out, it appears that perhaps it was the Carpocratians who called themselves “Gnostic ” originally, whereas none of the other heretics did. On the other hand, all the heretical sects did speak of “Gnosis,

” and they do share a common set of ideas. Today, we use the term in reference to their commonly shared doctrine of seeking a personal revelation from the highest god.

The Gnostics viewed man as contradictory and somewhat schizophrenic. In this perspective, man is essentially a dual being, made up of both pneumatic (spiritual) and hylic (material) essences. We see in The Apocryphon of John that Adam is described as being created through angels and demons working together to construct his body. In The Trimorphic Protennoia , it is the creator-god of Genesis , described as a “great demon, ” who creates the body of man, while his spirit is given by a higher being. In On the Origin of the World , it says that man was created “when Sophia let fall a droplet of light ” which “flowed onto the water, and immediately a human being appeared… . ” Yet, while the origins of mankind vary in the Gnostic mythos, it is generally agreed that the spirit is seen as the “pearl of great price, ” while the flesh was seen as worthless and degenerate. This differs from the modern Christian view that both the soul and flesh are fallen but yet essentially good, created in the image of God.

Just as the creation of fleshly man is seen as a negative thing in Gnosticism, so is the material cosmos. The Gospel of Philip tells us that matter “came into being through an error. ” These are most often the error of the lesser god of Genesis or of various lesser beings (the nefarious “Archons ”). For one to rise above this error, one must have knowledge, for as The Second Treatise of the Great Seth put it:

… They did not know the Knowledge of the Greatness, that it is from above and (from) a fountain of truth, and that it is not from slavery and jealousy, fear and love of worldly matter.

In The Apocryphon of John , the Lord (being the resurrected Jesus Christ) tells us that the dead and ignorant spirit after death is always in the clutches of the “Authorities ” (lesser gods) until it has received this “divine, experiential knowledge ”:

And after it comes out of (the body), it is handed over to the authorities, who came into being through the archon, and they bind it with chains and cast it into prison, and consort with it until it is liberated from the forgetfulness and acquires knowledge. And if thus it becomes perfect, it is saved.

The “Gnosis ” that these practitioners aimed to achieve was personified in the figure of Sophia (wisdom), and it has been frequently compared with the mystical idea of “Chokmah ” found in the Jewish cabala. In that system, the universe is represented by the Tree of Life, consisting of various “Sephiroth ” or spheres of existence, much like the Gnostic aeons. The “paths ” which connect the spheres are all paved with Chokmah, the Hebrew word for wisdom. This is defined as the wisdom that existed before good and evil, before Eve ate of the fruit of the Tree of Knowledge. In his commentary to the Kabbalistic text known as the Sefer Yetzirah (The Book of Creation), Aryeh Kaplan defines Chokmah:

Wisdom is pure thought, which has not yet been broken up into different ideas… . On the level of wisdom, all men are included in a single world soul.

The idea of Sophia as an emanation of God, specifically the “wisdom ” of God, is part of mainstream Christian theology as well. The word “sophia ” is used six times in the New Testament. In I Corinthians 1:23-24 the text refers to “Christ the power of God, and the sophia of God. ” The Eastern Orthodox Church saw Sophia as co-equal with Christ, and simultaneously an aspect of Christ as well. The Hagia Sophia or Church of the Holy Wisdom in Constantinople (now Istanbul, Turkey) was once the most magnificent church in all of Byzantium before it was seized in the Ottoman conquest of 1453 and turned into a mosque. “Sophiology,” or the worship of the female aspect of Christ as God ’s wisdom, has influenced many Christian mystics, including Jakob Bohme and Hildegard of Bingen.

Sophia has been compared to the Christian concept of the Holy Spirit, part of the Trinity. She has also been likened to the cabalistic concept of the Shekinah, a.k.a. the Matronit. This is the female aspect of God the Father, who can also be thought of as God ’s consort. “Shekinah ” is a word that means “whirlwind, ” as well as “divine presence, ” “royal residence, ” and “resting place. ” God purportedly used the Shekinah to manifest his presence every time he appeared to the Israelites. Furthermore, the Shekinah is connected to Metatron, the angel that Enoch the divine scribe allegedly transformed into when he ascended to Heaven. Therefore it can also be compared to the mythic figure of Hermes or Thoth.

The term “Gnostic ” actually originates with Plato, who used “Gnostic ” as a word for the ideal statesman. According to Irenaeus, Marcellina and her group of Carpocratians used the term for themselves (Against Heresies . 1 26, 6). Hippolytus also maintains that a group called the “Naasseni ” or the “Naassenes, ” who “sounded the depths of knowledge ” (Refutation . 5.1), called themselves Gnostics as well. Hippolytus claims that the Naassenes were the founders of the Gnostic heresy (Refutation. 6:1), but he is alone in this view. All of the other Church Fathers claim that the Gnostic heresy was founded by Simon Magus, starting with Justin Martyr and Irenaeus. Then there is Origen, who, in contrast to Hippolytus, says that the Naassenes were an “insignificant sect ” (Contra Celsus , 6:24).

Hence the Church Fathers do not agree on the Naassenes in terms of their role in history and their significance. Perhaps it mattered little whether Hippolytus ’ Naassenes preceded Simon Magus or Epiphanius ’ Phibionites preceded both of them, so long as every heretical system appeared secondary in some way in comparison to the rightful supremacy of the Catholic Church. But outside of the patristic tradition, there ’s little evidence that the word was used very much by the heretics. In Plato ’s Statesman 258b, he uses the term “episteme, ” which means the same. However, Plato uses the word to indicate political aptitude in reference to the “Philosopher Kings ” he talks about in the Republic . Gnostics would, however, apply the same word to spiritual aptitude. In Phaedo 66e Socrates says:

[I]f we are ever to know anything absolutely, we must be free from the body and must behold the actual realities with the eye of the soul alone… . [P]ure knowledge is impossible while the body is with us… .

Essentially this means that we cannot connect with pure knowledge when we are disturbed or distracted by the body. Socrates refers to pure knowledge as a naked understanding of reality, which is something beyond the realm of matter and the senses of the body. Irenaeus clearly describes these Gnostics as having hairesies (heresies) that deviate from the Catholic, apostolic brand of Christianity.

These Gnostics engaged in sympathetic healing magic, exorcisms, Asclepian-styled medicine, and meditative techniques that used correspondences between the powers of the Zodiac (as represented by the “Archons ”), and the human body, as seen in The Apocryphon of John , among other Gnostic texts.

The Church Fathers were very strategic in how they used the term “Gnosis. ” They did their best to differentiate between “true ” and “false ” Gnosis. The Gnostics possessed the latter, while the Catholics possessed the former. Irenaeus spoke of those who possess and profess “Gnosis falsely so-called. ” It appears to us that these Gnostics weren ’t exactly “world hating dualists ” who rejected matter. In fact, as Michael Allen Williams in Rethinking Gnosticism points out, those who voluntarily immigrated to ancient Rome weren ’t exactly ivory tower-dwellers, but were among the more “economically advantaged, ” as he put it. Williams presents a number of citations to support this assertion, including ones from Epiphanius, Tertullian and Irenaeus, who all claim that these Gnostics and Valentinians were of a refined social class.

Clement of Alexandria attempted to rehabilitate the term “Gnostic, ” reserving it for the perfect and mature Christian who observes the Law of Moses with a life of self-restraint and contemplation on God. However, Clement himself had many philosophically pagan ideas derived from the surrounding mystery schools that influenced his thinking and his brand of Christianity, which later became orthodoxy. At first he was recognized as a saint, but this honor was removed from his name by Pope Clement VIII because his doctrines were at the very least suspect, if not downright heretical.

The idea of there being a “mature ” class of initiated Christians (e.g. the Gnostics) is actually found in 1 Corinthians 2:6-8 (NIV):

We do, however, speak a message of wisdom among the mature, but not the wisdom of this age or of the rulers of this age, who are coming to nothing. No, we declare God ’s wisdom, a mystery that has been hidden and that God destined for our glory before time began.

Branding these people as gnostikoi with hairesies was a rhetorical strategy to mark them negatively as the “other, ” so to speak. Irenaeus claimed in Against Heresies (1.29.1) that these people were so numerous and diverse that they sprung up even among the Christians:

Besides those, however, among these heretics who are Simonians, and of whom we have already spoken, a multitude of Gnostics have sprung up, and have been manifested like mushrooms growing out of the ground.

In particular, Irenaeus goes in many tirades against these Gnostics (especially against arch-heretics like Valentinus and Marcion), who propagated Sethian mythology, which is commonly identified with the Gnostic group known as the “Ophites. ” It was the Ophites from whom Joseph von Hammer-Purgstall believed the Knights Templar had copied their rituals and secret theology. “Ophite ” comes from the Greek word for “snake, ” a reference to the Serpent in the Garden of Eden. They revered the Serpent as the true savior and hero of the story of Genesis , because he brought divine wisdom or “Gnosis ” to mankind in the form of the fruit of the Tree of Knowledge.

Likewise the God of the Old Testament, Jehovah, is described diminutively as a “Demiurge, ” an insane and demented creator of the universe who, is so doing, separated man from the divine essence by causing spirit to incarnate into matter. The word “demiurge ” comes from a Greek word meaning “artisan, ” “craftsman, ” or “skilled worker. ” It is a term that also originates in Plato ’s writings, specifically in Timaeus . The Ophites believed that the Demiurge did not want mankind to be illuminated with divine Gnosis, and thus reunified with the uncreated essence, because that would allow us to escape his false creation. That is why he forbade eating from the Tree of Knowledge, and that is why, in this worldview, the Serpent promoted it.

Irenaeus describes their theology in great detail, revealing that Gnostic groups like the Ophites were direct inheritors of Hellenistic Jewish speculative theology that dealt with angelology and Logos theories. Against Heresies 1.30 goes through a blow-by-blow account of the Ophite creation story, the Flood, and their peculiar views on the prophets, as well as the Resurrection of Jesus Christ. The exact origin of the Ophites lies in obscurity. Some scholars believe that their theology was derived from the teachings of the heretic Marcion (70- 150 AD), although we really don ’t see much of a connection there.

The likely reason that Marcion is (perhaps erroneously) credited with inspiring Ophitism is because he rejected the authority of the Old Testament in favor of his Apostolikon , which contained earlier variants of St. Paul ’s epistles, an early version of The Gospel of Luke , which he called The Gospel of the Lord , and The Antithesis , and was supposed to explain all the deep contradictions between the Old Testament and Marcion ’s New Testament. By extension, Marcion also rejected the Mosaic Law, the Sabbaths, holidays, New Moon festivals, the prophets, the angels, and Jehovah, the God of the Jews. Marcion demoted them to inferior powers, elevating instead the lofty revelation of Jesus Christ, whom he called “Isu Chrestos, ” the “Chrestos ” (the Good), and the “Foreigner ” or the “Alien God ” (as he was previously unknown to the world).

Marcion is often credited with having first conceived of the idea of the New Testament, and yet he was branded as a heretic and condemned furiously by his Catholic enemies, including Irenaeus, Tertullian and Origen. In fact, the bulk of the New Testament texts we have now are nothing more than the last vestiges of a severely tampered, rewritten version of Marcion ’s original canon which we have no surviving copies of. The Ophites, on the other hand seemed to be very much inspired by the Old Testament as well as the New —although their interpretations of biblical theology obviously differ strongly from what is normally accepted.

Marcionite Christianity seems to represent a later stage of Gnosticism, when Christian doctrine was just starting to formulate and the Old Testament was being touted as authoritative scripture (their only scripture really) by the Catholics. The views held by the Ophites as well as authors of other Gnostic texts contain very esoteric, bizarre and downright convoluted mythological and cosmological accounts which are far-removed from the conservative theology of Marcion. The biggest distinguishing factor of Marcion ’s worldview was his refusal to interpret Jewish scriptures as allegorical like many of his Gnostic and Hellenistic-Jewish opponents did, such as Philo of Alexandria.

Marcion ’s radical dualism (contrasting Pauline Christology with the Judaizing legalism of Peter ’s church) can be seen as a foundational underpinning of Gnosticism. However, Gnostics such as the Ophites tended to envision a single source for everything (monotheism), and embraced a Judaic or monistic conceptualization of the origin of God. This highly conflicts with Marcion ’s view that there was a Supreme, Unknowable “God of Love ” and a vastly inferior “God of Wrath ” (the creator god Jehovah). The reason for this contradiction between Marcionite and Gnostic theology may have to do with their supposed founder, Simon Magus. In The Gnostic Gospels , Elaine Pagels writes about the conflicting relationship between these two gods:

What this secret tradition reveals is that the one whom most Christians naively worship as creator, God, and Father is, in reality, only the image of the true God. According to Valentinus, what Clement and Ignatius mistakenly ascribe to God actually applies only to the creator. Valentinus, following Plato, uses the Greek term for “creator ” (demiurgos), suggesting that he is a lesser divine being who serves as the instrument of the higher powers. It is not God, he explains, but the demiurge who reigns as king and lord, who acts as a military commander, who gives the law and judges those who violate it —in short, he is the “God of Israel. ” Through the initiation Valentinus offers, the candidate learns to reject the creator ’s authority and all his demands as foolishness. What gnostics know is that the creator makes false claims to power (“I am God, and there is no other ”) that derive from his own ignorance. Achieving gnosis involves coming to recognize the true source of divine power —namely, “the depth ” of all being. Whoever has come to know that source simultaneously comes to know himself and discovers his spiritual origin: he has come to know his true Father and Mother.

In essence, as Michael Allen Williams claims in Rethinking Gnosticism , these demiurgical myths can be construed as veiled political protests, which call upon people to reject the legitimacy of all the political structures of the world. It is obvious that these myths are about the rejection of religious authority as well (e.g. common organized religion or orthodoxy).

Returning to the subject of the Ophites, they seem to have draw inspiration from the many different mystery religions of Egypt, Phrygia, Babylon, India and Greece. The so-called “Orphic serpent, ” entwined around an egg containing an embryo of the god Phanes/Eros, was one of their divine symbols, as was the famous Ouroboros symbol (the serpent that consumes its own tail). In essence, Ophite theology remains substantially pagan despite its biblical inspiration, as does that of the Naassenes. Church Fathers like Irenaeus, Hippolytus and Origen all considered the Ophites pagan.

The famous Theosophist GRS Mead, in Fragments of a Faith Forgotten , makes an interesting observation on the word “Ophite ” that many modern scholars seem to have failed to notice or address. He wrote:

The term “Ophite ” is exceedingly erroneous; it does not generally describe the schools of which we are treating; it was not used by the adherents of the schools themselves, who mostly preferred the term Gnostic; even where the symbolism of the serpent enters into the exposition of their systems, it is by no means the characteristic feature. In brief, this term, which originated in the fallacy of taking a very small part for the whole —a favourite trick of the heresiologist, whose main weapon was to exaggerate a minor detail into a main characteristic —has been used as a vague designation for all exposition of Gnostic doctrine which could not be ascribed to a definite teacher.

The Naassenes, named after na ‘asch , the Hebrew word for “snake, ” existed in the first century AD. This point is particularly stressed by Hippolytus in his work Refutation of All Heresies , tying them to the pagan mysteries. They called the chief Archon “Ialdabaoth, ” “Samael, ” or “Saklas, ” all names are found in The Apocryphon of John . Another Gnostic group, the Sethians, believed that Adam and Eve ’s third son Seth was a divine emanation, born purely of spirit, and that it was the destiny of Seth ’s descendants to eternally battle the sons of Cain, whom they thought to be the posterity of the Demiurge. All of this is explained in The Apocalypse of Adam .

The Borborites, meaning “the filthy ones, ” were particularly known for their rituals involving the consumption of menstrual blood, semen, and aborted human fetuses. (These are things which the Knights Templar were accused of doing also.) Allegedly, there even existed a sect called the Cainites, who, rather than seeing him as the child of the Demiurge, revered Cain as a martyr for the cause against him. Many villains of the Bible, like Cain, Esau, Korah, the Sodomites, and Judas Iscariot were also said to be revered. We will return to these Cainites and their theology later in this chapter.

Many have identified the Ophites and the Naassenes as being one and the same group. Although they do have some obvious similarities, in that they both revered the serpent of Genesis , there are also some notable differences, as we will see further on. Texts such as The Apocryphon of John seem to contain theological ideas ascribed to the Ophites that were similar to the ones described by Irenaeus. All the information we have about the Naassenes comes from either the Philosophoumena or the Refutation of All Heresies . In Irenaeus ’ account of Ophite theology, he maintained that like almost all Gnostic groups, the Ophites taught aeonic emanationism, much like these Naassenes.

Generally speaking, it was the Gnostic view that the world was created in a series of “emanations ” of Godhead, or “aeons,” which descended one from another, each new generation more dense and less subtle than the last. Sophia, or “divine wisdom,” was the last and the lowest of those emanations. It was she who fell from grace and became impregnated with Ialdabaoth, destined to create an evil material universe with his demigod helpers, the “Archons. ” Ray Embry, in the article “Marcion: Possible Progenitor of Three Famous Communities: Baptists, Catholics, Gnostics, ” remarks about Gnostic metaphysics and how different it was from Marcion ’s radical metaphysical dualist belief about there being two gods:

The Gnostics believed they had adequately explained how darkness and corruption could ultimately descend from a singular source of Divine Light. Between that Perfect Light and our imperfect world, there are (according to the Gnostics) a significant number of stations, events and beings that tend to absorb the attribution of evil away from the highest level of Divine Unity.

In The Second Treatise of the Great Seth , Sophia is called a “whore. ” Church Fathers like Epiphanius called her “Prunikos, ” meaning “lewd ” or “lustful one, ” because, though originally a virginal goddess, by her fall from the purity of the original aeons, she was the cause of the fall of the cosmos. Like the Serpent of Genesis, she was said to be a divine being that brought sexual knowledge to the universe, and with it, generation and ultimately death —or at least “spiritual death ” (i.e., ignorance). So, in essence, she was linked with the fall of Eden, even though she brought knowledge down below to the profane cosmos. Simone Petrement explains in A Separate God: The Origins and Teachings of Gnosticism that, although the title of “Prunikos ” is interpreted as indicating lasciviousness and licentiousness by Church Fathers like Epiphanius, it actually means a divine “bearer ” or “holder. ” This reminds us of the Christian idea that that the Virgin Mary was the Theotokos or “God-bearer ” of Christ. Petrement writes:

The name is formed from pro (“before ” or “in front ”) and a word that seems to be related to the second aorist eneika (analogous to enenka) of the verb phero , “to carry. ” Prounikos could therefore evoke the meaning of “to carry in front, ” that is, to promote, to bring, to reveal, to bring to light. Prophero might mean to produce, and therefore to beget, to give birth.

To gain further background information, we must look back to the creation myths ascribed to the Ophites. Their myths, like other Gnostic groups, are remarkably erotic and build on the Genesis account while allegorizing it in a much broader, more metaphysical context. As Irenaeus explains, there was the “First Man, ” who is equated with the Monad called “Bythos, ” meaning “Depth. ” This “First Man ” emanated a female divinity called Ennoea, much like the myths and legends ascribed to Simon Magus and his female concubine sorceress, Helena. (We will also get to them later in another chapter). From their holy union, they generated the “Son of Man ” or the second man. Below the Son of Man is the Holy Spirit spoken of in feminine terms as the “First Woman ” (like Eve). Beneath the First Woman lay the elements of chaos and the Abyss. The First and Second Man delighted over the Holy Spirit, had intercourse with her, and begat a third power called “Christ. ” Irenaeus also says that all of these holy powers mentioned meet and congregate in an “incorruptible aeon ” likened to that of the “true and holy Church ” of the Pleroma.

To the Ophites, a power ejected by Sophia (through her “Sinistra, ” which could be a reference to her “left side ”) fell by “ebullition ” (bubbling, boiling, or bursting forth). Therefore, just like how she is described above, Sophia fell into the primordial waters of chaos and brought with her fragments of divine light. The primal waters immediately clung around these light particles as well as Sophia, and formed inferior bodies. Sophia regretted this course of action and grieved. She attempted to ascend back above to her mother, the Holy Spirit, but failed to do so because of the sheer weight of the watery matter she found herself entrapped in, like quicksand. Somehow in this chaotic primeval mess, the light that Sophia attempted to hide from the elements was taken away from her grasp and formed the material cosmos that we know. These spiritual particles are thus divided and dispersed throughout the universe.

In this formulation of the cosmos, a god-like power ejected from Sophia ’s womb, which in other Gnostic texts is described as an “abortion. ” This is much like how other Gnostic texts describe Ialdabaoth, particularly On the Origin of the World . This same text also describes how Sophia flowed within the chaos of the prima materia and gave birth to an archontic fetus, as well as water that ’s likened to afterbirth or the amniotic fluid, which “came into being out of the shadow and was cast aside. ” Simone Petrement explains the significance of this event:

Now Sophia gives birth to the Demiurge, and we see that, according to one version of the myth, her error was precisely to wish to give birth by herself, as God.

Here, Sophia acts like a feminized version of the Lucifer of Isaiah and Ezekiel . In another variation of the Sophia myth, the reason why Sophia fell was because she loved and desired God so much that she “always stretched herself farther out in front, ” throwing herself towards God in an imprudent way that was not permitted (Against Heresies . 1, 2, 2).

When her fetus, the Demiurge, was ejected, he stole a portion of Sophia ’s divine power and weakened her even further. He did not know that he was begotten from a parent and did not know any mother. Yet, he still had an unconscious desire for the light above him. This being, called “Ialdabaoth, ” then generated six sons. Together they all formed the “Hebdomad ” (a group of seven), much like how the aeons preceded each other with each successive generation in the light world above. Aside from Ialdabaoth, there was Iao, Sabaoth, Adoneus, Eloeus, Oreus and Astanphaeus. These beings are simply avatars of the Demiurge. Above these seven powers was, naturally, their grandmother Sophia, who resided in the eighth place, forming the “Ogdoad ” (a group of eight).

These powers represent the seven heavens and all the celestial beings that inhabit them, including the angels, archangels, potentates, thrones, and principalities. Ialdabaoth ’s sons proceeded to quarrel with one another over supremacy, indicating a war in the seven heavens was occurring. This caused Ialdabaoth to greatly grieve. He “casted his eyes upon the subjacent dregs of matter, ” and created a serpent-like being called “Nous ” (Greek for “Mind ”). This is similar to the “Naas ” of the Naassenes of Hippolytus.

Like Sophia, this serpent is said to engender “oblivion, wickedness, emulation, envy and death. ” One would think the Ophites would celebrate the serpent in this episode, but it appears that this serpent, described pejoratively as “crooked, ” is yet another cause of the fallen cosmos to deviate further from the ideal. Another Gnostic text, The Apocryphon of John , has many similarities (and differences) with Irenaeus ’ account of the Ophites. In particular, this text actually condemns the serpent as being part of the same order as the chief Archon, Ialdabaoth:

And I said to the savior, “Lord, was it not the serpent that taught Adam to eat? ” The savior smiled and said, “The serpent taught them to eat from wickedness of begetting, lust, (and) destruction, that he (Adam) might be useful to him. And he (Adam) knew that he was disobedient to him (the chief archon) due to light of the Epinoia which is in him, which made him more correct in his thinking than the chief archon. And (the latter) wanted to bring about the power which he himself had given him. And he brought a forgetfulness over Adam. ”

True to form, Ialdabaoth decided to boast in an outrageous, egotistical gesture that mirrored Jehovah ’s remarks in Isaiah 45:5:

I am father, and God, and above me there is no one.

This haughty remark earned him a smack-down from his mother, who “rebuked her haughty offspring, ” saying:

Do not lie, Ialdabaoth: for the father of all, the first Anthropos (man), is above you; and so is Anthropos the son of Anthropos.

Just as his claim to be the highest god is challenged, our Demiurge creates a distraction by proposing the creation of mankind to the other Archons:

Then, as all were disturbed by the unexpected proclamation, and as they were inquiring whence the noise proceeded, in order to lead them away and attract them to himself, Ialdabaoth exclaimed: “Come, let us make man after our image. ”

The latter is a reference from Genesis 1:26. Here the Ophite creation account of Adam and Eve begins. The six other powers then conspire to create the material body for Adam. Evidently, it was Sophia who gave these “authorities ” the idea to create a man (presumably Adam) of “immense size ” so that she “might empty them of their original power ” that had once belonged to her. But their creation was unable to stand and simply “[writhed] along the ground. ” This is much like Irenaeus ’ explanation of the Simonian heretic, Saturninus ’ doctrine about Adam, described in Against Heresies (1, 24):

He was accordingly formed, yet was unable to stand erect, through the inability of the angels to convey to him that power, but wriggled [on the ground] like a worm. Then the power above taking pity upon him, since he was made after his likeness, sent forth a spark of life, which gave man an erect posture, compacted his joints, and made him live.

The six powers decided to carry this man to Ialdabaoth so that he might breathe into him the “spirit of life. ” However, this was a plot covertly engineered by Sophia so that Ialdabaoth was secretly drained of the power he originally stole from her. These Gnostics believed that man contains within him nous (intelligence) and enthymesis (thought), which are purportedly the means by which man can attain salvation. This part of the story greatly mirrors Fragment 1 of Valentinus, when it says:

Something like fear overcame the angels in the presence of that modeled form (i.e. Adam) because he uttered things that were superior to what his origins justified, owing to the agent who had invisibly deposited a seed of higher essence and who spoke freely.

Ialdabaoth became full of envy and jealousy of this man. He decided to empty him of his thought and intellect, placing it in a woman of his own thought instead, so that this new creation would be more controllable. Sophia caught wind of this plot and decided to empty the first woman out of her power. Later, Eve showed up without much of an introduction, along with the angels. They decided to copulate with her after they admired her beauty, and proceeded to have sons with her. This echoes the story of the Watchers in The First Book of Enoch and in Genesis Chapter 6. Sophia decided to send a serpent of her own to “seduce ” Adam and Eve (like the angels did with Eve earlier) into transgressing Ialdabaoth ’s prohibition of not eating from the forbidden tree. By eating this fruit, they attained knowledge “of that power which is above all, and departed from those who had created them. ” Sophia saw that Ialdabaoth ’s creations had attained knowledge above his own, and rejoiced.

However, Ialdabaoth, like Jehovah in Genesis , casted Adam and Eve out from Eden because they chose to ignore his edict and follow Sophia ’s serpent ’s advice. In Genesis 3:22, the Lord declares, clearly to other gods, that “The man has now become like one of us, knowing good and evil. ” Jehovah expresses fear, “lest he reach out his hand and take also from the tree of life and eat, and live forever. ” The Lord seems concerned that, with the wisdom they gained from the Tree of Knowledge, Adam and Eve will realize that he ’s not the only god, and also that, if they gain immortality by eating from the Tree of Life, they will become gods as well, no longer under his control.

In the Ophite account, like the mysterious angels in Eden, Ialdabaoth also desired to copulate with Eve to produce more offspring. But he failed to do so because Sophia had secretly emptied both Adam and Eve of the light that was sprinkled on them. This seems to echo the account found in The Apocryphon of John , when it states that Ialdabaoth raped Eve and produced two sons, one called Eloim and the other Yave. The text equates these two animal-faced sons (bear and cat faces, respectively) with both Cain and Abel. However, the difference in the Ophite account is that Ialdabaoth was prevented from raping Eve. The same thing happens in On the Origin of the World , when Eve, the avatar of Sophia awakens Adam from his slumber as he walks on his two feet. Then the “Authorities ” decide to spoil and defile Eve to prevent her from returning to the “light. ” However, Eve laughs at their folly, put a “mist in their eyes ” and enters into the Tree of Life, literally becoming that tree, preventing the Archons from raping her. Perhaps this is where the alchemists got the idea of portraying their “Divine Sophia ” as sitting on the “Tree of Learning, ” the allegorical source of the “Elixir of Life. ”

From the Ophite version of Genesis , we learn that Adam and Eve were drained of this divine light, they were cursed and cast down from Heaven to the Earth, along with (presumably) Sophia ’s serpent. Perhaps Irenaeus was reading from On the Origin of the World or Hypostasis of the Archons , which both practically tell the same story (but with some key differences). It seems to us that these Gnostic authors wrote their own satirical version of the Eden events as sort of a rejection of traditional Judaism while exposing the flaws of the Jewish god, promoting instead what he saw as an infinitely superior Platonic deity.

When the serpent was cast down from Heaven, he begat, as we said, six sons of his own power, based on the example of the Hebdomad (the seven heavens and the seven Archons that form this astral structure of fate). These six sons (as well as the serpent himself) eventually became the “seven mundane demons, ” that were said to oppose and resist the human race. When Adam and Eve were cast down from a presumably higher region in the cosmos, their spiritual bodies withered and darkened. They became sluggish in the world of matter, in comparison to the freedom they once had as spiritual beings. In the Sethian Apocalypse of Adam , Seth ’s father Adam tells him a very similar story: Listen to my words, my son Seth. When God had created me out of the earth, along with Eve, your mother, I went about with her in a glory which she had seen in the aeon from which we had come forth. She taught me a word of knowledge of the eternal God. And we resembled the great eternal angels, for we were higher than the god who had created us and the powers with him, whom we did not know.

The Gnostic-Hermeticist and alchemist Zosimos also made similar statements in On the Letter Omega, where he wrote:

When Light-Man (Phos) was in Paradise, expiring under the [presence of] Fate, they persuaded Him to clothe himself in the Adam they had made, the [Adam] of Fate, him of the four elements —as though [they said] being free from [her] ills and free from their activities. And He, on account of this “freedom from ills ” did not refuse; but they boasted as though He had been brought into servitude [to them].

At this point, Sophia saw Adam and Eve ’s plight, changed her mind and sprinkled the divine light upon them again, out of compassion. Anointed with this divine light, they recognized they were naked and enveloped in a material body, “and thus recognized that they bore death about with them. ” In On the Origin of the World , the earthly Adam and Eve were damned by the Archons after the expulsion from Paradise, it says, “since the rulers were envious of Adam they wanted to diminish their lifespan. ” As it turns out, the Archons weren ’t exactly successful because both Adam and Eve lived for almost 1,000 years (even according to the Gnostic texts). Immediately after this realization of their material, incomplete state, both Adam and Eve had sexual intercourse with one another and begat Cain and Abel. In this story, the Serpent actually possesses Cain, and fills him with “mundane oblivion, ” meaning ignorance. From the serpent ’s influence, Cain kills his brother Abel, introducing envy and murder into the world. In Rethinking Gnosticism , Michael Williams recounts this episode in his own way:

Livid with rage, Ialdabaoth throws Adam and Eve out of Paradise. But simply throwing them out will not change the fact of their superiority. He needs some device to increase human misery. The answer is sex. Ialdabaoth now implants the desire for intercourse in the humans. Ialdabaoth seduces Eve, begetting two mongrel powers, Cain and Abel, who are then given the responsibility of controlling the future herd of material bodies that can be expected to grow from the now libidinous couple. However, when Adam “knows ” Eve, their child is Seth, possessing like Adam the human image of God, and carrying the same spirit.

After this unfortunate incident, Sophia produces Seth, and then his sister, Norea, from whom, it is said, all of the human race (especially the “Gnostic Race, ” i.e., the so-called “Sethians ”) descend. However, it is said that the human race went astray with apostasy, idolatry, ignorance, and overall hatred of the sacred mysteries of the “superior holy Hebdomad above. ”

The Ophites had two special names assigned to the serpent that was cast down: Michael and Samael. It isn ’t all that clear which serpent is given these names since there are two serpents in the Ophite account, but one may infer this serpent belongs to Sophia, since Ialdabaoth ’s serpent had already done his job of generating all things belonging to death (corruptible or imperfect matter). The name Michael being given to the serpent is peculiar, since it is the same name given to the archangel loyal to Jehovah who battles Satan in the form of a dragon in Revelation 12:7. He also appears in The First Book of Enoch and in the War Scroll among the Dead Sea Scroll literature. But Michael appears to be nothing more than a demonic creature to the Ophites. Samael is associated with the Serpent of Genesis , and with Lilith, as we know. In The Targum Pseudo-Jonathan (Targum meaning “explanations ” or paraphrases of the Torah) the text specifically calls the serpent “Sammael ”:

And the woman beheld Sammael, the angel of death, and was afraid; yet she knew that the tree was good to eat, and that it was medicine for the enlightenment of the eyes, and a desirable tree by means of which to understand. And she took of its fruit, and did eat; and she gave to her husband with her, and he did eat. And the eyes of both were enlightened, and they knew that they were naked, divested of the purple robe in which they had been created.

Samael is often referred as the angel of death, as seen in the above quotation. St. Paul, in 1 Corinthians 15:55 (NIV), taunts the angel of death when he says, “Where, O death, is your victory? Where, O death, is your sting? ” Samael also happens to be a name for the chief Archon, Ialdabaoth, in The Apocryphon of John and Hypostasis of the Archons , which would also explain why the Targum Pseudo-Jonathan condemns the serpent as being part of the same order as the chief Archon. Later in that text, Samael is described as being a great prince or archangel in Heaven, much like Lucifer. He descended to Earth riding upon the Serpent and deceived Eve by seducing her, impregnating her with Cain. As the text reads:

And Adam knew Eve his wife, that she had conceived from Sammael, the angel (of the Lord).

Another translation reads that Eve specifically lusted after Sammael, stating:

And Adam knew Hava his wife, who had desired the Angel; and she conceived, and bore Kain; and she said, I have acquired a man, the Angel of the Lord.

This mirrors, once again, The Apocryphon of John ’s account where Ialdabaoth seduces Eve and begets Cain and Abel. In The Apocalypse of Adam, Adam tells his son Seth, “Then the God who created us, created a son from himself and Eve, your mother. ” While Cain is not explicitly mentioned here, he is more than likely the stepson Adam is referring too. Cain is also referenced in On the Origin of the World , which proclaims the following:

Her offspring is the creature that is lord. Afterwards, the authorities called it “Beast ”, so that it might lead astray their modelled creatures. The interpretation of “the beast ” is “the instructor. ” For it was found to be the wisest of all beings. Now, Eve is the first virgin, the one who without a husband bore her first offspring. It is she who served as her own midwife.

Since this text builds on the Genesis tale, naturally, it references it, including Genesis 4:1 (KJV), which says, “And Adam knew Eve his wife; and she conceived, and bare Cain, and said, I have gotten a man from the LORD. ” Also note Cain being identified here as the “Beast, ” which corresponds to Genesis 3:2, where it says that the serpent is the “wisest of all the beasts, ” and also to The Zohar ’s designation of Samael and Lilith joined together as “the Beast. ” It becomes obvious that Cain is not the son of Adam, but the son of a fallen angel, just as the cabalists believed him to be of demonic origin. The Apocryphon of John also explains that Cain was one of the astral rulers of the Hebdomad of the Zodiac, as it states, “The sixth one is Cain, whom the generations of men call the sun. ”

As we mentioned, there is a Sethian group called the “Cainites, ” who supposedly revered Cain. In Against Heresies (1.31.1), Irenaeus explains that these Cainites believed the following:

Cain derived his being from the Power above, and [the Cainites] acknowledge that Esau, Korah, the Sodomites, and all such persons, are related to themselves. On this account, they add, they have been assailed by the Creator, yet no one of them has suffered injury. For Sophia was in the habit of carrying off that which belonged to her from them to herself. They declare that Judas the traitor was thoroughly acquainted with these things, and that he alone, knowing the truth as no others did, accomplished the mystery of the betrayal; by him all things, both earthly and heavenly, were thus thrown into confusion. They produce a fictitious history of this kind, which they style the Gospel of Judas .

This “fictitious history ” that the Cainites “style the Gospel of Judas ” turned out to be a real thing, as The Gospel of Judas is one of the four tractates found in Codex Tchacos , published in 2006. This has been a topic of controversy among scholars because of Judas ’s contradictory role in the gospel. Without getting into all the complicated details of this story, we can glean some insight from Epiphanius, who wrote many hostile polemics against various Gnostic groups and teachers, including the Cainites.

In the Panarion , Epiphanius bases his account of the Cainites off of Irenaeus ’ report, but adds some more details of his own. According to him, these Cainites honored the wicked and repudiated the good. They were said to be prone to libertine practices and to indulge in “every sin, ” similar to what we see much later in Medieval Satanism, and in the work of the Marquis De Sade. Panarion 1.38.1:6-2:2 states:

And they likewise forge certain other works against “Womb. ” They call this “Womb ” the maker of this entire vault of heaven and earth and say, as Carpocrates does, that no one will be saved unless they progress through all (possible) acts. For while each of them is doing some unspeakable thing supposedly with this excuse, performing obscenities and committing every sin there is, he invokes the name of each angel —both real angels, and the ones they fictitiously call angels. And he attributes some wicked commission of every sin on earth to each of them, by offering his own action in the name of whichever angel he wishes. And whenever they do these things they say, “This or that angel, I am performing thy work. This or that authority, I am doing thy deed. ”

These ritual “obscenities ” sound very close to the descriptions that anti- Christian Roman chroniclers gave of the “agape feasts ” (meaning “love feasts ”) celebrated by the early Christians, mentioned (without the obscenities) by St. Paul in 1 Corinthians 11:20-34. Also, some Gnostic groups like the Cainites were said to celebrate an orgiastic rite involving a nocturnal Eucharistic meal akin to the Last Supper. The rite itself reminds us of the Black Masses and Witches ’ Sabbaths of yore (which we will discuss more in a later chapter).

Supposedly, the Cainites considered Cain to be of a higher power and superior to Abel. Indeed, according to Birger Pearson in Gnosticism, Judaism and Egyptian Christianity , the reason why Cain became associated with Gnostic heresy was because he defied Jehovah ’s edict to sacrifice animals to him (although Genesis does not actually show him expressly demanding an offering of any sort, but just refusing to accept Cain ’s vegetarian sacrifice whilst favoring Abel ’s blood sacrifice instead). Pearson writes:

The Cainites venerated Cain as the divine power, rejected all moral conventions, and rejected the Law along with its God. And what, asks Friedlander, is ‘Christian ’ about that? The Alexandrian school provides the most plausible link for the origin of this heresy. Indeed, the Cainite sect was already well known to Philo. Friedlander quotes in this connection On the Posterity and Exile of Cain . In this text ‘Cain ’ is a symbol of heresy, and the specifics of the heresy represented by him are such that one can only conclude that Philo is arguing against a philosophizing sect characterized not only by constructing myths contrary to the truth, but by gross antinomianism. Philo speaks against these heretics precisely as Irenaeus speaks against the Gnostics. There can be no doubt that the heretics combated by Philo are the forerunners of the Christian Gnostics later combated by the Church Fathers.

The Sethians shared in the errors of the Ophites and Cainites, teaching that the world was created by angels and not by the highest God. The dynamis from on high came down into Seth after Abel ’s death, according to the Sethians, and many held Seth to be the Messiah.

Epiphanius also mentions that the Cainites authored a book called The Ascension of Paul , as well as The Gospel of Judas , but says nothing of their content. Epiphanius is more than likely referring to The Apocalypse of Paul , found in the Nag Hammadi codices. He writes:

But again, others forge another brief work in the name of the apostle Paul, full of unspeakable abominations, which the so-called Gnostics also use, (and) which they call an Ascension of Paul —taking their cue from the apostle ’s statement that he has ascended to the third heaven and heard ineffable words, which man may not speak. And these, they say, are the ineffable words.

Apparently, these Cainites were big on St. Paul, which would explain the hostility for the twelve apostles in The Gospel of Judas as well as its very Pauline interpretation of the crucifixion. In her book The Thirteenth Apostle: What the Gospel of Judas Really Says , April DeConick states that the author of The Gospel of Judas had a Marcionite bent to him. DeConick compares the text ’s criticisms of the twelve apostles and their perpetuation of Jewish ritual sacrifice to Marcion ’s condemnation of the Christian Church. These twelve apostles could also be interpreted as corresponding to the twelve signs of the Zodiac, which The Apocryphon of John says the Archons rule over. The Cainites supposedly interpreted the Crucifixion as Christ overcoming the oppression of the body, and hence the overthrowing of the Archons, much like what Paul taught. Everything Epiphanius says conforms to what The Gospel of Judas says.

“No, he betrayed him even though he was good, in accordance with the heavenly knowledge. For the archons knew, ” they say, “that if Christ were surrendered to the cross the weaker power [the Demiurge] would be drained. And when Judas found this out, ” they say, “he eagerly did everything he could to betray him, performing a good work for our salvation. And we must commend him and give him the credit, since the salvation of the cross was effected for us through him, and for that reason the revelation of the things on high. ”

Epiphanius also writes more about the Cainite account of Jesus ’ passion and crucifixion (1.38.3:1-2):

But they too interweave the same mythology with their gift of ignorance about these same deadly poisons by advising their followers that everyone must choose the stronger power, and separate from the lesser, feeble one —that is, from the one which made heaven, the flesh and the world —and rise above it to the uttermost heights through the crucifixion of Christ. For this is why he came from above, they say, so that the stronger power might act in him by triumphing over the weaker and betraying the body.

Now, let us compare this with The Gospel of Judas , from the National Geographic translation, where Jesus says to Judas: “You will exceed all of them. For you will sacrifice the man that clothes me. ” April DeConick ’s translation of this passage is remarkably different:

Truly, I say to you Judas, those [who] offer sacrifices to Saklas < several lines missing > everything that is evil. Yet you will do worse than all of them. For the man that clothes me, you will sacrifice him.

The idea that the Cainites glorified Cain is what the heresiologists claimed, but whether or not the Cainites were even a real sect is disputable. More than likely they are an invention of the heresiologists. The mere fact that the Church Fathers accused this group of having reverence for Cain, Korah, and the Sodomites, is revealing. The arch-heretic Marcion is also accused of doing this same thing when Irenaeus says he taught that Christ saved Cain and the other sinners from Hell, while Abel and the righteous Old Testament patriarchs couldn ’t be saved. In Against Heresies (1.27.3) we read:

In addition to his blasphemy against God Himself, he advanced this also, truly speaking as with the mouth of the devil, and saying all things in direct opposition to the truth—that Cain, and those like him, and the Sodomites, and the Egyptians, and others like them, and, in fine, all the nations who walked in all sorts of abomination, were saved by the Lord, on His descending into Hades, and on their running unto

Him, and that they welcomed Him into their kingdom. But the serpent which was in Marcion declared that Abel, and Enoch, and Noah, and those other righteous men who sprang from the patriarch Abraham, with all the prophets, and those who were pleasing to God, did not partake in salvation. For since these men, he says, knew that their God was constantly tempting them, so now they suspected that He was tempting them, and did not run to Jesus, or believe His announcement: and for this reason he declared that their souls remained in Hades.

It seems probable that these so-called Cainites blended Sethian and Ophite beliefs with that of Marcionite Christianity. In the Panarion (1.42.4:2-4), Epiphanius writes against Marcion and also said some similar things about him, but added more details on his views about the Old Testament prophets:

And he says that Christ has descended from on high, from the invisible

Father who cannot be named, for the salvation of souls and the confusion of the God of the Jews, the Law, the prophets, and anything of the kind. The Lord has gone down even to Hades to save Cain, Korah, Dathan, Abiram, Esau, and all the gentiles who had not known the God of the Jews. But he has left Abel, Enoch, Noah, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Moses, David, and Solomon there because, as he says, they recognized the God of the Jews, the maker and creator, and have done what is congenial to him, and did not devote themselves to the invisible God.

While the heresiologists accused the Cainites of libertinism, The Gospel of Judas condemns licentious sex, particularly homosexuality (accusing the priests of the early Church of this sin). So the author, and most likely the sect that it was written for, was ascetic. In The Gospel of Judas , the title character has a role invested in eschatological events that will ensue after Jesus is crucified. The “thirteenth aeon ” is the realm of the Demiurge in Sethian cosmology. At one point in the text, Judas has a vision of a house where the “unshakeable generation ” dwells, and Jesus says that Judas isn't allowed to enter it or to ever be part of the unshakeable generation. Instead, he ’s said to be the earthly counterpart of the Demiurge, Sakla, who dwells in the thirteenth aeon. Although he predicts that the other apostles and future Christians will condemn Judas, Jesus also prophecies that they will mistakenly worship him by celebrating the crucifixion as a sacrifice to the Demiurge.

So even though Christians condemn him, it was predicted that Judas would secretly reign over them in the thirteenth aeon, because orthodox Christians ignorantly worship Sakla as the true god. The author of The Gospel of Judas is essentially mocking the Christian clergy as incompetent fools who believe that they are serving Jesus when they are actually serving the Demiurge. It is a polemical gospel. The Sethian-Cainite author didn ’t write it to redeem Judas as the only good apostle. He was mocking Christians for being like Judas, saying that they sacrificed Christ to the Demiurge through the Eucharist, just as Judas sacrificed Jesus to the Demiurge through the crucifixion. According to DeConick, the Sethians parodied the idea of Christ's sacrifice on the cross as a really bad joke. In the parodies, Jesus is given as a human sacrifice to the demon Ialdabaoth. Sacrifice itself was seen as an intensely negative thing by these Gnostics.

Also in this text, Jesus at one point says that the unshakeable generation is not under the influence of the stars, but later tells Judas to follow his star and crucify him. This is because Judas isn't part of the unshakeable generation (the Sethians), so he ’s doomed to the fate that has been assigned him by the Archons. However, even though Judas and the Demiurge (Sakla) want to kill Jesus, it is predicted that Jesus will actually defeat them by deceiving them into crucifying “the man who bears him, ” the counterfeit material body. Judas is basically a tool being used by Jesus to defeat the Archons, but he will never be part of the seed of Seth. He is trapped in the thirteenth aeon, and will likely be destroyed along with the rest of the Archons at the final conflagration.

The Ophites are also mentioned in another significant source outside of Irenaeus, in the Church Father Origen 's refutation of Celsus, called Contra Celsus . Celsus was an Epicurean philosopher, who published a work against Christianity called The True Doctrine . Seventy years after its publication, The True Doctrine was so widely circulated that St. Ambrosius hired Origen to refute Celsus ' relentless attacks. The True Doctrine gives us a sneak peak at the beliefs and doctrines of not only the early church but also the Ophites in particular.

The True Doctrine was written to oppose what Celsus viewed as the "false word " of Christian doctrine. Many of Celsus ' arguments as an Epicurean philosopher mirror some of the logic and arguments one may hear out of modern-day critics of the Bible and Christianity. However, the "Christians " he was directing his attacks against were not the kind one would expect. In fact, the doctrines he described throughout the True Doctrine belongs to a specific kind, and that would be, of course, the Ophite Gnostics. One may note that Celsus did not make any differentiation between the Ophite heretics and other types of Christians, considering them one and the same group. Perhaps back in the second century, such a distinction wasn 't even made yet. It was Origen who called these special Christians "Ophites " or "Orphians. " Celsus also describes the ancient Christian cult in whole as a diabolical secret society made up of sorcerers! He said:

It is by the names of certain demons, and by the use of incantations, that the Christians appear to be possessed of miraculous power. And it was by means of sorcery that Jesus was able to accomplish the wonders which he performed; and foreseeing that others would attain the same knowledge, and do the same things, making a boast of doing them by help of the power of God, he excludes such from his kingdom. If they are justly excluded, while he himself is guilty of the same practices, he is a wicked man; but if he is not guilty of wickedness in doing such things, neither are they who do the same as he.

These Ophites apparently had a diagram which mapped out their cosmology for magical ritual purposes, which Celsus described as having:

… ten circles, distinct from each other, but united by one circle, which was said to be the soul of all things, and was called “Leviathan ”: the soul which had travelled through all things! I observed, also, in the diagram, the being named “Behemoth, ” placed as it were under the lowest circle. The inventor of this diagram had inscribed this leviathan at its circumference and center, thus placing its name in two separate places. Moreover, the diagram was divided by a thick black line, and this line was called Gehenna, which is Tartarus.

Clearly, the parallels between the Ophite diagram, which Celsus said had ten circles, and the cabalistic Tree of Life, made up of ten spheres, are significant. Celsus ’ True Doctrine suggests that the form of the Tree had been imposed on the whole diagram. The Jewish scholar Gershom Scholem has suggested that the Tree of Life diagram entered Jewish esoteric teaching from Hellenistic-Egyptian traditions in the centuries before Christianity. This may also be connected to the seven-headed form of the Gnostic god Iao in the fourth sphere (as discussed in The Apocryphon of John), that of the sun. This also includes the rest of the Zodiacal powers.

Celsus described two different Ophite diagrams which depict their cosmology, similar to the account given in The Apocryphon of John . As seen above, the drawing depicted the seven cosmic spheres ruled by the Archons, each symbolizing an aspect of the Demiurge enclosed within a large outer circle called the Leviathan. In the innermost circle lay the netherworlds of evil: Hades, Tartarus, Gehenna and Behemoth. Celsus also wrote that the seven heavens are controlled by angelic powers that take on the forms of beasts, as we will see below. These are the same angelic rulers which the Christian Gnostic Saturninus of Antioch describes as the “seven angels who made the world. ”

Also from Celsus, we learn that the Ophite Demiurge had the head of a lion and was connected with Saturn as one of the “fixed stars ” or “lofty gates ” that the soul must pass through on its way to the Pleroma (the “Fullness of Being ” that is the Gnostic version of Heaven). Celsus wrote about these cosmic gateways, which the soul encounters in its astral journey, thusly:

The first gate they assign to Saturn, indicating by the “lead ” [the metal associated with Saturn] the slowness of this star; the second to Venus, comparing her to the splendor and softness of tin; the third to Jupiter, being firm and solid; the fourth to Mercury, for both Mercury and iron are fit to endure all things, and are money-making and laborious; the fifth to Mars, because, being composed of a mixture of metals, it is varied and unequal; the sixth, of silver, to the Moon; the seventh, of gold, to the Sun— thus imitating the different colors of the two latter.

The scholar Andrei Orlov, in his Divine Scapegoats: Demonic Mimesis in Early Jewish Mysticism , compared The Second Book of Enoch ’s account of the cosmic spheres, the creation of man, and the bodily correspondences with those found in The Corpus Hermeticum and Gnostic texts like The Apocryphon of John . Orlav quotes from The Second Book of Enoch 30: 4-5, where God creates and sets in motion the fixed stars, being the “great lights ” and “heavenly circles. ”

On the first uppermost circle I placed the stars, Kruno, and on the second Aphrodit, on the third Aris, on the fifth Zoues, on the sixth Ermis, on the seventh lesser the moon, and adorned it with the lesser stars. And on the lower I placed the sun for the illumination of day, and the moon and stars for the illumination of night.

Names like Kruno, Aphrodit, Aris, and Zoues are obviously corrupted versions of the Greek gods. From The Second Book of Enoch , we have Saturn, Venus, Mars, the Sun, Jupiter, Mercury and the Moon. This is actually very similar to the Ophite model as taken above, which presents them in this order: Saturn, Venus, Jupiter, Mercury, Mars, Moon, Sun. The Ophite order, reported by Origen and Celsus, begins with Saturn and ends with the Sun. While they are not exactly the same, both The Second Book of Enoch and the Ophites have similar orders, in that they both begin with Saturn. In the late Christian Gnostic text, Pistis Sophia (5.138), we have the same planetary gods named after the Olympians who rule over other lesser demons. As it says, “the first is called Kronos, the second Ares, the third Hermes, the fourth Aphrodite, the fifth Zeus. ”

We also see this type of planetary arrangement with Egyptian deities. In their view, most of the planets were themselves ruled by other gods of the pantheon. Their arrangement was: Saturn-Horus; Mars-Re; Mercury-Set; Venus- Osiris. Interestingly, Thoth was not associated with Mercury until well into the Greco-Roman era.

The illustration above is taken from E. Wallis Budge ’s 1904 book The Gods of the Egyptians.

On the subject of Celsus, what is most striking about his description of the Ophite diagram is the exact order of the “seven ruling demons, ” which he proceeds to describe (emphasis added):

The goat was shaped like a lion. Again, the second in order is a bull, the third an amphibious sort of animal, and one that hissed frightfully [generally taken to be a dragon]; moreover, the fourth had the form of an eagle; again, the fifth had the countenance of a bear. To continue the account, the sixth was described as having the face of a dog; the seventh had the countenance of an ass. Moreover, if any one would wish to become acquainted with the artifices of those sorcerers, through which they desire to lead men away by their teaching as if they possessed the knowledge of certain secret rites, but are not at all successful in so doing, let him listen to the instruction which they receive after passing through what is termed the “fence of wickedness ” —gates which are subjected to the world of ruling spirits.

The above sequence seems to be drawn from the figures of four “cherubim ” of Ezekiel ’s vision, to which three new personages were added, for a total of seven. Ezekiel ’s vision of the “Tetramorph ” (as it ’s called) was of four creatures, having the heads of a man, a bull, a lion and an eagle, each attached to one of the sides of God ’s “chariot, ” or traveling throne. St. Jerome saw them as symbolic of the Four Evangelists of the Gospels: Matthew, Mark, Luke and John. However, it is likely influenced by Sumerian stories of a creature called “Lamassu, ” depicted as either a bull or a lion with a human head and a bird ’s wings. Four images of this creature were often placed at the entrances to buildings in ancient Sumer, each facing one of the four cardinal directions. It is unknown if there is any connection here with Lamasthu, the aforementioned Akkadian name for Lilith. Lamashtu was depicted as a hybrid also, with a lion ’s head, donkey teeth, and bird talons.

This brings to mind Celsus ’ mention in the above passage of a “goat… shaped like a lion, ” which is highly reminiscent of the caprine imagery of Levi ’s Baphomet, and the leonine symbolism associated with the Gnostic Demiurge, Ialdabaoth. Also note the words of the third article of the “Thelemite Gnostic Catholic Creed ” that is recited by all the congregants in the Gnostic Mass ritual of Aleister Crowley ’s Ordo Templi Orientis (performed by their church arm, the “Ecclesia Gnostica Catholica ”):

And I believe in the Serpent and the Lion, Mystery of Mystery, in His name BAPHOMET. And I believe in one Gnostic and Catholic Church of Light, Life, Love and Liberty, the Word of whose Law is THELEMA. And I believe in the communion of Saints. And, forasmuch as meat and drink are transmuted in us daily into spiritual substance, I believe in the Miracle of the Mass. And I confess one Baptism of Wisdom whereby we accomplish the Miracle of Incarnation. And I confess my life one, individual, and eternal that was, and is, and is to come. AUMGN, AUMGN, AUMGN.

So here the lion-headed serpent, specifically distinguished as Ialdabaoth in The Apocryphon of John , is identified with Baphomet. This is interesting, considering that Ialdabaoth is condemned in Gnostic literature, while Baphomet is wholly embraced by the members of the OTO ’s “Ecclesia Gnostica Catholica ” (the “Gnostic Catholic Church ”). Considering their anti-Christian, essentially Satanic bent, it seems strange for them to be praising the imagery of the Demiurge, but there is a deeper mystery here, as we shall see in due course.

Related to this subject, Hammer-Purgstall wrote in Mysterium Baphomet Revelatum about some of the idols that he found (of “Mete ” or Baphomet, he believed) that showed the figure wearing a girdle made from what looks like the hide of a lion, including the creature ’s face, which is worn at the front, around the waist. He presumed that these represented lions that had been sacrificed, connecting this to an image he found of what looked to him like a lion being killed. He wrote:

At the third station… a lion is perceived whom a Templar slaughters, with the assistance of three dogs, of which one grabs the lion from behind. This is the triumph of Gnosis, or of the spiritual Ophitic doctrine, over the religion of the god Sabaoth, who among the Gnostics is named Jaldabaoth , and under the form of a lion or a dragon, is trampled underfoot.

Images from Hammer-Purgstall's Mysterium Baphometis Revelatum. Above: Idols of Mete wearing the pelts of sacrificed lions. Below: according to Hammer-Purgstall, a dog mounts a man from behind while he slaughters a lion.

Returning to Celsus, his description of the various world-ruling demonic Archons also brings to mind the astral “aerial toll houses ” of the Eastern Orthodox Church and The First Apocalypse of James , which goes into great detail on how to deal with these “toll-collectors ” of the seven heavens when one dies and crosses over. This same idea of travelling through the cosmic spheres of the spirit world originates in The Egyptian Book of the Dead , where it lists the dangerous “judges ” encountered during the post-mortem journey of the soul. In the Gnostic version, those who have cultivated the knowledge of the “resurrection ” within them can escape the judgment of the Demiurge. As Simone Petrement explains in A Separate God :

For the Gnostics the one who has knowledge will not be judged. This idea is often expressed in mythological form: when those who have knowledge die, they will cross the Hebdomad, the realm of the God of the Old Testament, who is the God who judges, without injury. The idea underlying this mythology could have come directly from John. It could also come from Paul, for whom the one who has faith escapes the destruction of the world, which is the judgement.

In Against Heresies (1.13.6), Irenaeus writes about how the Marcosians (the Gnostic followers of Marcus the Magician) would engage in initiation rituals meant to deliver them from the authority of the Demiurge, as well as his earthly representative authorities, by the cultivation of this special type of experiential knowledge. For the Orthodox Christians, the Demiurge, in the form of Jehovah, is worthy of worship, while the Gnostics and Valentinians repudiated this idea by saying he was simply an inferior angelic power and that there is a God above the creator. As Elaine Pagels puts it in The Gnostic Gospels :

Gnosis offers nothing less than a theological justification for refusing to obey the bishops and priests! The initiate now sees them as the “rulers and powers ” who rule on earth in the demiurge ’s name. The gnostic admits that the bishop, like the demiurge, exercises legitimate authority over most Christians—those who are uninitiated. But the bishop's demands, warnings, and threats, like those of the demiurge himself, can no longer touch the one who has been “redeemed. ”

To this, we must add some more words from Irenaeus:

For they affirm, that because of the “ Redemption ” it has come to pass that they can neither be apprehended, nor even seen by the judge. But even if he should happen to lay hold upon them, then they might simply repeat these words, while standing in his presence along with the “Redemption ”: O you, who sits beside God, and the mystical, eternal Sige, you through whom the angels (mightiness), who continually behold the face of the Father, having you as their guide and introducer, do derive their forms from above, which she in the greatness of her daring inspiring with mind on account of the goodness of the Propator, produced us as their images, having her mind then intent upon the things above, as in a dream —behold, the judge is at hand, and the crier orders me to make my defense. But do you, as being acquainted with the affairs of both, present the cause of both of us to the judge, inasmuch as it is in reality but one cause. Now, as soon as the Mother hears these words, she puts the Homeric helmet of Pluto upon them, so that they may invisibly escape the judge. And then she immediately catches them up, conducts them into the bridal chamber, and hands them over to their consorts.

John Yarker interprets Ophite astral initiations in a much similar manner in his book The Arcane Schools , where he writes:

In the “Ritual of the Dead, ” which is of incalculable antiquity, there are certain chapters which refer to secrets of Initiation, which the translators have not mastered, and which have reference to the passwords required by the Guards of the heavenly temple or Amenti, from the aspiring soul, these are illustrated in the Ophite Ritual. To some extent the doctrine corresponds with that of the Mandeans, or followers of John the Baptist. Symbols to represent purity, life, spirit, fire have to be shewn to the Guards. We may imagine such to be the cube, tau-cross, pentagon, or other symbols. The soul greets the first power saying: ‘I come from thence pure, a portion of the light of the son and father. ” To prove this, the sign must be shewn, as well to every Archon, that the soul passes.

Celsus describes in great detail on how the Ophite initiates were instructed and recited certain “password ” statements to each Archon, including Ialdabaoth:

They next imagine that he who has passed through Ialdabaoth and arrived at Iao ought thus to speak: “Thou, O second Iao, who shinest by night, who art the ruler of the secret mysteries of son and father, first prince of death, and portion of the innocent, bearing now mine own beard as symbol, I am ready to pass through thy realm, having strengthened him who is born of thee by the living word. Grace be with me; father, let it be with me.

This is very reminiscent of The Sacred Book of Hermes , which contains prayers to the decans for aid. The decans were 36 bright star constellations seen along the ecliptic. These were used as a special calendar by the Egyptians, as each decan would rise above the dawn horizon for ten days every year. Each of the decans rules over 10 degrees of the Zodiac, and so each forms a “decad. ” In most extant Egyptian and Hermetic literature the decans are described as gods. Praying to them was common from ancient times to the Renaissance, but now they are ignored by most modern astrologers. In Astrological Medicine in Gnostic

Traditions , Grant Adamson writes,

In the Sacred Book of Hermes , the decans are to be reverenced and flattered. They are not called daemons. There is even a sense that the decans are positive and the zodiac is negative. The zodiac brings about suffering, which the decans heal. In order to avoid or stop a headache, for example, brought about by Aries, the prescribed gemstone amulet had to be worn when Chenlachori, the first decan of Aries, was most visible in the sky after crossing the eastern horizon and therefore most likely to look down and see its name and especially its iconography engraved on the gem. In order to counteract zodiacal influence, the practitioner reverenced and flattered the decans by displaying the proper amulet.

This is interesting in light of what we find in The Corpus Hermeticum Chapter 13, where the stars of the Zodiac are the “tormentors ” (being identified with the Archons) which must be transcended, and the “Decad ” is what causes them to flee. Perhaps the “Decad ” here actually refers to the decans. They seem to play a part in the rebirth ritual that Hermeticists are known to have performed. According to Corpus Hermeticum II:6 the Decans are exalted above all stars, and surround the “Hebdomad ” (the seventh “aeon, ” or realm, of existence). They may perhaps fit into the “Ogdoad, ” the eighth aeon, which Sophia resides in, or between the Hebdomad and the Ogdoad. As the text states:

And further, my son, you must understand that the Decans are exempt from the things that befall the other stars. They are not checked in their course and brought to a standstill, nor hindered and made to move backwards, as the planets are; nor yet are they as are the other stars. They are free, and exalted above all things; and as careful guardians and overseers of the universe, they go round it in the space of a night and a day.

To counteract the influence of one demon, one must invoke a superior one. In many ways, the Hermetica has a lot in common with the Gnostic myths of the Nag Hammadi Library and the ones described by Church Fathers like Irenaeus. In the “Hellenistic Astrology ” entry on the “Internet Encyclopedia of Philosophy, ” it succinctly describes the Hermetic cosmology as almost identical with the Ophite view. The only difference was that, to the Hermeticists, the Demiurge was more or less a good guy created by a higher god, instead of a complete villain. As it says on the website:

In the Poimandres text, God made man in his own image, but also made a creator god (demiurge) who made seven administrators (the planets) whose government is Fate. Man, being two-fold, is both immortal, … above the celestial government, and mortal, so also a slave within the system, for he shares a bit of the nature of each of the planets. At death the soul of the individual who recognizes their immortal, intellectual, and divine self ascends, while gradually surrendering the various qualities accumulated during the descent: the body is given to dissolution; the character (ethos) is yielded to the daimon (cf. Heraclitus, Fr. 119); and through each the seven planetary zones, a portion of the incarnated self that is related to the negative astrological meaning of each planet (e.g., arrogance to the Sun, greed to Jupiter) is given back to that zone. Arriving at the eighth zone, the soul is clothed in its own power (perhaps meaning its own astral body), while it is deified (in God) in the zone above the eighth.

As we have seen, many Gnostic sects were influenced by the Ophites, most notably the Naassenes. They are named, along with the Peratae and the Sethians (or “Sithians ”), as Gnostic heretics by Hippolytus in Refutation of All Heresies. In Thrice-Great Hermes (Vol. 1), GRS Mead explains the true significance of Hippolytus ’ voluminous revelations on the secret mystery school doctrines of the pagans and their influence on the Gnostic heretics.

The missing Books II. and III. dealt respectively with the doctrines and mysteries of the Egyptians and with those of the Chaldaeans. Hippolytus (Proem.) boasts that he has divulged all their mysteries, as well as the secrets of those Christian mystics whom he stigmatises as heretics, and to whom he devotes Books V.-IX. It is a curious fact that it is precisely those Books wherein this divulging of the Mysteries was attempted, which should be missing; not only have they disappeared, but in the Epitome at the beginning of Book X. the summary of their contents is also omitted. This seems almost to point to a deliberate removal of just that information which would be of priceless value to us to-day, not only for the general history of the evolution of religious ideas, but also for filling in an important part of the background of the environment of infant Christianity.

Why, then, were these books cut out? Were the subsequent Christian Orthodox deterred by religious scruples, or were they afraid to circulate this information? Hippolytus himself seems to have had no such hesitation; he is ever delightedly boasting that he is giving away to the multitude the most sacred secrets of others; it seems to have been his special metier to cry aloud on the house-tops what had been whispered in their secret chambers. It was for him a delicious triumph over “error ” to boast, “I have your secret documents, and I am going to publish them! ”

Hippolytus seems to trip over himself trying to demonstrate that Naassene doctrines are ripped straight from the ancient mystery schools. To prove this assertion, he quotes at length various pagan hymns from a secret document of one of their schools, which he is very eager to expose. To Hippolytus, by revealing heresies that had been corrupting the Church, he thought he could weaken their movement. Accordingly, he wrote:

These doctrines, then, the Naasseni attempt to establish, calling themselves

Gnostics. But since the error is many-headed and diversified, resembling, in truth, the hydra that we read of in history; when, at one blow, we have struck off the heads of this (delusion) by means of refutation, employing the wand of truth, we shall entirely exterminate the monster.

Again, the Naassenes themselves drew inspiration from a variety of sources, including the pagan mysteries of Orpheus, Demeter and Kore, Dionysius, the Great Mother and Attis (the Phrygian fertility god), and even Egyptian deities like Isis and Osiris. To the Naassenes, Jesus Christ was just another god they venerated, belonging to the secretive Christian mystery cult. In other words, it would appear that they were polytheists. Apparently, they used The Gospel of Thomas as well as many other apocryphal books which are now lost to us.

So not only were the Naassenes acquainted with the pagan mysteries, but also, in seems, with Jewish and Christian scripture. Hippolytus says that they considered Jesus a hermaphroditic being, just like the Ophites did. They claimed that he was an embodiment of three natures (spirit, soul, and flesh), just as we commonly see in the writings of Paul and Matthew, as well as in Valentinian scripture. This reflects their main system of anthropomorphic theology where humanity is divided into three natures, being the “angelic, psychical, and earthly. ” As Hippolytus put it:

All these qualities, however —rational, and psychical, and earthly —have, (the Naassene) says, retired and descended into one man simultaneously — Jesus, who was born of Mary.

It is also pertinent to look at what Hippolytus referred to as being key to understanding their cosmological systems, which was this hymn recited at one of their secret rituals:

The world ’s producing law was Primal Mind, And next was First-born ’s outpoured Chaos; And third, the soul received its law of toil: Encircl ’d, therefore, with an acqueous form, With care o ’erpowered it succumbs to death. Now holding sway, it eyes the light, And now it weeps on misery flung; Now it mourns, now it thrills with joy; Now it wails, now it hears its doom; Now it hears its doom, now it dies, And now it leaves us, never to return. It, hapless straying, treads the maze of ills. But Jesus said, Father, behold, A strife of ills across the earth Wanders from your breath (of wrath); But bitter Chaos (man) seeks to shun, And knows not how to pass it through. On this account, O Father, send me; Bearing seals, I shall descend; Through ages whole I ’ll sweep, All mysteries I ’ll unravel, And forms of Gods I ’ll show; And secrets of the saintly path, Styled Gnosis, I ’ll impart.

The Naassenes also applied Ophite astrology in one of their sermons, while treating Osiris as a symbol for the primordial waters which gave rise to matter at creation. The seven veils of Isis are equated with the planets, who preside over the realm of generation and human existence, much like the Ophite

Archons. As it says:

These, however, are not anything else than what by her of the seven dresses and sable robe was sought and snatched away, namely, the pudendum of Osiris. And they say that Osiris is water. But the seven-robed nature, encircled and arrayed with seven mantles of ethereal texture — for so they call the planetary stars, allegorizing and denominating them ethereal robes —is as it were the changeable generation, and is exhibited as the creature transformed by the ineffable and unportrayable, and inconceivable and figureless one. And this, (the Naassene) says, is what is declared in Scripture, The just will fall seven times, and rise again. (Proverbs 24:16; Luke 17:4) For these falls, he says, are the changes of the stars, moved by Him who puts all things in motion.

Naturally, the Naassenes interpreted the Christian scriptures within a strong philosophical and Gnostic context. They had a habit of mixing pagan heroes, culture and myth with the Old and New Testament. For example, Hippolytus tells us that the Naassenes venerated Attis of the Phrygian mysteries, the god of eunuchs, vegetation and resurrection, as a symbol of the spiritual man who avoids sexual intercourse. He was also strongly associated with the “liberty cap, ” worn in the Roman Empire by slaves who had been freed. All slaves were temporarily liberated during the December festival of Saturnalia, in which the rules of society were turned upside-down. Christmas is based in part on this holiday, which is why Santa Claus wears a liberty cap. It has long been used the world over as a symbol of various revolutionary movements. According to alchemist Fulcanelli in The Mystery of the Cathedrals: Esoteric Interpretation of the Hermetic Symbols of The Great Work , this hat was connected with mystery schools of not just the Phrygians but also the cult of Mithras, and later the Freemasons. It is now part of the official seals of the US Army and the US Senate. Fulcanelli wrote:

The Phrygian cap, which was worn by the sans-culottes and acted as a sort of protective talisman in the midst of the revolutionary slaughter [in the French revolution], was a distinctive sign of the Initiates. In the analysis … the scholar Pierre Dujols writes that for the grade of the Epopt (in the Eleusinian Mysteries) the new member was asked whether he felt in himself the strength, the will and the devotion necessary for him to set his hand to the GREAT WORK. Then a red cap was put on his head, while this formula was pronounced: “Cover yourself with this cap, it is worth more than a king ’s crown. ” Few suspected that this hat, called liberia in the Mithraic rituals and which formerly denoted the freed slaves, was a masonic symbol and the supreme mark of Initiation. It is not therefore surprising to see it represented on our coins and our public monuments.

By invoking Attis as well as the universal symbol of the serpent in their writings, the Naassenes inferred a great deal of phallic symbolism in their exposition of the mysteries. Even if Attis was castrated and the penis of Osiris was unrecovered, this phallic imagery was present everywhere, and this sect of co-religionists and syncretic Gnostics co-opted every bit of it that they could get their hands on. Hippolytus wrote:

The Phrygians denominate this same also corpse —buried in the body, as it were, in a mausoleum and tomb. This, he says, is what has been declared, You are whited sepulchres, full, he says, of dead men ’s bones within, (Matthew 23:27) because there is not in you the living man. And again he exclaims, The dead shall start forth from the graves, (Matthew 27:52-53) that is, from the earthly bodies, being born again spiritual, not carnal. For this, he says, is the Resurrection that takes place through the gate of heaven, through which, he says, all those that do not enter remain dead.

These same Phrygians, however, he says, affirm again that this very (man), as a consequence of the change, (becomes) a god. For, he says, he becomes a god when, having risen from the dead, he will enter into heaven through a gate of this kind. Paul the apostle, he says, knew of this gate, partially opening it in a mystery, and stating that he was caught up by an angel, and ascended as far as the second and third heaven into paradise itself; and that he beheld sights and heard unspeakable words which it would not be possible for man to declare. (2 Corinthians 12:2.)

Notice how the Naassenes exgeticized a great deal about “gateways. ” Unlike Marcion, the Naassenes held a particular reverence for the Old Testament. They also had a tendency to allegorize such scriptures, and claimed that the Genesis creation account was representative of the human body. Simon Magus is said to do the same thing in his Apophasis Megale , otherwise known as The Great Announcement , also discussed by Hippolytus, which we will analyze in the next chapter. Eden, for them, was the brain, while the four rivers of Eden represented the senses. The human body itself was described as “a creation of clay, that they may serve the Demiurge of this creation, Ialdabaoth, a fiery God, a fourth number; for so they call the Demiurge and father of the formal world… . ”

These Naassenes also seemed to have high esteem for Hermes Trismegistus, and considered him a figure of the Logos (the “divine word ”), as well as a psychopompus (guide to the underworld). Hippolytus tells us:

For we behold, says (the Naassene), statues of Mercury, of such a figure honoured among them. Worshipping, however, Cyllenius with special distinction, they style him Logios. For Mercury is Logos, who being interpreter and fabricator of the things that have been made simultaneously, and that are being produced, and that will exist, stands honoured among them, fashioned into some such figure as is the pudendum of a man, having an impulsive power from the parts below towards those above. And that this (deity) — that is, a Mercury of this description — is, (the Naassene) says, a conjurer of the dead, and a guide of departed spirits, and an originator of souls… .

Finally, Hippolytus says that the Naassenes were dedicated worshippers of the mysterious and mystical “Great Mother. ” This might indicate that they were venerating Sophia under the guise of ancient goddesses such as Isis, Demeter, Cybele, and Rhea. He writes:

On account of these and such like reasons, these constantly attend the mysteries called those of the Great Mother, supposing especially that they behold by means of the ceremonies performed there the entire mystery.

It becomes clear to anyone who has read his entire account of the Naassenes that they may have been the world ’s first comparative mythologists. They were all about exploring the mysteries of the Bible as well as the mysteries of the pagans and the teachings of the Greek philosophers as part of a quest to discover the key to all mythologies. They seem to have believed that ultimately they were all connected, or that they expressed many common themes codified in different languages and semantics. In a lot of ways, the Naassenes anticipated the Structuralists, Jungian psychoanalysts, and early mythicists like Joseph Campbell. Even though Jungians and mythicists all stressed the universal meanings of the world ’s religions, they also denied their metaphysical claims. The Gnosis of the Naassene Gnostics is not exactly based on divine revelation, but is, as Mark J. Edwards said in his article, “The Naming of the Naassenes: Hippolytus, Refutatio V.6-10 as Hieros Logos ”:

… a studious collocation of the mysteries of a philological discipline which aims to be the master, not the servant, of philosophy; a parliament of symbols which does not proclaim a new code of belief.

Curiously, Sophia is not named in the Naassene system, but as we said, she was probably venerated under the form of another goddess figure. The Gnostics saw Sophia as secretly working through the Authorities and tricking them into serving a higher goal, as we have seen in Irenaeus ’ Ophite account. To them, Sophia was representative of a type of purity beyond polarity, just like Baphomet is. We are reminded by something GRS Mead once wrote in Did Jesus Live 100 B.C. ?

In Gnostic tradition we find the Sophia in her various aspects possessed of many names. Among them may be mentioned: the Mother or All-Mother; Mother of the Living, or Shining Mother; the Power Above; the Holy Spirit; again She of the Left-hand, as opposed to Christos, Him of the Right-hand; the Man-woman; Prouneikos or Lustful-one, the Harlot; the Matrix; Eden; Achamoth; the Virgin; Barbelo; Daughter of Light; Merciful Mother; Consort of the Masculine One; Revelant of the Perfect Mysteries; Perfect Mercy; Revelant of the Mysteries of the whole Magnitude; Hidden Mother; She who knows the Mysteries of the Elect; the Holy Dove which has given birth to Twins; Ennoea; and the Lost or Wandering Sheep, Helena and many other names.

All these terms refer to Sophia or the “Soul ” —using the term in its most general sense—in her cosmic or individual aspects, according as she is above in her perfect purity; or in the midst, as intermediary, or below as fallen into matter.

In the Gnostic text Thunder Perfect Mind , Sophia describes herself as the preeminent female divinity, full of contradictions:

… I am the first and the last.

I am the honored one and the scorned one.

I am the whore and the holy one.

I am the wife and the virgin… .

I am the mother of my father and the sister of my husband and he is my offspring.

I am the slave of him who prepared me… .

For I am the wisdom of the Greeks and the knowledge of the barbarians… .

I am the one whose image is great in Egypt, and the one who has no image among the barbarians… .

I am the one whom you have pursued, and I am the one whom you have seized.

I am the one whom you have scattered, and you have gathered me together… .

I, I am godless, and I am the one whose God is great… .

I am the one whom you have hidden from, and you appear to me.

But whenever you hide yourselves, I myself will appear.

For whenever you appear, I myself will hide from you… .

…[C]ome forward to me, you who know me, and you who know my members, and establish the great ones among the small first creatures… .

Those who are without association with me are ignorant of me, and those who are in my substance are the ones who know me.

Those who are close to me have been ignorant of me, and those who are far away from me are the ones who have known me.

On the day when I am close to you, you are far away from me, and on the day when I am far away from you, I am close to you.

I am the union and the dissolution.

I am the abiding and I am the dissolution.

I am the one below, and they come up to me… .

I, I am sinless, and the root of sin derives from me.

I am lust in (outward) appearance, and interior self-control exists within me… .

I am the knowledge of my name.

As we can see, the word “Gnosticism ” encompasses a number of complex, baffling and paradoxical concepts, but often beautifully sublime philosophical perspectives as well. Who really started the tradition, though? Surprising to some, it is frequently said by researchers on the subject that the whole thing began with a man called “John. ” That is the subject of the next chapter.

Chapter 6: The Head of Prophecy

Thus John, who was often consulted by Herod, and to whom that monarch showed great deference, and was often governed by his advice; whose doctrine prevailed very extensively among the people and the publicans, taught some creed older than Christianity. That is plain… .

—Albert Pike, Morals and Dogma

Historically, John the Baptist appears to have been an important personage, well-loved by the public in his time. He is seen as a prophet today by Christians and Muslims, as well as the Gnostic Mandaeans of Iraq (and, historically, other Gnostic groups too). Scholars have argued that he was actually a trained and functioning priest, perhaps from a family of priests. He may have even been seen by some as the true messiah. In addition to the historical figure, John is also significant as a symbol, an archetype, which shows up in folklore, occult traditions, and Freemasonic rituals. But why is this so?

According to Masonic scholar Albert Pike in his 1872 Scottish Rite catechism Morals and Dogma , the Knights Templar followed a secret and esoteric Johannite doctrine (revering John over Jesus). The Mandaeans claimed John the Baptist was the true prophet of his generation and repudiated Jesus Christ as a false pretender. In Gnostic (Ophite) Christianity, John the Baptist was part of Sophia ’s plan for salvation. Even more intriguing is that his direct disciples, Jesus Christ and Simon Magus were both said to have visited and then “come out of ” Egypt, as we will see later in this chapter.

In Christianity (as elucidated in Acts 8:35-36), water baptism is a symbolic gesture made by a new Christian who has decided to believe the Gospel. Joseph von Hammer-Purgstall thought that Gnostic groups (especially the Mandaeans and other Johannites) saw it as an act of spiritual liberation through submersion in divine wisdom. In Gnostic tradition, Sophia is the initiator of a baptismal flood of Gnosis, as we read in the Nag Hammadi text Trimorphic Protennoia :

I descended to the midst of the underworld, and I shone down upon the darkness. It is I who poured forth the water. It is I who am hidden within radiant waters. I am the one who gradually put forth the All by my Thought. It is I who am laden with the Voice. It is through me that Gnosis comes forth. I dwell in the ineffable and unknowable ones. I am perception and knowledge, uttering a Voice by means of thought. I am the real Voice. I cry out in everyone, and they recognize it (the voice), since a seed indwells them.

What 's more, Sophia was connected to John the Baptist in the Ophite system, as Irenaeus reports in Against Heresies , 1.30.11-12:

They maintain that Sophia, herself has also spoken many things through [the prophets] regarding the first Anthropos (man), and concerning that Christ who is above, thus admonishing and reminding men of the incorruptible light, the first Anthropos, and of the descent of Christ. The [other] powers being terrified by these things, and marvelling at the novelty of those things which were announced by the prophets, [Sophia] brought it about by means of Ialdabaoth (who knew not what he did), that emissions of two men took place, the one from the barren Elizabeth, and the other from the Virgin Mary . And since she herself had no rest either in heaven or on earth, she invoked her mother to assist her in her distress. Upon this, her mother, the first woman, was moved with compassion towards her daughter, on her repentance, and begged from the first man that Christ should be sent to her assistance, who, being sent forth, descended to his sister, and to the besprinkling of light. When he recognised her (that is, the Sophia below), her brother descended to her, and announced his advent through means of John, and prepared the baptism of repentance .

Through the vessel of John the Baptist, the spiritual act of repentance is introduced to mankind via Sophia ’s intercession. Recall how we mentioned the Gnostic belief that Sophia grieved and repented to her mother, the Holy Spirit, Christ and the Pleroma to rectify her error of accidentally creating Ialdabaoth when she fell into the primeval chaos of matter. John the Baptist taught that water baptism and repentance would wash away the sins of the guilty, and in a way that seems to be the sort of thing that Sophia was asking for.

The Gnostic Apocryphon of James includes this curious exchange on the subject of John ’s beheading between Jesus and his disciple James:

Then I asked him, “Lord, how shall we be able to prophesy to those who request us to prophesy to them? For there are many who ask us, and look to us to hear an oracle from us. ”

The Lord answered and said, “Do you not know that the head of prophecy was cut off with John? ”

But I said, “Lord, can it be possible to remove the head of prophecy? ”

The Lord said to me, “When you come to know what ‘head ’ means, and that prophecy issues from the head, (then) understand the meaning of ‘Its head was removed. ’ At first I spoke to you in parables, and you did not understand; now I speak to you openly, and you (still) do not perceive. Yet, it was you who served me as a parable in parables, and as that which is open in the (words) that are open. ”

For rather obvious reasons, heads have been considered symbols of wisdom, intelligence, and the mind by pretty much every culture ever. This includes the emblem of a disembodied head, and that of a skull. In fact it used to be traditional to keep a human skull in one ’s study as a paperweight and memento mori (“reminder of death ”). In the Holy Land in the time of Jesus and John, it was a common belief that the mummified heads or skulls of prophets, magicians and wonder-workers held a particular power. Egyptian, Jewish, and Arab magicians have written of the custom of using mummified heads as oracles. The talking severed head of the giant Bran in Celtic lore (believed to have magically protected London from French invasion), the singing head of poet Orpheus in Greek stories, and the prophetic skull of Adam in Judeo-Christian apocrypha are examples of mythical disembodied heads that have been linked with prophecy.

The Knights Templar, in their confessions, also claimed that their Baphomet head could “prophesy ” to them. They symbolized their love of their talking head by choosing the skull and crossbones as one of their most famous and omnipresent insignias, giving birth to an icon that would later be used by Europeans pirates on their menacing “Jolly Roger ” flags (often accompanied by the number 13 for some occult reason). According to a story associated with the Templars, the head acquired its magic through an act of necrophilia. From Freemasonry and the Ancient Gods by JMS Ward:

A great lady of Maraclea was loved by a Templar, a Lord of Sidon; but she died in her youth, and on the night of her burial, this wicked lover crept to the grave, dug up her body and violated it. Then a voice from the void bade him return in nine months time for he would find a son. He obeyed the injunction and at the appointed time opened the grave again and found a head on the leg bones of the skeleton (skull and crossbones).

The same voice bade him, “guard it well, for it would be the giver of all good things, ” and so he carried it away with him. It became his protecting genius, and he was able to defeat his enemies by merely showing them the magic head. In due course, it passed into the possession of the Order.

The authors of Holy Blood, Holy Grail (Michael Baigent, Richard Leigh and Henry Lincoln) have noted that other versions of this story they found included the young woman ’s name, “Yse, ” and that this sounds a bit like “Isis. ” Of course, it was the husband of Isis, Osiris, who was dead when she had sex with him to conceive their son Horus. However, Isis, and her counterpart, the Greek Aphrodite (or the Roman Venus), are traditionally depicted with alabaster skin, sleeping naked in a hidden tomb. It was said that anyone who would witnessed her nakedness, even accidentally, would be cursed. A skeleton could be thought of as symbolically a “naked ” and “white ” body, so perhaps the description of Venus was meant to be taken as a metaphor for this. If the Templars believed they had the skull of Isis, this would fit the lore, as she is a goddess of prophecy, wisdom, and magic, which are exactly the benefits that the Templars allegedly derived from the Baphomet head.

But whether it was John ’s head, Isis ’ head, or someone else ’s, the idea that heads could be used as oracles is deeply-rooted, particularly in the Middle East and Northern Africa. Called teraphim in Hebrew, Athanasius Kirscher depicted, in his 1652 book Oedipus Aegyptiacus , the Egyptian magical practice of making a sort of robot from a mummified head, often of the firstborn son of the magician, which could be used for divination purposes. The head would be mounted on a wall or a golden plate and would supposedly deliver prophecies when questioned. In 620 BC, they were classified as a form of idol and banned by the Hebrew prophets. They were also used, apparently, by the Sabians of Harran. Kevin van Bladel ’s The Arabic Hermes describes a festival that included “a ritual involving a decapitated boy whose head is placed on an altar where it howls; its howls were used to predict the future of the Sabian people. ” At this rite the pagan god Mara Samya, “the Blind Lord, ” was invoked, perhaps equivalent to the demon Samael, whose name means the same thing.

So, it seems, belief that a magical ceremony could make a severed head talk was widespread in the ancient Middle East. There is an interesting account of how the effect of such a thing could be created through trickery. From the 1961 classic A History of Secret Societies by “Arkon Daraul ” (a.k.a. Idries Shah, the Sufi writer), quoting The Art of Imposture , by Abdel-Rahman of Damascus, we read about how Hassan-i Sabbah, “the Old Man of the Mountains, ” founder of the Order of Assassins in eleventh-century Persia, initiated his mujahadeen recruits into his war cult:

He had a deep, narrow pit sunk into the floor of his audience-chamber. One of his disciples stood in this, in such a way that his head and neck alone were visible above the floor. Around the neck was placed a circular dish in two pieces which fitted together, with a hole in the middle. This gave the impression that there was a severed head on a metal plate standing on the floor. In order to make the scene more plausible (if that is the word) Hasan had some fresh blood poured around the head, on the plate.

Now certain recruits were brought in. “Tell them, ” commanded the chief, “what thou hast seen. ” The disciple then described the delights of Paradise. “You have seen the head of a man who died, whom you all knew. I have reanimated him to speak with his own tongue. ”

Later, the head was treacherously severed in real earnest, and stuck for some time somewhere that the faithful would see it. The effect of this conjuring trick plus murder increased the enthusiasm for martyrdom to the required degree.

A similar story is told by James Wasserman in his 2001 book The Templars and the Assassins , only he claims that it was done by Rashid Al-Din Sinan, a later Assassin chief. It seems likely that if there is any truth to the story, it was probably the standard Assassin initiation ritual throughout their existence.

Now in the case of the head of John the Baptist, it was purportedly put “on a platter, ” which we all universally imagine to be a dinner service. But wouldn ’t it make more sense that Salome, as a member of the formerly “Idumean ” or Edomite Herodian dynasty (forced to convert to Judaism in the second century), was practicing an old family tradition and requesting the sacrifice of a prophet whose head could be mummified, mounted on a plate and used as a teraph for prophecy? Hasn ’t anyone ever wondered what her mother Herodias intended to do with such a grisly prize? There is no description of what was done with the head afterwards, so it is left to our imagination, but this makes more sense to us than anything. We will discuss this possibility again later on.

If the Templars had John ’s head, what did it mean to them? Was it useful to them merely because he was a prophet? Had they discovered the belief that prophet ’s heads could be used for magic and divination? Or was there something about John in particular that was special to them? According to Pope Pius IX (reigning from 1846 to 1878), yes there was, and again, it is linked with Gnosticism. The Pope, in his “Allocution Against the Freemasons, ” charged that the Templars had tapped into the existence of a secret Johannite church. Here are some of his words on the subject, as quoted by Albert Pike in Morals and Dogma :

The Johannites ascribed to Saint John the foundation of their Secret Church, and the Grand Pontiffs of the Sect assumed the title of Christos, Anointed, or Consecrated, and claimed to have succeeded one another from Saint John by an uninterrupted succession of pontifical powers. He who, at the period of the foundation of the Order of the Temple, claimed these imaginary prerogatives, was named THEOCLET; he knew HUGUES DE PAYENS, he initiated him into the Mysteries and hopes of his pretended church, he seduced him by the notions of Sovereign Priesthood and Supreme royalty, and finally designated him as his successor.

Thus the Order of Knights of the Temple was at its very origin devoted to the cause of opposition to the tiara of Rome and the crowns of Kings, and the Apostolate of Kabalistic Gnosticism was vested in its chiefs. For Saint John himself was the Father of the Gnostics, and the current translation of his polemic against the heretical of his Sect and the pagans who denied that Christ was the Word, is throughout a misrepresentation, or misunderstanding at least, of the whole Spirit of that Evangel.

Pope Pius IX (whom we will quote at greater length in a later chapter) agrees that the Knights Templar held a secret doctrine of Johannism. Now, he was talking here about a doctrine of reverence for John the Evangelist, the alleged author of The Gospel of John , often considered to have a “Gnostic ” flavor to it, and used as scripture by several Gnostic groups. But we will show later on that some researchers think that this text was essentially inspired by John the Baptist, and that this is why it is attributed to someone named John. So while the term “Johannism ” can refer to those who place special importance on John ’s Gospel, it can also (perhaps in the same instance) refer to those who revere John the Baptist as the real Christ and the “Father of the Gnostics, ” such as the sect called the Mandaeans (whom we will discuss in detail later on). The existence of this school of thought was explored in detail in the book The Templar Revelation by Lynn Picknett and Clive Prince (1997).

In the above-quoted passage, Pope Pius IX claims that the founding Templar, Hughes de Payens was initiated into a Johannite church by a bishop named Theoclet, who allegedly carried a right of priesthood with an apostolic succession going back to John. Presumably, he meant John the Evangelist, as it seems from the context of the statement. But this claim had also been made just a few years earlier by the French cleric Bernard-Raymond Fabre-Palaprat, who in 1804 founded the Templar revival order “Ordre de Temple, ” which purported to be a direct continuation of the original. This order was dedicated, like Freemasonry also, as we shall see) to both John the Baptist and John the Evangelist.

The confessing Templars admitted to secret rituals that involved in spitting on the cross in their initiation rituals. Interestingly enough, the Church Father Origen made the same claim about the Ophites in Against Celsus (5.28) when he paraphrased and answered Celsus ’ charges against the Christians (whom Celsus did not distinguish from the Ophites, while Origen certainly does):

Now he ought to have known that those who have espoused the cause of the serpent, because he gave good advice to the first human beings, and who go far beyond the Titans and Giants of fable, and are on this account called Ophites, are so far from being Christians, that they bring accusations against Jesus to as great a degree as Celsus himself; and they do not admit anyone into their assembly until he has uttered maledictions against Jesus.

It is perhaps this point that led Hammer-Purgstall to believe that the Templars not only were secretly Johannites but also followed after the example of the Ophites as well. In Mysterium Baphometis Revelatum , he writes that the Templars ' "secret doctrine is identical with that of the Gnostics, indeed, of the Ophites. " On several of the alleged "Templar artifacts " reproduced in his book, there are depictions of an androgynous figure called, according to the inscriptions, "Mete, " which Hammer-Purgstall says is "none other than Sophia of the Ophites, who is known otherwise as Acamoth, Prunicos, Barbelo. "

Of course, being an ostensibly Christian army chartered by the Pope himself, this "secret doctrine " would have to have been carefully disguised within a veneer of orthodoxy that none but the highest initiates would ever glimpse beyond. In his Allocution , Pope Pius IX discussed the two-tiered system of exoteric beliefs and practices for public consumption combined with (perhaps completely opposite) esoteric dogma for the inner circle:

The Templars, like all other Secret Orders and Associations, had two doctrines, one concealed and reserved for the Masters, which was Johannism; the other public, which was the Roman Catholic. Thus they deceived the adversaries whom they sought to supplant. Hence Free- Masonry, vulgarly imagined to have begun with the Dionysian Architects or the German Stone-workers, adopted Saint John the Evangelist as one of its patrons, associating with him, in order not to arouse the suspicions of Rome, Saint John the Baptist, and thus covertly proclaiming itself the child of the Kabalah and Essenism together.

Note that, here, the Pope gives an explanation for the veneration of both Johns, and claims that they were both considered emblems of the same covert symbolism. There are multiple versions of the character of John the Baptist that we see in various scriptures from different sects, such as the Mandaeans with their “Yohana, ” and the Muslims with their “Yahya. ” The Catholic tradition, of course, comes strictly from the four Gospels. In tracking the Baptist ’s mythos, it makes sense to begin with John ’s gospel. It is not a synoptic (meaning it doesn ’t follow the same story structure as the other three in the New Testament, the “Synoptic Gospels ”), but it does give an idea of what John the Baptist meant to early Christianity.

In this text, John the Baptist is barely mentioned. In the first chapter, John simply appears and is a “witness ” to Jesus (1:7). In other words, John gives his testimony on what occurred. In essence, he saw Jesus (the Logos) coming to him for baptism, and at that moment, the Holy Spirit descended upon Jesus. Beyond this mention, John the Baptist is just said in the book to be the guy that came before Jesus and testified about him, recognizing what he was and proclaiming it to the public.

Luke ’s Gospel tells us in the first chapter that Mary, the mother of Jesus, and John ’s mother Elizabeth, were cousins, and they were both pregnant at the same time, specifically six months apart. Like Mary ’s conception of Jesus, Elizabeth ’s pregnancy was also miraculous, because she and her husband Zacharias were childless, elderly, and seemingly infertile. Just as Jesus ’ birth was foretold to both Mary and Joseph in separate angelic visitations, John ’s conception was foretold to Zacharias, and he, like Mary, was told what to name the child. But no actual communication between the two children is ever mentioned in any of the Gospels, and we are to assume that they never met before the baptism of Jesus, or ever again.

In The Gospel of Matthew 3:13-17 (KJV), we read that Jesus specifically came to John to be baptized, although we don ’t know if he was inspired to do this or just chose to of his own accord. But John tried to deter him, saying, “I have need to be baptized of thee, and comest thou to me? ” Jesus replied, “Let it be so now; it is proper for us to do this to fulfill all righteousness, ” implying that his baptism was somehow integral for the completion of prophecy. As soon as Jesus came up out of the water, heaven was opened, and “he saw the Spirit of God descending like a dove and alighting on him. And a voice from Heaven said, ‘This is my Son, whom I love; with him I am well pleased. ’ ”

But why did Jesus need John specifically? According to The Gospel of John , the Baptist was “not the Light ” (John 1:8), and by his own proclamation not even worthy of untying the thong of Jesus ’ sandal (1:27). Yet he is given the extraordinary honor of being mentioned in the very midst of that gospel ’s “Great Proem, ” (the introductory invocation), where it is said that John was “sent from God ” ... to bear witness to the Light, that all might believe through him. ” (1:6-7)

If all had to believe through him , he was obviously entrusted with a mission that, though subordinate to that of Jesus, had nevertheless a universal (all) and exclusive (through him) character. The contradiction between this mission and his unworthiness to even untie the thong of Jesus ’ sandal is, or so at least it seems to us, evident. Therefore we are led to ask: who was John the Baptist really?

In The Gospel of John , this very question was asked of him by the “priests and Levites from Jerusalem ” sent to him by “the Jews ” (1:19,KJV). They asked, “Who are you? ” He replied:

I am the voice of one crying in the wilderness, Make straight the way of the Lord. (1:23, KJV)

In The Gospel of Marcion (an earlier version of Luke reconstructed from quotes used by the Church Fathers in order to condemn his heresy), the testimony of John the Baptist is not mentioned directly. In the Panarion (1.42.11:3-4), Epiphanius writes against Marcion thusly:

At the very beginning he excised everything Luke had originally composed — his “inasmuch as many have taken in hand, ” and so forth, and the material about Elizabeth and the angel ’s announcement to Mary the Virgin; about John and Zacharias and the birth at Bethlehem; the genealogy and the story of the baptism. All this he cut out and turned his back on, and made this the beginning of the Gospel, “In the fifteenth year of Tiberius Caesar, ” and so on.

In both The Gospel of Mark and The Gospel of Matthew , not only is John a witness to Jesus, but also personally baptizes Jesus, at the latter ’s request. John ’s baptism and preaching ministry was already in full swing and quite popular with the public at this time. The actual doctrine that John the Baptist taught to his disciples is found in these gospels too. John is reported to have implored people to take a “baptism for repentance and remission of sins ” (Matthew 3.2; Luke 3:3).

John himself was purportedly at the center of a controversy between Jesus and the Jewish Pharisees when he was challenged by them in Jerusalem. Matthew 21:23 (NIV) reports that the priests challenged him on his authority, but

Jesus responded swiftly and shut them down:

Jesus entered the temple courts, and, while he was teaching, the chief priests and the elders of the people came to him. “By what authority are you doing these things? ” they asked. “And who gave you this authority? ”

Jesus replied, “I will also ask you one question. If you answer me, I will tell you by what authority I am doing these things. John ’s baptism—where did it come from? Was it from heaven, or of human origin? ”

They discussed it among themselves and said, “If we say, ‘From heaven, ’ he will ask, ‘Then why didn ’t you believe him? ’ But if we say, ‘Of human origin ’ —we are afraid of the people, for they all hold that John was a prophet. ”

So they answered Jesus, “We don ’t know. ”

Then he said, “Neither will I tell you by what authority I am doing these things. ”

It was clear that Jesus had won the debate. The Jerusalem priests refused to answer Jesus ’ retort because John the Baptist was popular with the people of his day. It seems as though the priests privately thought that John ’s doctrine was heretical and contrary to the Law of Moses, which they obviously upheld. Jesus likewise refused to answer their question. It appears as though Jesus was speaking more like a Gnostic teacher than a Jewish Rabbi. Jesus is speaking on behalf of a “perfect ” higher God as opposed to the jealous God of the Old Testament, redeeming his followers from the “curse of the [Mosaic] law ”

Mark 11:29, much like what we saw in Matthew 21, specifically claims that John ’s baptism of Jesus was of a heavenly, rather than human, origin. Many have pointed to the prophecy from The Book of Malachi 4:5 to be a prediction of John ’s ministry, where it says:

Behold, I will send you Elijah the prophet before the coming of the great and dreadful day of the Lord.

It is taken as though John is almost a reincarnation or an avatar of Elijah. John and Elijah are also said to have dressed the same. John reportedly wore camel ’s hair with a leather girdle, Elijah, according to 2 Kings 1:8, was “a hairy man, and girt with a girdle of leather about his loins. ” Like John after him, Elijah spent time in the wilderness (at Horeb), where he was fed by ravens. Elijah did not die, but instead ascended to Heaven in a whirlwind, in a fiery chariot drawn by fiery horses. (This is part of why Elijah is linked by comparative mythologists to another prophet and herald, Enoch, and why the Islamic Idris is linked to Elijah and Enoch both). He was expected to return one day, possibly with his spirit inspiring and essentially inhabiting the body of another prophet in the future.

A later version of Luke 1:17 claims that John prophesied in “the spirit and power of Elijah… . ” In The Gospel of John , priests and Levites ask the Baptist if he is Elijah, which he explicitly denies. In Mark , Herod ’s men theorize that maybe Jesus is Elijah returned. Jesus even seems to imply this when speaking to his own followers about John after a diplomatic visit from some of John ’s followers, in Matthew 11:13-15(NIV):

For all the Prophets and the Law prophesied until John. And if you are willing to accept it, he is the Elijah who was to come. Whoever has ears, let them hear.

Stranger still, St. Jerome said something that few people would have considered. In Against the Pelagians (3:2), he quoted from the now lost Gospel of the Hebrews , which commented on Jesus and John ’s relationship:

In the Gospel according to the Hebrews, which is written in the Chaldee and Syrian language, but in Hebrew characters, and is used by the Nazarenes to this day (I mean the Gospel according to the Apostles, or, as is generally maintained, the Gospel according to Matthew, a copy of which is in the library at Caesarea), we find, “Behold, the mother of our Lord and His brethren said to Him, John Baptist baptizes for the remission of sins; let us go and be baptized by him. But He said to them, what sin have I committed that I should go and be baptized by him? Unless, haply, the very words which I have said are only ignorance.

This passage is interesting because it calls into question if Jesus ever was a disciple of John the Baptist, as implied in the Judean Gospel of Matthew . Jerome is quoting from a Hebrew text of Matthew that actually shows a totally different picture of their relationship. It seems to us that the references to John the Baptist were added to Matthew by a proto-Gnostic writer/editor. Jerome also mentions the term “Nazarene, ” which can be found in the Gospels. The Hebrew natsar means “watch, ” “preserve, ” or “guard. ” It signifies “secret knowledge ” and “hidden things, ” which implies potent Gnostic intonations. It is often thought that the phrase translated as “Jesus of Nazareth ” refers to the town of that name, which did not exist during Jesus ’ life. The term that was meant to be applied to Jesus was “Nazarene, ” which indicates an initiate of hidden wisdom who has taken as ascetic vow.

In The Gospel of John 1:17-18 (KJV), we can see the Baptist ’s theology more plainly:

For the Law was given by Moses, but grace and truth came through Jesus Christ. No man has seen God at any time. The only-begotten Son, in the bosom of the Father, He has declared him.

The theme that Moses does not represent the true God occurs throughout this gospel. In John 17:25, Jesus says plainly, “Oh righteous Father, the world (cosmos) has not known you. ” And in John 9:29 the Pharisees are reported to have responded to Jesus ’s message: “We know that God spoke to Moses: as for this fellow, we know not where he is from. ” It seems that John and Jesus both were teaching a heretical doctrine that does not conform to traditional Judaism or Catholicism in preaching that there is another unknown god beyond Jehovah.

Returning to The Gospel of Matthew , particularly Chapter 3, we see John the Baptist preaching in the “wilderness of Judea and saying, ‘Repent, for the kingdom of heaven has come near. ’ ” John is baptizing many people coming from Jerusalem, Judea and Jordan, encouraging them to confess their sins and then washing them away in the Jordan River. However, in Matthew 3:7-12 (ESV), when John sees a number of Pharisees and Sadducees attending these baptismal rites, he immediately condemns them without a moment ’s hesitation:

You brood of vipers! Who warned you to flee from the coming wrath? Produce fruit in keeping with repentance. And do not think you can say to yourselves, “We have Abraham as our father. ” I tell you that out of these stones God can raise up children for Abraham. The ax is already at the root of the trees, and every tree that does not produce good fruit will be cut down and thrown into the fire.

I baptize you with water for repentance. But after me comes one who is more powerful than I, whose sandals I am not worthy to carry. He will baptize you with the Holy Spirit and fire . His winnowing fork is in his hand, and he will clear his threshing floor, gathering his wheat into the barn and burning up the chaff with unquenchable fire.

What John is telling the Pharisees and Sadducees is basically that they are wrong to think that they are the Lord ’s chosen people simply because they descended from Abraham. John is saying in symbolic language that the “ax ” is the means by which Christ will cut into the dead spirit, remove the heart of stone, and transmute it by the fruit of regeneration into the spirit of Christ. Also notice how the coming one is described as being a baptizer of the “Holy Spirit and fire. ” This is the same description given to the Demiurge in the first discourse of The Corpus Hermeticum . Simon Magus was particularly obsessed with the idea of the divine fire as well, as we will see. Tobias Churton suggests in The Mysteries of John the Baptist that the coming one whom John is speaking of in the above passage may not have been the messiah at all, but rather God himself, or, at least, the creator god Jehovah. This might even make John himself the messiah (or at least, the preeminent prophet of his time). This theory may also explain why Paul never quotes Jesus in his epistles (although Paul makes a few allusions to Luke ’s Gospel). Perhaps all his ideas come from another source. Of course the challenge is establishing a connection between Paul and John.

The only real evidence is that Paul ’s fellow ministers conducted baptisms, which some think is a rite that originated with John. This may have continued on through Simon Magus, one of his students, who carried on John ’s tradition after his untimely death. It appears from Matthew Chapter 3 that some proto-Gnostic Christian felt compelled to give credit to John, but at the same time to make Jesus more important than John. John is also made to appear inferior to Jesus when described as sleeping outside, wearing a camel hair loincloth, and eating bugs, which may have been inaccurate and intended to be deliberately demeaning. Luke says that John's father was a priest named Zechariah, which meant that he was from an upper-class family with access to a full education in biblical texts, and probably the Greek language as well.

Judging from the evidence, the Jesus and John movements were originally separate. Jesus was a messianic Jewish prophet, as seen in Matthew , but not necessarily the messiah, while John was a mystic rebel with a new view of theology and spirituality. Perhaps when Jesus ’ prophecies failed to pan out, Christians began to take more of their ideas from John, and remade Jesus in the image of John, the Great Gnostic Baptizer. We can also see echoes of John ’s practices in Jesus ’ teaching to the Pharisee Nicodemus in The Gospel of John 3:2-8 (NIV), where the latter asked his teacher:

“Rabbi, we know that you are a teacher who has come from God. For no one could perform the signs you are doing if God were not with him. ” Jesus replied, “Very truly I tell you, no one can see the kingdom of God unless they are born again. ” “How can someone be born when they are old? ” Nicodemus asked. “Surely they cannot enter a second time into their mother ’s womb to be born! ”

Jesus answered, “Very truly I tell you, no one can enter the kingdom of God unless they are born of water and the Spirit. Flesh gives birth to flesh, but the Spirit gives birth to spirit. You should not be surprised at my saying, ‘You must be born again. ’ The wind blows wherever it pleases. You hear its sound, but you cannot tell where it comes from or where it is going. So it is with everyone born of the Spirit. ”

The symbol of water is one with manifold meanings, one of which obviously involves cleanliness. The term “living waters ” is not just poetic, but carries a specific meaning. This pertains to the pre-Christian Jewish tradition of purification rites involving ritual baths that adhered to rigorous specifications. On a physical, exoteric level, the water literally washed away all dirt and filth from the body. On a spiritual level, the baptism meant that the psyche or soul was dead unless it maintained a constant connection with the deeper streams of universal life, the divine agape (love) of God, which Jesus described as “a well of water springing up into everlasting life ” to the Samaritan woman at the well (John 4:14).

We see influences of John ’s teaching in St. Paul when he writes in Romans 6:2-4 (NIV):

By no means! We are those who have died to sin; how can we live in it any longer? Or don ’t you know that all of us who were baptized into Christ Jesus were baptized into his death? We were therefore buried with him through baptism into death in order that, just as Christ was raised from the dead through the glory of the Father, we too may live a new life.

The Pauline writer of Hebrews claimed that the baptism is an elementary teaching, meaning that there was a deeper, esoteric Christian message, as we read here in 6:1 (ESV):

Therefore let us leave the elementary teachings about Christ and go on to maturity, not laying again the foundation of repentance from acts that lead to death, and of faith in God, instruction about baptisms, the laying on of hands, the resurrection of the dead, and eternal judgment. And God permitting, we will do so.

Ezekiel 36:25 contains a promise from God to his prophet that he will “sprinkle clean water upon you, and ye shall be clean: from all your filthiness, and from all your idols, will I cleanse you. ” Chapter 2:6 of The Gospel of John mentions the practice of “Jews ” using “waterpots of stone ” for purification rites. But the imagery of Jesus being crucified, with the water and blood flowing uncontained from his side, fits with the idea that the cleansing fluid from this vessel of flesh would purify the whole world , not just the Jews alone. In the early Church, the Christian baptism ceremony didn ’t just involve immersion in water, but also the ritual application of holy oil (olive oil mixed with balsam) to the forehead, which was typically administered in the sign of the cross. The repentant would take a bath and then apply the scented oils after he was clean. Doing so in the context of baptism reinforced the sense that the newly initiated Christian was washed, purified and sealed in Christ.

In Mark 14:3, we see Mary Magdalene, the first witness to Jesus ’ resurrection, and his close companion according in all accounts (much like Simon Magus and his consort Helena), officiating at what would have been considered a royal anointing with the pouring of a large amount of oil upon the head of Jesus. This “christening ” or “chrism ” might have been the ceremony ordaining Jesus as the successor of John the Baptist. A similar anointing rite was also used in the consecration of priests and kings, including ancient Egyptian Pharaohs. St. Ambrose explains this quite succinctly in De Sacramentis (2.7):

You were rubbed with oil like an athlete, Christ ’s athlete, as though in preparation for an earthly wrestling-match, and you agreed to take on your opponent, the Devil.

As we shall explain, the term “Christ ” may refer to one who was “christened ” (meaning “anointed ”) with oil as the legitimate successor of the Baptist, just as Simon Magus was. As much as the Church reviled the Simonians and Simon Magus himself, its tradition of “apostolic succession ” is actually based on the Simonian system, where each successive student takes on his teacher ’s role. With the Catholic Church, the idea was that Jesus appointed St. Peter to be the “rock ” upon which his church would be founded (thus Peter, who was originally named Simon also, took on his new name, meaning “rock, ” to reflect this). Tradition says that Jesus gave Peter the “keys to Heaven ” (now the official logo of the Papacy), bestowing upon him power over the spiritual destinies of men, and over the spirits in the ether. So Peter was the first Pope. Via what is called “chirothesy ” or “the laying on of hands, ” Peter was supposedly able to ordain other bishops to help grow the Church, and passed the power down to them as well. These priests in turn passed the power on to other priests that they ordained. So through apostolic succession, there is a vast web of interweaving but unbroken lines of spiritual power which have been transmitted from Jesus, through Saint Peter, down to all of the validly ordained bishops of the present day.

The Gnostic Gospel of Philip 4:8 contains a clear exegetic explanation on the oil anointing rite:

Love never says, “This is yours ” or “This is mine, ” but “All these are yours. ” Spiritual love is wine and fragrance. All those who anoint themselves with it take pleasure in it. While those who are anointed are present, those nearby also profit (from the fragrance). If those anointed with ointment withdraw from them and leave, then those not anointed, who merely stand nearby, still remain in their bad odor. The Samaritan gave nothing but wine and oil to the wounded man. It is nothing other than the ointment. It healed the wounds, for “love covers a multitude of sins. ”

The figure of Simon Magus, who led his own mystic cult immediately following the time of Jesus, was said to be John the Baptist ’s favorite disciple, and possibly even his son. According to The Clementine Homilies (2.23), which are said to originate from the Apostolic father Clement of Rome (a follower of Peter), it talks about Simon as John ’s favorite student:

But that [Simon] came to deal with the doctrines of religion happened on this wise. There was one John, a day-baptist, who was also, according to the method of combination, the forerunner of our Lord Jesus; and as the Lord had twelve apostles, bearing the number of the twelve months of the sun, so also he, John, had thirty chief men, fulfilling the monthly reckoning of the moon, in which number was a certain woman called Helena, that not even this might be without a dispensational significance… . But of these thirty, the first and the most esteemed by John was Simon… . ”

It is interesting that John supposedly had thirty disciples to symbolize the lunar cycle, while Jesus has twelve disciples, corresponding to the solar cycle along with the Zodiac, yet John is the one described as a “day-baptist. ” This may imply that there was such a thing as baptism by night as well, and considering

John ’s connection here with the moon, you might think a night baptism might be more appropriate. In the Mandaean Book of John it says “Yahya proclaims in the nights, Yohana on the Night ’s evenings. ” Yahya and Yohana are Mandaic and Arabic names for John, respectively. So maybe he wasn ’t a day-baptist after all. Even more fascinating, the Homilies actually specify elsewhere that the number of disciples in John ’s group was twenty-nine and one-half, exactly corresponding to the 29.5-day lunar cycle. This is explained as being so because the one female Helena (who is also referred to by the name of Luna, meaning “moon ”) was only equal to half a man. That ’s endearing, isn ’t it?

Helena was also the name of the consort and co-minister taken by Simon Magus, so it is may be that the Helena mentioned above was the same woman. Some have theorized that Helena may have originally been the consort of John the Baptist, and was later remarried as Simon ’s wife after John ’s death.

In 1 Apology (56), Justin Martyr wrote that Simon Magus was worshipped under the guise of the Roman-Sabine god, Semo Sancus:

There was a Samaritan, Simon, a native of the village called Gitto, who in the reign of Claudius Caesar, and in your royal city of Rome, did mighty acts of magic, by virtue of the art of the devils operating in him. He was considered a god, and as a god was honoured by you with a statue, which statue was erected on the river Tiber, between the two bridges, and bore this inscription, in the language of Rome: — Simoni Deo Sancto, To Simon the holy God.

This fact is highly significant. To be honored as a god in Rome and have a statue erected in such a prominent place required the approval of the Roman Senate. This is no small achievement for a Samaritan magician. It is often said that Simon had the ability to mesmerize the masses by performing what seemed like miracles with his apparent supernatural abilities. The Church Fathers all claimed that these wonders came by the powers of infernal “familiar spirits ” under his control. But in the Gospels, Jesus is likewise accused of being possessed of demons and in league with Beelzebub.

The later Syriac Simonians, who revered Simon and Helena as royalty, seem to have tended towards libertinism, engaged in magical practices such as incantations, love spells, and sending demons into people ’s dreams to distract them. Like the Roman Sabines with their worship of Semo Sancus, the Simonians also worshipped Simon and Helena as gods in the traditional pagan sense, associating them with other notable male/female pairs in religion and mythology (as testified by Irenaeus and Hippolytus), such as Zeus and Athena, or Shamash and Astarte. The latter two deities were also said to be worshipped in Tyre, the capital of ancient Phoenicia, where Simon supposedly found Helena working as a prostitute.

Returning to The Clementine Homilies , it appears to us that they are ultimately about Peter ’s struggle against Paul for leadership of the developing Church. This is the background of the conflict that we see in Paul ’s Epistle to the Galatians . Many notable scholars have identified Simon Magus ’ views and ministry as similar to those of Paul. In the interests of Catholicism, it is suggested, scribes replaced Paul ’s name with that of Simon Magus, deliberately encouraging the reader to conflate the two figures. This would make sense considering that much of what Simon says in his debates with Peter mirrors Marcionite and Gnostic theology. At the same time, it can be said that both Simon and Paul shared many important ideas outside of what is expressed in the Homilies. The Church Fathers themselves even seem to inadvertently equate Simon with Paul in many instances.

We also see in The Clementine Homilies that Simon eventually succeeded John the Baptist in the leadership of John ’s ministry. Thus it is implied in this source that Peter ’s struggle against Simon was actually a struggle against the movement founded by the murdered Baptist. This would clearly give him equal footing with Peter in their debates. John is referred to as the forerunner of Jesus, but it says that Simon is his own forerunner. So perhaps the idea being promoted here is that the student is less legitimate than his teacher (Jesus is less than John), and maybe even a deceiver or con-artist. As it states:

He being absent in Egypt for the practice of magic, and John being killed , Dositheus desiring the leadership, falsely gave out that Simon was dead, and succeeded to the seat. But Simon, returning not long after, and strenuously holding by the place as his own, when he met with Dositheus did not demand the place, knowing that a man who has attained power beyond his expectations cannot be removed from it.

Wherefore with pretended friendship he gives himself for a while to the second place, under Dositheus. But taking his place after a few days among the thirty fellow-disciples, he began to malign Dositheus as not delivering the instructions correctly. And this he said that he did, not through unwillingness to deliver them correctly, but through ignorance.

And on one occasion, Dositheus, perceiving that this artful accusation of Simon was dissipating the opinion of him with respect to many, so that they did not think that he was the Standing One, came in a rage to the usual place of meeting, and finding Simon, struck him with a staff. But it seemed to pass through the body of Simon as if he had been smoke. Thereupon Dositheus, being confounded, said to him, ‘If you are the Standing One, I also will worship you. ’ Then Simon said that he was; and Dositheus, knowing that he himself was not the Standing One, fell down and worshipped; and associating himself with the twenty-nine chiefs, he raised Simon to his own place of repute; and thus, not many days after, Dositheus himself, while he (Simon) stood, fell down and died.

Hippolytus, Eusebius, and the author(s) of the Clementine writings all described Simon as a baptist and as a favored disciple of John the Baptist. This text is telling us that although Simon should have been the immediate successor to John, the Samaritan Dositheus took that honor upon himself, as Simon was in Egypt at the time of the John ’s martyrdom. When Simon returned, the two men quarreled. Simon ’s superiority was proved miraculously after a magical duel, just like how Simon and the apostle Peter purportedly battled it out in front of Nero according to the apocryphal Acts of Peter and Paul , this time with Simon being the winner). Defeated, Dositheus ceded his position as head of the sect to Simon and formed his own group. According to The Clementine Homilies , it was Dositheus who got John ’s instructions incorrect, and Simon proved his superiority by overcoming him. This legend may contain grains of truth, as we know from patristic sources that baptizing sects of the Simonian school continued for some time.

The Orthodox polemicist and historian Eusebius, in his Ecclesiastical History (IV.7), names the offshoots of the Simonian tradition: Simon ’s immediate successor was the Samaritan Menander, then Saturninus in Antioch, and Basilides in Alexandria. He quotes from Irenaeus, whose account of the Gnostics is somewhat accurate (although still heavily biased and hostile), in Ecclesiastical History (IV: 11.2):

A certain Cerdon, who had taken his system from the followers of Simon, and had come to Rome under Hyginus, the ninth in the episcopal succession from the apostles, taught that the God proclaimed by the law and prophets was not the father of our Lord Jesus Christ. For the former was known, but the latter unknown; and the former was just, but the latter good. Marcion of Pontus succeeded Cerdon and developed his doctrine, uttering shameless blasphemies.

So this mysterious Cerdon is the one who inspired Marcion ’s doctrines which relate directly from Simon. Marcion is known to have been radical Paulinist, so the connection between Simon and Paul is even more apparent. Contemporary with Cerdon and Valentinus was Marcus the Magician, whose sacramental mysteries are described in a slanderous manner by Irenaeus in Against Heresies . Purportedly, Marcus taught that the wine of the Eucharist symbolized Sophia ’s blood instead of Jesus ’. In what appears to have been a hieros gamos rite (a sacred marriage), “cups were mixed with wine. ” As the cup of wine was offered, the priest prayed that “Grace may flow ” into all who would drink of it. (Against Heresies, 1.13.2) Eusebius gave a slightly more moderate account of Marcus ’ Eucharist:

For some of them prepare a nuptial couch and perform a mystic rite with certain forms of expression addressed to those who are being initiated, and they say that it is a spiritual marriage which is celebrated by them, after the likeness of the marriages above. But others lead them to water, and while they baptize them they repeat the following words: Into the name of the unknown father of the universe, into truth, the mother of all things, into the one that descended upon Jesus. Others repeat Hebrew names in order the better to confound those who are being initiated. (IV. 11.5)

The words “who descended upon Jesus ” recall the Judeo-Christian belief that Jesus, as messiah and Son of God, had been foreshadowed by other “true prophets ” like John and Elijah. Simon Magus also looked upon himself as an embodiment of, or as possessed by, the divine “Father. ” This is why he called himself “the Standing (i.e. ‘living ’, ‘persisting ’) One ” —the One “having stood, standing, and will be standing. ” This “Standing One ” title was a position of eternal power, authority, and divinity (hence Simon is called the “Great Power ” in Acts 8:9). Also note that in Greek, “great ” is translated as megas which is a pun used in the epithet “magus ” (magician), especially more so in Simon ’s case.

In Paul ’s epistles, he repeatedly implies that he is the Standing One, such as in Romans 14:4 (YLT), where it says: “[T]o his own master he doth stand or fall; and he shall be made to stand , for God is able to make him stand. ” Then in Colossians 4:12 he tells how one of his followers is praying for another “... that you may stand perfect and made full in all the will of God. ” It seems that for Paul, “to stand ” meant that one had full possession of the state of Grace.

As seen in Matthew and John , the dove that descends upon Jesus at his baptism is the Holy Spirit personified, although to ancient societies the dove usually symbolized the great mother goddess. According to Wolfram von Eschenbach (author of the Grail story Parzival), the dove symbol was absorbed by the Knights Templar during their sojourn in Asia Minor, after which they chose to adorn themselves with turtle doves, taking on the name “Knights of the Dove ” as well. The dove is taken by Christians to represent the Holy Spirit, which according to Gnostic Ophites, was either Sophia ’s mother, or Sophia herself. Using birds to symbolize divine wisdom is nothing new. In Egyptian iconography, the god of writing and magic, Thoth, was often depicted as having a head of an ibis bird.

The cleansing of the Christian baptism has been frequently compared with how the flood of Noah cleansed the Earth of its bad actors. We find this comparison even in scripture. 1 Peter 19-21 (NIV) tells us:

After being made alive, he [the resurrected Jesus] went and made proclamation to the imprisoned spirits —to those who were disobedient long ago when God waited patiently in the days of Noah while the ark was being built. In it only a few people, eight in all, were saved through water, and this water symbolizes baptism that now saves you also —not the removal of dirt from the body but the pledge of a clear conscience toward God.

Religious philosopher Mircea Eliade explained in his classic work The Sacred and the Profane why baptism in implicitly connected to the Flood, and to the idea of being born again, because of the universal meaning of water symbolism:

The waters symbolize the universal sum of virtualities; they are fons et Origo , “spring and origin, ” the reservoir of all the possibilities of existence; they precede every form and support every creation... . On the other hand, immersion in water signifies regression to the preformal, reincorporation into the undifferentiated mode of pre-existence. Emersion repeats the cosmogonic act of formal manifestation; immersion is equivalent to a dissolution of forms. This is why the symbolism of the waters implies both death and rebirth. Contact with water always brings a regeneration —on the one hand because dissolution is followed by a new birth, on the other because immersion fertilizes and multiplies the potential of life. The aquatic cosmology has its counterpart—on the human level—in the hylogenies, the beliefs according to which mankind was born of the waters. The Flood, or the periodical submersion of the continents (myths of the Atlantis type) have their counterpart, on the human level, in ... initiatory death through baptism... . From the point of view of structure, the flood is comparable to baptism... .

On his Atlan.org website, Arysio Santos connects the “chrism ” anointing and the baptism with the conflagration and the Atlantean cataclysm:

Fire and Water (Baptism and Chrism) were administered together in the primitive Church, and only later became separated. As in the ordeal of Atlantis, which was attended by both cataclysms, the association of Chrism and Baptism implies the same thing. So, granted that Baptism symbolizes the Flood, it is clear that Chrism allegorizes the fiery cataclysm that the Stoics called Ekpyrosis (or Universal Conflagration)... .

... The two Baptisms correspond to the Flood and the Conflagration of Paradise, and to the two gods that brought them about, Indra and Agni in India, and Christ and John in Christianity or Elohim and Jahveh in Judaism.

This connection between rebirth through baptism and the birth of creation from the pre-creation “waters ” in Genesis did not escape the notice of the Church Fathers. Tertullian wrote in On Baptism (4):

Before all the furnishing of the world, [was] quiescent with God in a yet unshapen state … . Water was the first to produce that which had life, that it might be no wonder in baptism if waters knew how to give life… . All waters, therefore, in virtue of the pristine privilege of their origin, do, after invocation of God, attain the sacramental power of sanctification; for the Spirit immediately supervenes from the heavens, and rests over the waters, sanctifying them from Himself; and being thus sanctified, they imbibe at the same time the power of sanctifying… .

On the subject of baptismal dissolution and rebirth of the spirit, The Excerpts of Theodotus (1:1), as preserved by Clement of Alexandria in a collection of notes, tell us that the Savior descended “clothed with the Pneumatic Seed. ” For the Valentinians, this descent is symbolized by Jesus ’ baptism. Excerpts of Theodotus 36 explains:

Our Angels were emanated in the Unity, for they are one, since they were issued from the One. But since we were in a condition of division, then Jesus was baptized dividing the Undivided, until He unites us with the Angels, in the Pleroma, so that we all, the multitude, having become one shall be reunited with the One that was divided for us.

Together with Jesus, the angels, who are nothing else that the Son ’s limbs in this text, are baptized, and it is told why this is necessary (Excerpts of Theodotus 22):

The Angels, of whom we are parts, are baptized … for the dead, for we are dead, we whom the existence here has put in a condition of Death… . They were baptized in the beginning … in the Redemption of the Name descended upon Jesus under the form of a dove… . Even Jesus needed Redemption, in order not to be detained by the Thought of the Lack in which He had been put… .

It should also be noted that one is not necessarily “reborn ” from the baptismal waters in exactly the same form as one ’s initial birth. There are many allusions in sacred writing comparing it to being “dyed ” like a colored egg at Easter. One takes on the coloring of whatever one is immersed into, and changed forever. In the apocryphal Gospel of Philip we are told:

God is a dyer. As the good dyes, which are called “true, ” dissolve with the things dyed in them, so it is with those whom God has dyed. Since his dyes are immortal, they become immortal by means of his colors. Now God dips what he dips in water.

Another word for this is “tincturing. ” The connection between tincturing and baptism was implied when Friedrich Nicholai wrote about the Baphomet of the Templars. Peter Partner, in The Murdered Magicians , tells us that “Nicholai maintained that Baphomet was a composite of two Greek words meaning “colour ” (or by extension ‘baptism ’) and ‘spirit. ’ ” This describes the Baptism of the Holy Spirit that John the Baptist talked about as a tincturing process. This corroborates the “Baptism of Wisdom ” interpretation of the name of Baphomet as well, since the Holy Spirit and Wisdom (Sophia) are considered to be identical or connected concepts in Christianity as well as in other mystical traditions.

The Mandaeans, whose baptism rite is called “Seboghatullah ”

(“Immersion in the Divine Mystery, ” quite similar to the term “Baptism of Wisdom ”), also compare it to being dipped in dye. Historically, there are two colors of dye that have been considered next to sacred because of their association with royalty. Tyrian purple, made from the excretions of sea snails, was extremely expensive and highly prized. In Acts 16:14, Paul converts and baptizes a very wealthy woman named Lydia who is described as a “seller of purple, ” referring to this dye. The dye made those who touched it in its unprocessed state reek of rotting fish. (Because of this, the Jewish Talmud grants the right of divorce to women whose husbands take up the dying trade after marriage.)

After the Crusades, the use of the purple dye for royalty was supplanted in Europe with that of the scarlet-colored kermes vermilio (crimson), made from the mashed bodies of a certain species of locust that lived in the Kerm Oak in the Mediterranean. It was also made into a red liqueur called “alchermes ” that was popular as an aphrodisiac until the twentieth century, when knowledge of its origin with bugs became widespread. According to Robert Graves, Jesus was actually clothed in a scarlet robe of kermes when he was crowned with thorns by soldiers in Matthew 27:27-30. Usually this incident is interpreted as a humiliating mockery, but some, like Graves, have suggested that the symbolism in the details all corresponds to the actual anointing of a king. Graves writes in The White Goddess :

St. John the Baptist, who lost his head on St. John ’s Day, took over the oak- king ’s titles and customs, it was natural to let Jesus, as John ’s merciful successor, take over the holly king ’s… . The scarlet-oak, or kerm-oak, or holly-oak, is the evergreen twin of the ordinary oak and its Classical Greek names prinos and hysge are also used for holly in modern Greek. It has prickly leaves and nourishes the kerm, a scarlet insect not unlike the holly- berry (and once thought to be a berry), from which the ancients made their royal scarlet dye and an aphrodisiac elixir… . Jesus wore kerm-scarlet when attired as King of the Jews.

In addition to the obvious connection between a dye made from locusts and John the Baptist, who lived on locusts for food, the word “kermes ” also brings to mind Hermes. According to alchemist Fulcanelli, kermes is in fact a symbol for the prima materia (original matter), which contains the alchemical gold in potentia . In Mysteries of the Cathedrals , he writes cryptically:

The oak … gives the kirmis (Fr. Kermes), which, in the Gay Science, has the same significance as Hermes, the initial consonants being interchangeable. The two terms have an identical meaning, namely Mercury. At any rate … kirmis (Arab girmiz that which dyes scarlet) characterizes the prepared substance… .

… Open, that is to say, decompose, this matter. Try to separate the pure part of it, or its metallic soul as the sacred expression has it, and you will have the kirmis, the Hermes, the mercury dye which has within it the mystic gold, just as St. Christopher carries Jesus and the Fleece is hung on the oak, like the … kirmis, and you will be able to say, without violating the truth, that the old hermetic oak acts as mother to the secret mercury.

After John ’s death, his Gnostic baptism cult continued on not only with the Pauline Christians, but also with the Simonians. According to the Church Fathers, Simon Magus considered himself an embodiment of the Logos (the divine word) or the Nous (the universal mind). This, in his system, was the essential male principle in charge of managing the all. The Epinoia , which he presented his consort Helena as an incarnation of, was the female principle producing all things, including the world creating angels which are the same as the “principalities ” and “authorities ” of Paul (or the “Archons ” of the Gnostics). Together they formed a syzygia or “divine union. ” The Epinoia was the lost sheep that the Nous had to descend to Earth to save, since the jealous angels imprisoned her in the world where she was subject to various reincarnations, the most famous being Helen of Troy. Fittingly, Simon found Helena as a poor slave girl working in a brothel in Tyre, as mentioned earlier. He was able to rescue her from bondage and enjoy her for himself.

In Gnostic Mysteries of Sex: Sophia the Wild One and Erotic Christianity , Tobias Churton writes that the relationship between Simon Magus and Helena was remarkably different from that found in encratic forms of Christianity and Gnosticism, and even Jesus and Mary Magdalene's relationship, for that matter:

In the Gospel of the Egyptians , thanatos (death) is the consequence of eros (sexual love). In Encratism, the redeemed must trample on the “garment of shame ” (the body); there can be no more male or female: sexual identity is no identity. No more children; no more death. Cease lusting; cease suffering. Desire creates illusion (the world). How different is the Simonian tradition of venerating the images of the Lord (Simon) and the Lady (Helena) equally, from line 114 of the Gnostic Gospel of Thomas , where to enter the kingdom of heaven the female must become male! When Simon redeems his lost First Thought, he does not reject her femininity.

Certainly, many authors have connected Mary Magdalene with the Gnostic Sophia, since some sects viewed the latter as Christ ’s consort also. This fits with the symbolism of the Magdalene, who was originally portrayed by the Church as a prostitute, just as Sophia was.

According to Hippolytus, Simon allegedly encouraged his followers to indulge in promiscuous intercourse because “all earth is earth, and it makes no difference where any one sows, provided he sow. ” This is called “perfect agape [love], ” the “holy of holies ” and “sanctifying one another. ” Similarly, according to Joseph von Hammer-Purgstall, the Ophites practiced obscene sex rites involving children and animals that they allegedly called Zoogogon sophian (“genital wisdom ”), which he found represented in numerous artifacts on former Templar properties.

As we mentioned previously, it is said that John was killed while Simon was in Egypt, presumably in Alexandria, where he may have been undergoing initiation rituals to learn Pharaonic Egyptian-styled magic and esoteric doctrines. Similarly, in Matthew 2:13-18 we find that Jesus was in Egypt after his birth with his family, who were supposedly trying to avoid the alleged slaughter of first-born boys by King Herod the Great. They reportedly returned to Israel after the king ’s death. However, there is no historical record of Herod actually slaughtering masses of boys. Josephus reported that Herod planned to fill up the Hippodrome with infants and then slaughter them, but died before he carried it out.

In Josephus ’ records, John was killed in 26/27 AD or 33 AD depending on what, “About this time ” means following the words “in the twentieth year of the reign of Tiberius. ” In Antiquities of the Jews (18.5.2 and 18.3.3) we read:

Now, some of the Jews thought that the destruction of Herod ’s army came from God, and that very justly, as a punishment of what he did against John, that was called the Baptist ; for Herod slew him, who was a good man, and commanded the Jews to exercise virtue, both as to righteousness towards one another, and piety towards God… .

Now, when others came in crowds about him, for they were greatly moved by hearing his words, Herod, who feared lest the great influence John had over the people might put it into his power and inclination to raise a rebellion, thought it best, by putting him to death, to prevent any mischief he might cause, and not bring himself into difficulties, by sparing a man who might make him repent of it when it should be too late. Accordingly he was sent a prisoner, out of Herod ’s suspicious temper, to Macherus, the castle … and was there put to death. Now the Jews had an opinion that the destruction of this army was sent as a punishment upon Herod, and a mark of God ’s displeasure against him.

The “army ” destroyed here was that of Herod Antipas, son of and successor to Herod the Great, who was ordered to launch an invasion against King Aretas of Nabatea (part of the empire) by Roman Emperor Tiberias. The Emperor, who asked nothing less than for Herod to bring him the king ’s head! Incidentally, As Churton reports in The Mysteries of John the Baptist , “Dead Sea Scrolls scholar Robert Eisenman has proposed that perhaps the whole story of John ’s beheading is a garbled version of what really happened to King Aretas.

These events were all tied into the reason why John was executed in the first place. King Aretas ’ daughter was Phasaelis, the wife that King Herod Antipas divorced so that he could marry Herodias, the mother of Salome and the one who asked Herod for John the Baptist ’s head. Churton suggests that due to his status in the priesthood and popularity as a prophet, John may have been:

… a habitual frequenter of Herod Antipas ’s court … a friend perhaps of Queen Phasaelis… . If Phasaelis knew John, it may have been she who informed him about the divorce plans, specifically to generate a political and legal defense of her position.

The woman that Herod Antipas was dumping Phasaelis for was Herodias, the wife of his brother, Herod II, called “Philip ” in the Gospels, whom he took from his brother upon meeting her. It was John ’s public objection to the new marriage that made Herod and Herodias angry. Initially Herod just imprisoned John in his castle at Macherus, which Churton has speculated was an “all-mod- cons ” palace, where John “was probably under ‘house arrest ’ in a gilded cage: a precautionary, politically sensitive measure… . ” It was at this castle on the shore of the Dead Sea that Phasaelis stationed herself before running off to her father ’s domain in Petra (now in modern Jordan). Her father, Aretas IV, King of Nabatea, was part of the same family tree as the Herodians, and was obviously named after the same root word as Herod. War ensued between Aretas and Herod. But Herod ’s army was routed, and it was rumored that this was God ’s punishment for his beheading of John. Churton speculates further:

John might conceivably have been party to Phaeaelis ’s “escape ” from Macherus. He might have been at the palace when he was arrested. His execution then could conceivably have been connected to Macherus ’s proximity to Nabatea.

If there was a chance of Aretas getting hold of John as a political and religious mascot, such a fear might have necessitated the execution that Herod must have known was politically very risky on the home front… .

So there may be more to the weird, kinky and twisted story other than what the Gospels tell us: that Herodias hated John so much, she asked for his head on a “charger, ” via her daughter, Salome, the only one in this family not named “Herod ” or some derivative thereof, who was doing a sexy dance at her new stepfather ’s birthday party when she asked for it. One wonders what Herodias wanted with the head. We have suggested that she might have wanted to make it into a teraph for divination purposes. This seems more likely when we consider that Herodias is, in modern times, considered by some practitioners of witchcraft to be an incarnation of Lilith, and identical to the goddess Diana.

This was first mentioned in the 1899 book Aradia , or the Gospel of the Witches by American folklorist Charles Godfrey Leland. He claimed that it was based on a religious text used by witches in Tuscany, Italy. It said that Herodias had been condemned by God, because of her role in John ’s death, to wander the skies forever more, only being allowed to rest in treetops at night. Her name was purportedly compounded with that of Diana (rendering “Herodiana, ” and then, eventually, “Aradia ”), and she supposedly traveled at night with the same female nymph spirits recorded in Greek mythology as being part of Diana ’s entourage.

She is said in the book to be the daughter of Diana and the Sun, there said to be Lucifer. It asserts that she is a lunar goddess (and that, interestingly, Cain is currently imprisoned inside of the moon). According to the Aradian gospel, she is seen as a leader and teacher, supposedly, to the witches of that area.

This would match up with what Mircea Eliade wrote, stating that at Arada, along with Irodiada, was a name used for what Romanians called their “Queen of the Fairies, ” and that she was a “metamorphosis of Diana. ” Witchcraft writers Nigel Jackson and Michael Howard, in the book The Pillars of Tubal Cain , claim that Herodias immigrated to France sometime after the biblical events, just as Mary Magdalene, Jesus ’ beloved female disciple, purportedly did. If she was already a witch before, it makes sense that she would become a patroness of witches after she went to Europe.

So is Herodias likely to have been a witch? One of the most ignored details is that the Herodians were actually an Idumean Arab family (what the Bible calls “Edomites, ” from south of Judah) that had intermarried in with the Israelites, being forced to convert to Judaism and incorporated into the Jewish nation during the Maccabean revolt (in the second century BC). The Edomites were descendants of Jacob ’s older brother Esau, whom Jacob disinherited through trickery. Jacob went on to change his name to “Israel ” and to father the twelve tribes of that nation, who were thereafter always at war or having skirmishes with the Edomites.

The whole bloodline and nation of Edom came to be associated by the Israelites with the Devil, because if they were Israel ’s enemies, that meant they were God ’s enemies (although, according to Robert Graves in King Jesus , they were also “renowned for their wisdom ”). Recall that, according to cabalistic texts, they were literally descendants of Lilith via Mahalath, one of her human incarnations, who married Esau, the progenitor of the Edomite line. They were associated with “Mount Seir ” and the “Wilderness of Seir, ” which, as we have mentioned previously, is also connected to Lilith and Azazel. The word seir itself means “hairy, ” “he-goat ” or “satyr. ” As to their pre-Judean religion, nobody is certain of much except that they worshipped a god named “Qaus. ” Also, as Arabs, the Idumeans were, like Mohammed himself, descendants of Ishmael, another disinherited older brother who is demonized in the Torah of the Jews.

This brings us to the story of Zechariah, the father of John the Baptist, and the vision he had of the archangel Gabriel while he was serving as priest, burning incense at the altar of the temple. The story is told in Luke 1:11-17 (NIV):

Then an angel of the Lord appeared to him, standing at the right side of the altar of incense. When Zechariah saw him, he was startled and was gripped with fear. But the angel said to him: “Do not be afraid, Zechariah; your prayer has been heard. Your wife Elizabeth will bear you a son, and you are to give him the name John. He will be a joy and delight to you, and many will rejoice because of his birth, for he will be great in the sight of the Lord. He is never to take wine or other fermented drink, and he will be filled with the Holy Spirit even from birth. Many of the people of Israel will he bring back to the Lord their God. And he will go on before the Lord, in the spirit and power of Elijah, to turn the hearts of the fathers to their children and the disobedient to the wisdom of the righteous —to make ready a people prepared for the Lord.

Zechariah is taken aback by this vision, and the prediction made by the angel. He questions how he could have a child when he and his wife are both so old. Because of his lack of faith, Gabriel curses Zechariah with dumbness until the day of his son ’s birth. When he comes out of the temple, the other priests can tell that he has had some kind of encounter because of the way he is acting. But because he cannot verbalize it, they are not sure what it was.

In King Jesus (a novel), Robert Graves presented his own interpretation of the messianic legend based upon his decades of research into comparative mythology. There is a scene where he embellishes this story with some surprising details. In his version, the vision that Zechariah has (called there “Zecharias ”) is not of the archangel Gabriel, but a donkey-headed entity. As he described it to a tribunal of priests who are trying him for witchcraft:

“I saw a power clothed in robes of light that resembled the same sacred robes which you yourself wear at the grand festivals. And this Power hugged to its breast a triple-headed golden dog and a golden sceptre in the form of a budding palm branch; and, as the Lord our God lives, this Power stood in a gap between the Curtain and the wall on the right hand; and this Power was of more than human stature; and this Power spoke in the same still, small voice that I had heard before, saying: ‘Be not afraid, Zacharias! Go out now and tell my people truthfully what you have both heard and seen! ’ But I could not, for I was struck dumb… .

“… I saw the face of the Power, and the face shone, though not unmercifully bright, and the likeness of the face ” —his voice rose to a scream — “and the likeness of the face was that of a Wild Ass! ”

Earlier in the book it had been revealed that a ritual mask in the likeness of the head of a wild ass had been stolen from the Edomites many years earlier and was in the possession of the priests of the Jewish temple. In the Graves novel, Zecharias is put on trial for sorcery —as it was thought that no one could see the voice of God and live. Since Zecharias admitted having a vision in the temple, it meant in the eyes of the Sanhedrin that he had conjured a demon there, polluting the sanctuary. His testimony was itself also labeled as blasphemy, as the judges felt he was implying that the priests of Israel had been worshipping an ass-headed deity all along. This is very interesting. We are not sure what made Graves decide to include this detail in his story, but the guy was a walking encyclopedia of mythology, so we are sure he had a basis for it. Perhaps it had something to do with the fact that, as Morton Smith tells us in Jesus the Magician :

There was a long standing legend that the god of the Jews was a donkey, or donkey-headed. The legend probably arose from the fact that the donkey was the sacred animal of Seth, the villain in the Egyptian pantheon, who was commonly thought by the Egyptians to be the god of foreigners. He was also, being a villain, given a large role in magic, and often appears as a donkey-headed figure on magical gems. The Jews were among the largest groups of foreigners in Egypt, so their god, lao, was identified with Seth. lo or Eio in Coptic means “donkey, ” so the identification was almost predetermined.

In the back notes, Smith adds that Epiphanius, in his Panarion (26.10.6), claimed that the Gnostic Demiurge Sabaoth “has the form of an ass. ” Apparently not only was the Jewish god thought by some to be a donkey, but his son was as well. This is confirmed in the text On the Origin of the World , when Sabaoth is depicted as the repentant son of Ialdabaoth who is also called the “Lord of Forces ” and is redeemed by Sophia.

As proof of the connection between the donkey and Jesus, Smith submits a piece of graffiti art found in Rome, dated to about 200 AD, that was, at the time of Smith ’s writing (1978) thought to be one of the earliest depictions of the crucifixion. But it showed, instead of a man wearing a crown of thorns, a man with the head of an ass. (Another version of this, or at least what sounds like a remarkably similar picture, is cited by Carl Jung in his book Aion as having been found in Denderah, Egypt, but he claimed that it showed Seth with an ass head tied to a “slave post, ” and his nephew Horus —who, in mythology, killed Seth — standing before him with a knife in his hand.) Yet another graffiti drawing, found in Carthage and also dated to the beginning of the third century, showed a donkey wearing a toga, along with the words “The god of the Christians (is) a donkey who beds (with his worshipers). ” Smith points out that it was common at the time to think of demonic possession as involving the person having “sex ” with the inhabiting spirit, which would often take the form of an animal when manifesting visibly, so thus the possession was symbolized as bestiality.

So did the angel Gabriel really take the form of an ass that night with Zechariah in the Temple? We have no real evidence of it besides the Graves novel. But other writers believe that the spiritual influence of Gabriel over the family of John has been represented in art many times with animal totems. Mark Gibbs, in his book The Virgin and the High Priest (2007), demonstrated that the image of a peacock is seen in many Renaissance-era depictions of John, Zacharias, and Elizabeth. He connects this with “Melek Taus, ” the “peacock angel ” worshipped by the Kurdish sect known as the Yezidis, which they say represents none other than Azazel, the goat demon. They variously describe him in their scriptures as simultaneously a racial ancestor and the equivalent of the Gnostic Demiurge. Also, in Islam, Gabriel is said to have visited Mohammed in the form of a horse with wings, a peacock ’s tail, and the head of a woman —a figured named “Barak ” (“Lightning ”). He gave Mohammad a midnight ride from Mecca to Jerusalem and back again, supposedly. (We will discuss this more a bit later.)

Gibbs ’ book, by the way, lays out a very convincing case, all relying on both canonical and apocryphal scripture, that Mary, the mother of Jesus, may have been a temple priestess since childhood, very intimately involved with Zechariah and Elizabeth her cousin. The Protoevangelium of James says that Mary ’s parents were both part of the priesthood, but that they both died by the time she was twelve, and then it fell upon Zechariah to find a husband for her. Tobias Churton seems to imply something similar in his book about John the Baptist. It ’s a bit too much to get into here, but it goes along with the idea that John and Jesus may have essentially grown up around each other, surrounded by priests, and were, at the very least, equally important figures.

In The Clementine Recognitions (1.54) and (1.60), it is described how some disciples of John felt that he was a more apt owner of the title “Christ ” than Jesus:

Yea, some even of the disciples of John, who seemed to be great ones, have separated themselves from the people, and proclaimed their own master as the Christ. But all these schisms have been prepared, that by means of them the faith of Christ and baptism might be hindered.

And, behold, one of the disciples of John asserted that John was the Christ, and not Jesus, inasmuch as Jesus Himself declared that John was greater than all men and all prophets.

In John 8:48, Jesus is accused of being a Samaritan magician in control of a demon:

Then the Jews answered and said to Him, “Do we not say rightly that you are a Samaritan and have a demon? ” Jesus answered, “I do not have a demon; but I honor my Father, and you dishonor me. And I do not seek my own glory; there is One who seeks and judges. ”

It should be noted that Jesus doesn ’t deny being a Samaritan (as Simon was), but only having a demon. This must be significant since in an older, primitive text may have had Christ admit that he was a Samaritan. The Samaritans were associated with witchcraft. One must keep in mind that The Babylonian Talmud also named Jesus as a sorcerer who studied magic in Egypt, just as Simon is said to have done in the Clementines. They were probably trained by a Hermopolitan priesthood (the likely authors of The Pyramid Texts). This may account for the twelve missing years in Jesus life. When he finally returned to face the Temple hierarchy, he was a highly educated young man full of heterodox ideas —a savvy, mystical antagonist, just as John was. In The Babylonian Talmud , specifically in Tosefta Shabbat 104b, we find an obscure figure by the name of “Ben Stada ” or “Ben Sattadai ” who is said to have had the “witchcraft of Egypt ” (i.e. magic spells) tattooed on his flesh. (Some scholars have identified Ben Stada as Jesus Christ, but this is a point of contention.) We also see the same accusation of demonic possession was made against John, as reflected also in Matthew 11:16- 17 (KJV):

For John came neither eating nor drinking, and they say, He hath a devil. The Son of man came eating and drinking, and they say, Behold a man gluttonous, and a winebibber, a friend of publicans and sinners. But wisdom is justified of her children.

The accusations against Jesus and John may have been connected directly. In Jesus the Magician , Morton Smith wrote about how Jesus was the target of rumors that “he had raised John the Baptist from the dead and was magically identified with him, ” or that he did his miracles by control of the “ruler of demons, Beelzebub, and was identified with him. ” Another permutation of this that can be imagined is the idea that John had a demon, the ownership of which passed on to Jesus after his death (perhaps, as we suggested before, through the agency of John ’s head). But certainly, John ’s own spirit could have been used. Many people simply thought Jesus was John risen from the dead. Even Herod thought that. Mark 6:14-16 (KJV) tells us about when Herod first head of Jesus and the miracles that he was doing:

And king Herod heard of him; (for his name was spread abroad:) and he said, That John the Baptist was risen from the dead, and therefore mighty works do shew forth themselves in him. Others said, That it is Elias. And others said, That it is a prophet, or as one of the prophets. But when Herod heard thereof, he said, It is John, whom I beheaded: he is risen from the dead.

The opening verses of Matthew 14 (KJV) tell us the same thing, while adding that Jesus is able to do wondrous things because he controls John ’s risen spirit:

At that time Herod the tetrarch heard of the fame of Jesus, And said unto his servants, This is John the Baptist; he is risen from the dead; and therefore mighty works do shew forth themselves in him.

As attested in The Pyramid Texts, The Coffin Texts, and The Book of Going Forth by Day/Book of the Dead , as well the array of royal Netherworld Books , to have one ’s head cut off was an intensely negative thing in ancient Egypt. It basically meant that the spirit was cut off from the “Night Lands ” or the afterlife. This is a common motif in ancient literature. So the fact that John was decapitated might make him the perfect victim for spiritual enslavement of this sort, as well as that fact that he was, seemingly, murdered. Morton Smith, on pages 134-138 of his book, wrote that there are actual prayers and rituals in The Greek Magical Papyri which purport to allow the magician to gain control over the spirit of a murdered man and use it to whatever ends desired. Thus Jesus could have possessed the spirit of John as kind of a “familiar ” servitor spirit.

Similarly, as we mentioned, Simon Magus was specifically accused of performing miracles by controlling the spirit of a murdered boy. Clementine Homilies 2:26 tells us that Simon Magus drew this boy ’s spirit out of the air and turned him into a homunculus (an artificial human):

For he even began to commit murder as himself disclosed to us, as a friend to friends, that, having separated the soul of a child from its own body by horrid incantations, as his assistant for the exhibition of anything that he pleased, and having drawn the likeness of the boy, he has it set up in the inner room where he sleeps, saying that he once formed the boy of air, by divine arts, and having painted his likeness, he gave him back again to the air.

Not to be left out, St. Paul talks about being haunted by an evil spirit when discussing his own ventures into the paranormal in 2 Corinthians 12: 7-9 (KJV):

And lest I should be exalted above measure through the abundance of the revelations, there was given to me a thorn in the flesh, the messenger of Satan to buffet me, lest I should be exalted above measure. For this thing I besought the Lord thrice, that it might depart from me. And he said unto me, My grace is sufficient for thee: for my strength is made perfect in weakness. Most gladly therefore will I rather glory in my infirmities, that the power of Christ may rest upon me.

The word translated above as “messenger ” is angelos, so Paul is literally saying that an angel of Satan haunted him.

It is curious to note that in Matthew 16:18, that other Simon, the disciple of Jesus, is renamed Cephas or “rock ” (a.k.a. “Peter ”), which is very similar to Simon Magus ’ title of “Standing One. ” Also consider that in Matthew 3:9, John says that God can raise up children to Abraham among these “stones. ” We are left to wonder just how connected the Jesus cult and the Simon cult may have been in the beginning.

In Clementine Homilies 18:1, it talks about Simon ’s theology, and reflects the Church Fathers ’ reports of him teaching the concept of a higher God above the God of the Jews:

When I went away yesterday, I promised to return today, and in a discussion show that he who framed the world is not the highest God, but that the highest God is another who alone is good, and who has remained unknown up to this time… . If then he is the Lawgiver, he is just; but if he is just, then he is not good… . Now a lawgiver cannot be both just and good, for these qualities do not harmonize.

This would also reflect Marcion ’s heretical beliefs, as well as what we find in John 1:17-18 (NIV):

For the law was given through Moses; grace and truth came through Jesus Christ. No one has ever seen God, but the one and only Son, who is himself God and is in closest relationship with the Father, has made him known.

The passage quoted above from The Clementine Homilies supports the reports of the Church Fathers who accused Simon of being the father of all heresies, or one of the progenitors of Gnosticism (a credit also given to John), even in its Christianized form, despite the fact that Simon himself is said to have rejected Christianity altogether. Nevertheless, it seems as though Simon learned some of his ideas from John the Baptist. The Church Fathers claimed that Simon considered himself to be this other, higher God. However, one should not rely on these reports alone as they are derogatory and biased. The Simonian teachings in question can be found in his Great Announcement , preserved by Hippolytus in Refutation of All Heresies (6:12).

The Simonians themselves, like the later Marcionites, were, not surprisingly, radical Paulinists. Simone Petrement observes in A Separate God that “in some parts of the Pseudo-Clementines, Simon represents Paul; in others, he represents Marcion, who wished to be a disciple of Paul. ” We also see Irenaeus connecting Paul ’s doctrine of “salvation by grace of Jesus Christ ” (Ephesians 2:8- 9) with the Simonian doctrine of “salvation by grace of Simon Magus ” (Against Heresies 1.23.3). Irenaeus goes on to say that Simon taught that the angels were not simply powers dominating the world, but they also authors of the law of Moses, just as Paul writes in Galatians 3:19. This is the reason why Simon ’s disciples disregarded the law, and thought of themselves as free to do what they wished. So the Simonians borrowed many ideas from Paul ’s epistles, or from earlier texts that could have served as the basis for the Pauline literature. This is also why the Jewish Christians/Ebionites attacked Paul through Simon and claimed both figures were in fact “lawless ones, ” libertines much like the Antichrist figure in 2 Thessalonians 2:8. The Babylonian Talmud also mentions heretical Jewish groups he called the Mimim , which more than likely refer to the Sethians and Ophites, who have strong similarities in doctrine with both Paul and Simon Magus.

To make things even thornier, we also have jumbled accounts of both Paul and Simon ’s deaths. In 2 Timothy 4:6-8, we find an imprisoned Paul anticipating his demise, much like John did while imprisoned in Matthew 14:3 (NIV):

For I am already being poured out as a drink offering, and the time of my departure has come. I have fought the good fight, I have finished the race, I have kept the faith. Henceforth there is laid up for me the crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous judge, will award to me on that Day, and not only to me but also to all who have loved his appearing.

However, some scholars have concluded that 1 and 2 Timothy , along with Titus, are not original to Paul but are actually Catholic pseudepigraphs. In fact, there ’s a brief refutation of Marcion ’s central text The Antitheses at the conclusion of 1 Timothy , which means that it was composed no earlier than the first half of the second century. Both 1 and 2 Timothy were forged by Orthodox polemicists (more than likely the Church Fathers) to “correct ” Marcionite and Gnostic interpretations of the Pauline texts. In other words, all the pastorals in the New Testament are forgeries. That is almost a unanimous opinion among academics. In any case, there are a few traditions which recount the ways in which Paul was supposedly beheaded. Eusebius writes in Ecclesiastical History (2:25.5) that Paul, like Peter, was martyred:

It is, therefore, recorded that Paul was beheaded in Rome itself, and that Peter likewise was crucified under Nero. This account of Peter and Paul is substantiated by the fact that their names are preserved in the cemeteries of that place even to the present day.

Tertullian wrote in Prescription Against Heretics (Chapter XXXVI) that Paul was indeed beheaded with a sword, and explicitly connects it with John ’s death:

Since, moreover, you are close upon Italy, you have Rome, from which there comes even into our own hands the very authority (of apostles themselves). How happy is its church, on which apostles poured forth all their doctrine along with their blood; where Peter endures a passion like his Lord ’s; where Paul wins his crown in a death like John ’s [the Baptist]; where the Apostle John was first plunged, unhurt, into boiling oil, and thence remitted to his island-exile.

In the Catholic pseudepigraph The Acts of Peter and Paul , Simon Magus ascends into the air like Superman, in imitation of the physical ascension of Elias and of Jesus. But whilst he was doing so, the apostles Peter and Paul counteracted his activity with the intercession of prayer, and Simon fell to the ground, seriously injuring his legs. Note that Peter and Paul are the best of friends in this text, while in the much earlier Galatians , Peter and Paul are bitter enemies, just as the Clementine writings record. It states:

And Peter, looking steadfastly against Simon, said: I adjure you, you angels of Satan, who are carrying him into the air, to deceive the hearts of the unbelievers, by the God that created all things, and by Jesus Christ, whom on the third day He raised from the dead, no longer from this hour to keep him up, but to let him go. And immediately, being let go, he fell into a place called Sacra Via, that is, Holy Way, and was divided into four parts, having perished by an evil fate.

Then Nero ordered Peter and Paul to be put in irons, and the body of Simon to be carefully kept three days, thinking that he would rise on the third day. To whom Peter said: He will no longer rise, since he is truly dead, being condemned to everlasting punishment.

Simon, like Lucifer (the King of Babylon in Isaiah 14:12-15), quite literally falls and injures himself, breaking his legs and eventually dying, after which he is condemned to Hell. The manner of his death evokes Luke ’s gospel (10:18), where it says, “Behold, I see Satan falling from heaven, ” as well as Revelation 12, where the archangel Michael casts the Devil and his angels from Heaven. This story given in The Acts of Peter and Paul looks so ludicrous that many biblical scholars have dismissed it as a sheer invention by an orthodox scribe from much later in the fifth century. However, it is our suspicion that this text appears in the historical record as late as the medieval era because of its similarities with another late medieval text known as the Toledot Yeshu . This text is usually considered an “anti-Gospel ” parody, written by Jews, where it depicts Jesus and Judas Iscariot battling in the air. But the text is largely dependent on The Acts of Peter and Paul , among other sources such as the Talmud, Midrash and even the Christian Gospels.

Furthermore, we also suspect that this story was fabricated for one reason: to cover up the true manner of Simon ’s untimely death at the hands of Roman authorities. In The Acts of Peter and Paul , Nero seems entirely favorable to Simon ’s cause to prove that he is indeed the resurrected Christ and superior to the apostles. This doesn ’t exactly pan out for Simon, however). If the theory that Simon is indeed the real identity behind Paul is correct, could it possibly be that the Knights Templar worshipped the bearded mummified head of not the herald and master John the Baptist, but of Simon Magus, the rightful heir of the Johannite tradition? This is indeed a tantalizing possibility.

What is even more amazing is that in the same Acts of Peter and Paul, we find that before Simon ’s untimely death, he is brazen enough to ask Nero to decapitate him so that he can resurrect himself in three days, to prove indeed that he was the Son of God.

Simon said: Do you believe, O good emperor, that I who was dead, and rose again, am a magician? For it had been brought about by his own cleverness that the unbelieving Simon had said to Nero: Order me to be beheaded in a dark place, and there to be left slain; and if I do not rise on the third day, know that I am a magician; but if I rise again, know that I am the Son of God.

And Nero having ordered this, in the dark, by his magic art he managed that a ram should be beheaded. And for so long did the ram appear to be Simon until he was beheaded. And when he had been beheaded in the dark, he that had beheaded him, taking the head, found it to be that of a ram; but he would not say anything to the emperor, lest he should scourge him, having ordered this to be done in secret. Thereafter, accordingly, Simon said that he had risen on the third day, because he took away the head of the ram and the limbs — but the blood had been there congealed —and on the third day he showed himself to Nero, and said: Cause to be wiped away my blood that has been poured out; for, behold, having been beheaded, as I promised, I have risen again on the third day.

We see that Nero doesn ’t actually order Simon to be killed, but, in fact, replaces his head with that of a sacrificed ram! Presumably, Simon performed some type of magical spell to make the ram ’s head appear to be Simon ’s. It should be obvious as to what the implications are here. Simon, in essence is connected to the symbolism of a ram, which is often considered the same as a goat, and therefore to Baphomet particularly, since it is only the ram ’s head we are dealing with here. In other words, not only was Simon continuing on the Johannite tradition as John ’s heir, as a religious teacher, and perhaps even by heredity as his son, as well as with his fabled death. As we mentioned, in the last part of Acts of Peter and Paul , we actually see Paul beheaded as well. In Colossians 1:17-18 (HCSB), we find that Jesus is called the “head ” of the church that is the “Body of Christ ”:

He is before all things, and in Him all things hold together. He is also head of the body, the church; and He is the beginning, the firstborn from the dead, so that He Himself will come to have first place in everything.

Could it be that the later depiction of Simon (a prototype of the black magician Doctor Faustus), in the form of the devilish Baphomet, was in essence imitating Christ, as the “outer-head ” of the Knights Templar and perhaps even the “head ” of an infernal legion of hell, trapped in the Abyss? It is generally known that during the Crusades, the Knights Templar were involved in trading religious relics. For instance, there were several claimed skulls/mummified heads of John the Baptist floating around which have now landed in places as far-flung Istanbul, Damascus, Venice, and Rome, as well as the cities of Paris, Amiens, Lyonnais, and Tyron in France. Templars were likely involved in the purchase and transport of some of these. Mark Amaru Pinkham, in Guardians of the Holy Grail , stated that the Crusader Walter de Sarton took a John head from Constantinople to Amiens, but of course, there are John heads currently in both locations, so that links De Sarton with both. Is it possible that the Templars came into possession of Simon Magus and/or St. Paul ’s severed heads as well?

Returning to the Simonian teachings, these included the idea that each soul contains that which is blessed and incorruptible in a latent condition— potentially, that is, not actually. He said that each man contains has within immortal spark of life, and above all, a boundless power —an eternal substance that is superior even to the gods and the archangels. Simon affirms this power to be the root of the universe, a divine fire which gives mankind a special status among all living beings, including privileges such as reason, language, and an upright posture. These are innate but not eternal.

In the passage placed before the one quoted above, Simon seems to echo and repeat the same words John the Baptist gives to the Pharisees in Matthew 3:10 and Luke 3:9, as we see quoted from The Great Announcement in Refutation of All Heresies 6:11:

All things, therefore, he says, when unbegotten, are in us potentially, not actually, as the grammatical or geometrical (art). If, then, one receives proper instruction and teaching, and (where consequently) what is bitter will be altered into what is sweet—that is, the spears into pruning-hooks, and the swords into ploughshares (Isaiah 2:4) —there will not be chaff and wood begotten for fire, but mature fruit, fully formed, as I said, equal and similar to the unbegotten and indefinite power. If, however, a tree continues alone, not producing fruit fully formed, it is utterly destroyed. For somewhere near, he says, is the axe (which is laid) at the roots of the tree. Every tree, he says, which does not produce good fruit, is hewn down and cast into fire.

It must also be noted that The Great Announcement is not Christian by any means. It is a work of Simonian philosophy and mysticism that says nothing about Jesus. Yet there, Simon quotes John the Baptist verbatim. Simon is teaching that those who do not bear spiritual fruit, or realize the innate divine potentiality within themselves, will be subject to a fiery condemnation.

It is rather easy to see that Simon is talking about something similar to alchemical fire, which dissolves all impurities to reveal the hidden gold inside the lead-based dross. This may also be connected symbolically with the fire that Prometheus stole from the Olympian gods. The importance of fire for the Zoroastrian priests (who were called magoi , much like Simon 's title of “magus ”) is well-documented. According to their tradition, when Ahura Mazda (the good god) created the world, he made its spiritual form from his divine fire, which was also said to hold his essence of eternal light.

In ancient Iranian society, to pollute the fire used in religious ceremonies by bringing it into contact with impure substances was one of the worst sins one could commit. If you were to extinguish the fire in a sacred fire temple, such an act was punishable by death. In The Chaldean Oracles , we find that they too express similar concepts, as it says:

When you behold a sacred fire without form, shining flashingly through the depths of the whole world, hear the voice of fire.

The passage from The Great Announcement quoted above also has some very strong End Times implications. The fire mentioned there is not meant to punish the wicked, but rather to remove all that appears on the outside, all that is perceived by the senses. This corresponds to the Valentinian eschatological belief that all matter will eventually plunge into a fiery inferno of chaos. This also corresponds to how Irenaeus describes Simon ’s credo, where he says, “He (Simon) again promised that the world would be destroyed ” (Against Heresies 1, 23, 3). All of this would conform to Hammer-Purgstall ’s understanding of the Gnostic “baptism of fire ” ritual that he believed the Ophites, and later the Templars, engaged in, which we will describe in due course. Similarly, in Luke 12:49, Jesus talks about fiery baptism:

> I have come to cast fire upon the earth; and how I wish it were already kindled! But I have a baptism to undergo, and how distressed I am until it is accomplished!

Even more tantalizing is the fact that in The Gospel of John (15:5-8), Jesus says many similar things to what John the Baptist and Simon Magus have been quoted as saying:

> I am the vine; you are the branches. If you remain in me and I in you, you will bear much fruit; apart from me you can do nothing. If you do not remain in me, you are like a branch that is thrown away and withers; such branches are picked up, thrown into the fire and burned. If you remain in me and my words remain in you, ask whatever you wish, and it will be done for you. This is to my Father ’s glory, that you bear much fruit, showing yourselves to be my disciples.

This was a fairly common allegory used by Platonic philosophers, as well as ancient physicians like Galen. The latter used the allegory of winnowing the “wheat from the chaff, ” and burning the chaff, to describe the digestive process of the stomach, with the human body itself being referred to as a “barn ” or “storehouse ” of nutrition, much like how Jesus, John, and Simon describe the Kingdom of God:

> For just as workmen skilled in preparing wheat cleanse it of any earth, stones, or foreign seeds mixed with it that would be harmful to the body, so the faculty of the stomach thrusts downward anything of that sort, but makes the rest of the material, that is naturally good, still better and distributes it to the veins extending to the stomach and intestines.

This is similar to how The Apocryphon of John assigns various demonic spirits who are ruled over by the Archons to the creation of every part of Adam ’s body. The Apocryphon of John seems to come from the Gnostic Johannite tradition, as it claims to tell the secret mysteries of the apostle John, as purportedly revealed by Jesus Christ in a post-Resurrection appearance found in the longest version of the text. (There are actually four versions, as it turns out). As Michael Allen Williams points out in Rethinking Gnosticism :

We encounter sacramental language, where the initiate is said to be awakened by the revealer and “sealed with the water of light in the five seals ” (Apocryphon of John 11 31, 22-24), evidently a reference to a baptismal ritual practiced by such a community.

Could this community be John ’s Samaritan baptismal cult, which would eventually splinter off into later groups such as the Simonians, Sethians, Dositheans, and Mandaeans?

As it turns out, the Cathars (a medieval European Gnostic sect closely linked with the Templars) had their own version of The Apocryphon of John , which they inherited from the Bogomils (a Bulgarian medieval Gnostic sect). It was called the Interrogatio Iohannis , also known as The Secret Supper and The Book of John the Evangelist . They seem to have rejected all of the other canonized Gospels in the Bible.

In a vein very similar to that of those teachers quoted above, St. Paul uses this fiery baptism language to describe the convicting power of the Holy Ghost in the Christian believer, as Tobias Churton points out in Gnostic Philosophy :

Paul cleverly employs the image of the chemist or metallurgist who, in purifying gold-bearing matter, would heat the material to a thousand degrees in a bone-ash vessel to “try ” or separate the gold from its accreted impurities. In the imaginative inner context in which Paul places the image, the fire that tries or judges can be understood as alchemical fire, and Paul shows no hesitation in bringing its power to bear upon the Corinthians: “Every man ’s work shall be made manifest: for the day shall declare it, because it shall be revealed by fire; and the fire shall try every man ’s work of what sort it is. If any man ’s work abide which he hath built thereupon, he shall receive a reward. If any man ’s work shall be burned, she shall suffer loss: but he himself shall be saved; yet so as by fire. Know yet not that ye are the temple of God, and that the spirit of God dwelleth in you? ” (1 Corinthians 3:13-16).

Simon ’s successor Menander thought that he could make his followers immortally youthful by a baptismal ceremony, as indicated by Irenaeus in Against Heresies (1.23.5). The baptism practiced by the Simon cult involved fire appearing over the water, as recorded by the anonymously produced text A Treatise On Re- Baptism (attributed to pseudo-Cyprian):

And some of them try to argue that they only administer a sound and perfect [baptism], not as we, a mutilated and curtailed baptism, which they are in such wise said to designate, that immediately [after] they have descended into the water, fire at once appears upon the water.

Hippolytus makes it clear that Simon ’s teaching of the divine fire was derived from Heraclitus, a pre-Socratic philosopher given pejorative titles such as “the Obscure, ” and “the Weeping Philosopher. ” When Hippolytus calls Simon

Magus “obscure, ” this might not only be a reference to Heraclitus, but it might also imply that he was “esoteric, ” and “arcane. ” If you look closely you will see that the entire New Testament is filled with references to hidden divine knowledge. Origen, in his Contra Celsus , gives more insight while trying to defend the faith against the likes of that nasty pagan Celsus when he admits there was always both an esoteric and exoteric meaning behind Christian doctrines:

Moreover, since he frequently calls the Christian doctrine a secret system (of belief), we must confute him on this point also, since almost the entire world is better acquainted with what Christians preach than with the favourite opinions of philosophers. For who is ignorant of the statement that Jesus was born of a virgin, and that He was crucified, and that His resurrection is an article of faith among many, and that a general judgment is announced to come, in which the wicked are to be punished according to their deserts, and the righteous to be duly rewarded? And yet the mystery of the resurrection, not being understood, is made a subject of ridicule among unbelievers.

In these circumstances, to speak of the Christian doctrine as a secret system, is altogether absurd. But that there should be certain doctrines, not made known to the multitude, which are (revealed) after the exoteric ones have been taught, is not a peculiarity of Christianity alone, but also of philosophic systems, in which certain truths are exoteric and others esoteric . Some of the hearers of Pythagoras were content with his ipse dixit [i.e., his unqualified and unsupported proclamations]; while others were taught in secret those doctrines which were not deemed fit to be communicated to profane and insufficiently prepared ears. Moreover, all the mysteries that are celebrated everywhere throughout Greece and barbarous countries, although held in secret, have no discredit thrown upon them, so that it is in vain that he endeavours to calumniate the secret doctrines of Christianity, seeing he does not correctly understand its nature.

In The Teachings of Silvanus found in Codex 7 of the Nag Hammadi Library, Malcolm L. Peel and Jan Zandee translated the following passage:

And a foolish man does not guard against speaking (a) mystery. A wise man, (however), does not blurt out every word, but he will be discriminating toward those who hear. Do not mention everything in the presence of those whom you do not know.

One such hidden teaching might be the following Gnostic doctrine on John the Baptist from the third manuscript of Codex IX of the Nag Hammadi Library, called The Testimony of Truth :

But the Son of Man came forth from Imperishability, being alien to defilement. He came to the world by the Jordan river, and immediately the Jordan turned back. And John bore witness to the descent of Jesus. For it is he who saw the power which came down upon the Jordan river; for he knew that the dominion of carnal procreation had come to an end. The Jordan river is the power of the body, that is, the senses or pleasures. The water of the Jordan is the desire for sexual intercourse. John is the archon of the womb.

Here we see John described not only as an “Archon ” (and thus, in the Gnostic system, an agent of the bad god, the Demiurge of creation), but also as the womb. The Jordan River is said to represent the flow of life coming from the other side and incarnating through procreation, spurned on by sex and sexual desire. But when the Holy Spirit enters those waters to be born into Jesus through his baptism, the waters are turned back, signaling to John, who had the wisdom to know, that the kingdom of the Demiurge, and material life through carnal procreation, was starting to come to an end. Jesus was seen by some Christian Gnostics as the one who would bring about this end, and return the lost souls of men to their real home: the Pleroma on the other side of the veil of existence.

Similar symbolism is found in Hippolytus ’ report on the Naassenes, in which Egypt is now used as a symbol for the body. Instead of the Red Sea parting for the Israelites but drowning the Egyptians, we are told about “the great Jordan ” coming between them, allowing the “children of Israel ” to escape Egypt. In Refutation of All Heresies , near the end of Chapter 2, he tells us about the Naassene interpretation of John 3:6. (“That which is born of the flesh is flesh, and that which is born of the spirit is spirit. ”) He says:

This, according to them, is the spiritual generation. This … is the great Jordan which, flowing on (here) below, and preventing the children of Israel from departing out of Egypt—I mean from terrestrial intercourse, for Egypt is with them the body —Jesus drove back, and made it flow upwards.

The word Jordan means “one who descends ” or “to flow down ” in Hebrew, so again we are talking about a symbolic river of life, the course of which is reversed (so that life returns to its origin rather than incarnating on Earth to die), thus allowing escape from the slavery of “Egypt ” (life inside the body). The same metaphoric system appears to be operating in the Valentinian liturgy On the Baptism (A), involving the Exodus, the Jordan, and the reversal of its flow so that it now goes from “the world ” into “the Aeon ” (the Pleroma):

> Moreover, the first baptism is the forgiveness of sins. We are brought … into the imperishability which is the Jordan. But that place is of the world. So we have been sent out of the world into the Aeon. For the interpretation of John is the Aeon, while the interpretation of that which is the upward progression, that is, our Exodus from the world into the Aeon.

The “upward progression ” is the reversal of the flow of the river of life, the Jordan, allowing the “Exodus ” —the escape from the body. One can think of this as analogous to the reversal of the flow of “prana ” or life-force through the spinal column in kundalini yoga, which allows this power to rise from the base of the spine (where the “Earth chakra ” is centered) up to and out through the godhead chakra located at the top of the head, gaining the practitioner temporary escape from the mental pain of existence. One can also think of it as providing a grand explanation for the symbol of the four rivers that allegedly flowed through the Garden of Eden, which appear to show up again in St. John the Divine ’s Revelation . There they are described as the “waters of life ” and shown issuing from beneath the throne of God, and the altar in the center of the New Jerusalem. In Christian iconography, images of this altar at the New Jerusalem always show the Agnus Dei or Lamb of God with blood flowing out of his neck, indicating that it is the blood of Christ actually coursing through these rivers. Blood, in fact, is the Water of Life, thought since ancient times to actually contain the life-force of the soul, and the “four rivers ” can be thought of as the two arteries and two veins that each of us has issuing from the heart.

This is all very much like how Simon read the Garden of Eden (or “Edem ”) as being symbolic of the womb, as well as the fetus contained inside. He (or the person who wrote in his name) said:

How then, he says, and in what manner, does God form man? In Paradise; for so it seems to him. Grant Paradise, he says, to be the womb; and that this is a true (assumption) the Scripture will teach, when it utters the words, I am He who forms you in your mother ’s womb (Jeremiah 1:5). For this also he wishes to have been written so. Moses, he says, resorting to allegory, has declared Paradise to be the womb, if we ought to rely on his statement. If, however, God forms man in his mother ’s womb — that is, in Paradise — as I have affirmed, let Paradise be the womb, and Edem the after-birth, a river flowing forth from Edem, for the purpose of irrigating Paradise, (Genesis 2:10) (meaning by this) the navel. This navel, he says, is separated into four principles; for on either side of the navel are situated two arteries, channels of spirit, and two veins, channels of blood.

But when, he says, the umbilical vessels proceed forth from Edem, that is, the caul in which the foetus is enveloped grows into the (foetus) that is being formed in the vicinity of the epigastrium, —(now) all in common denominate this a navel —these two veins through which the blood flows, and is conveyed from Edem, the after-birth, to what are styled the gates of the liver; (these veins, I say,) nourish the foetus.

But the arteries which we have spoken of as being channels of spirit, embrace the bladder on both sides, around the pelvis, and connect it with the great artery, called the aorta, in the vicinity of the dorsal ridge. And in this way the spirit, making its way through the ventricles to the heart, produces a movement of the foetus. For the infant that was formed in Paradise neither receives nourishment through the mouth, nor breathes through the nostrils: for as it lay in the midst of moisture, at its feet was death, if it attempted to breathe; for it would (thus) have been drawn away from moisture, and perished (accordingly). But (one may go further than this); for the entire (foetus) is bound tightly round by a covering styled the caul, and is nourished by a navel, and it receives through the (aorta), in the vicinity of the dorsal ridge, as I have stated, the substance of the spirit.

If Carl Jung read this, he would have given a standing ovation to Simon Magus ’ insight of the Garden of Eden being an allegory for the womb. To Jung, Paradise was the positive aspect of the archetypal mother, and he related it to the symbol of the Kingdom of God in the New Jerusalem. This seems to also be how many Gnostics saw it, and their ideal was to somehow escape from the flow of life incarnating into the womb. But was John seen by the Gnostics as helping aid this escape of souls with his baptism, or was he, as the Testimony of Truth describes him, an “Archon ” serving the Demiurge? The apocryphal, encratite and Gnostic Gospel of Thomas (46) quotes Jesus as saying:

From Adam to John the Baptist, among those born of women, no one is so much greater than John the Baptist that his eyes should not be averted.

But I have said that whoever among you becomes a child will recognize the (Father ’s) kingdom and will become greater than John.

It seems this Gospel is trying to say that John was so great that one could not look upon him, as if he were the Lord himself. Yet, whoever becomes a child of light will recognize the kingdom of the Father and become greater than John. This is a much clearer explanation of the always-confusing passage from Luke 7:28 (KJV):

For I say unto you, Among those that are born of women there is not a greater prophet than John the Baptist: but he that is least in the kingdom of God is greater than he.

We think that John is being presented here as merely a servant of the Demiurge. It would not be shocking for him to play this part. Many scholars, such as Elaine Pagels (writing in the Gnostic Paul) have noticed similar instances, in which biblical heroes such as David and Abraham are seen as symbolic of the Demiurge by Gnostics, such as in the Valentinian exegesis of the Apostolikon (the 10 Pauline Epistles) by Marcion.

The Mandaean Book of John portrays Jesus and John ’s relationship as being entirely hostile and antagonistic. Mandaean literature will probably eventually be dated to around the sixth century, much younger than Simonian and Gnostic literature, so that chips away at the credulity given to this text. However, one may consider that the Mandaeans themselves probably originated from Dositheus ’ offshoot cult that continued John ’s tradition after his death. In Mandaean literature, John complains about Jesus, as we read in Theosophist GRS Mead ’s The Gnostic John the Baptizer , which quotes the alleged words of John himself in the Mandaean Book of John :

Who told Yeshu (Eshu)? Who told Yeshu Messiah, son of Miryam, who told Yeshu, so that he went to the shore of the Jordan and said [unto Yahya]: “Yahya, baptize me with thy baptizing and utter o ’er me also the Name thy wont is to utter. If I show myself as thy pupil, I will remember thee then in my writing; I attest not myself as thy pupil, then wipe out my name from thy page. ”

Thereon Yahya answered Yeshu Messiah in Jerusalem: “Thou hast lied to the Jews and deceived the priests. Thou hast cut off their seed from the men and from the women bearing and being pregnant. The sabbath, which Moses made binding, hast thou relaxed in Jerusalem. Thou hast lied unto them with horns and spread abroad disgrace with the shofar. ”

Notice here that John presents us with a Jesus who discourages procreation and relaxes the Sabbath. He also describes Jesus trying to win his favor and receive his baptism, promising to make John famous in his upcoming book if he will suffer him this honor. Immediately after this part of the text, a character called “Ruha ” is mentioned, who is the Mandaean version of Sophia. It says:

When Yeshu Messiah said this, there came a Letter out of the House of Abathur: “Yahya, baptize the deceiver in Jordan. Lead him down into the Jordan and baptize him, and lead him up again to the shore… . ”

Then Ruha made herself like to a dove and threw a cross over the Jordan. A cross she threw over the Jordan and made its water to change into various colours. “O Jordan, ” she says, “thou sanctifiest me and thou sanctifiest my seven sons. ”

“The Jordan in which Messiah Paulis was baptized, have I made into a ‘trough. ’ The bread which Messiah Paulis receives, have I made into a ‘sacrament. ’ The drink which Messiah Paulis receives, have I made into a ‘supper. ’ The head-band which Messiah Paulis receives, have I made into a ‘priest-hood. ’ The staff which Messiah Paulis receives, have I made into a ‘dung [-stick].' ”

Now we are not sure exactly what a “dung-stick ” is, but it doesn ’t sound good. Ruha seems to be dismissing the Pauline Christian church pretty roundly. She finishes up her speech with this:

Let me warn you, my brothers, let me warn you, my beloved! … against [they] … who are like unto the cross. They lay it on the walls; then stand there and bow down to the block. Let me warn you, my brothers, of the god which the carpenter has joinered together. If the carpenter has joinered together the god, who then has joinered together the carpenter?

This seems to be an allusion both to the idea of Jesus being a carpenter, presenting the world with a new view of God, and also to the idea of the Demiurge, the artisan or craftsman who built the universe, implying that the God he has presented us to worship (himself) is not the highest, since someone else would had to have made him.

If John the Baptist was truly the original “Mandaean ” (hence the progenitor of Gnosticism), then demands for a deeper study of the Mandaean religion should be considered. The Mandaeans portrayed Sophia as “Ruha, ” in a very ambivalent way. However, in Mandaeism , Kurt Rudolph writes that “Ruha ” has a male consort called “Ur, ” who is equated with a dragon, which reminds us of Behemoth and Leviathan, or Samael and Lilith. Much like the Simonian Helena and the Greek goddess of fate, Heimarmene, Ruha generates the seven world- creating angelic planets as well as the signs of the Zodiac. Says Randolph:

The “World of Darkness ” is governed by the “Lord of Darkness ”… and arose from the “dark waters ” … representing the chaos. The main powers of the world of darkness are a giant monster or dragon with the name Ur (probably a polemic transformation of the Hebrew “or, ” [meaning] “light ”) and the evil (female) “Spirit ” (ruha). Their offspring are demonic beings … and “angels. ” … To them belong also the “Seven ”, … i.e., the planets, … and the “Twelve ” … signs of the Zodiac; they are sons of Ur and Ruha. ”

The main body of Mandaean teaching is called The Ginza . Divided into right and left, the right side contains the main points of theology, cosmology and myth, while the left contains the rituals. In the right Ginza , John the Baptist is claimed to be the true prophet of God, whereas “Christ the Roman ” who “did not come from the Light ” is an incarnation of “one of the seven seducing planets who roam the cosmos. ” He is said to have clothed his priests in a “colored tunic, ” then “tonsured their heads ” and veiled them “like darkness, ” presumably a reference to the black robes worn by priests, monks and nuns. The Christian Sabbath is considered a bad thing too, because “on Sundays they keep their hands from work. ”

Regarding John the Baptist, The Ginza (as quoted and translated in Marvin Meyer ’s The Gnostic Bible pp. 549-551) says:

… Faith will find a place in his heart and he will receive the Jordan and carry out baptisms for forty-two years, before Nbu, who is Hermes Christ, enters the world .

“Nbu, ” or “Nabu ” is a word found in several Semitic languages that means “prophet. ” It is connected to the Babylonian god of writing, Nebo, their version of Hermes, mentioned in an earlier chapter. It is interesting then that “Christ ” is called in this account both “Nbu ” and “Hermes. ” This brings to mind Harold R. Willoughby ’s observation from Pagan Regeneration :

The prophet of Poimandres [Hermes], when he had made a successful beginning of his evangelization, taught his followers how to give thanks to God at the time of the sun ’s setting. Hermetism, too, had its baptism and the Trismegistic prophet, like John the Baptist, summoned men to “Repent and be baptized! ”

According to Marvin Meyer, The Ginza says that Jesus becomes “wise through John ’s wisdom, ” But then “Jesus proceeds to pervert the word of John… . ” It is said of Jesus that he:

> … snares people by sorcery and befouls them with blood and menstrual discharge. He baptizes them in blocked waters and perverts the living baptism and baptizes them in the name of the father, son and holy spirit. He alienates them from the living baptism in the Jordan of living waters.

As Rene Salm points out in The Mandaeans and Christian Origins , these Mandaean texts definitely portray Jesus and John as having had an antagonistic relationship. Salm quotes Robert Stahl ’s Les Mandeens et les Origines Chretiennes (The Mandaeans and the Original Christians), where he claims that The Gospel of John is dependent upon (and is a reaction against) the Mandaean religion, as well as other forms of Gnosticism, rather than the other way around. If this is true, then it would mean that the Mandaeans existed far earlier than most scholars have assumed. Both traditions emphasize the importance light, life and the Logos in the fight against the darkness of the world. The main difference is that John ’s gospel “carnalizes ” these in the person of Jesus as the Logos personified. Celsus, in The True Doctrine , is very critical of this, and accuses the Christians of using sophistries to argue that the Logos could take on human flesh, which to him was anathema, a heresy that no true Platonist would agree with:

> For as the sun, which enlightens all other objects, first makes himself visible, so ought the son of God to have done. The Christians are guilty of sophistical reasoning, in saying that the son of God is the Logos Himself. When they declare the Logos to be the son of God [John 1:1], they do not present to view a pure and holy Logos, but a most degraded man, who was punished by scourging and crucifixion. If your Logos is the son of God, we also give our assent to the same; yet the prophecies agree with ten thousand other things more credibly than with Jesus.

Furthermore, Salm asserts that The Gospel of John was written as a reaction against those who considered John the Baptist to be the “Great Revealer. ” He even claims that the majority of the sayings of Jesus were actually stolen from John! If this is true, it only means that Jesus was simply a mask of John. But as we saw earlier, Simon Magus and the Platonic doctor Galen also use similar phraseology.

Tobias Churton, on the other hand, theorizes in The Mysteries of John the Baptist that this Gospel was actually written to emphasize the importance John the Baptist and reflect his viewpoint (instead of that of John the “beloved disciple ”), as it is most commonly assumed to be. Churton describes the baptism scene, which occurs in the first chapter, thusly:

The whole story is presented as coming from the Baptist who “saw ” and “bore record, ” that is, who testified in his own words, what happened at the baptism… . This alone would seem to me to explain how this maverick Gospel, beloved of mystics, a veritable ‘half-way house to Gnosticism, ’ as Rudolf Bultmann ’s study of John called it, came to acquire the title of the Gospel of John . It is there, staring you in the face if you care to see it.

John is doing the testifying. John is “bearing the record ” —at least to start with.

… John is announcing the good news: this is the “herald ’s ” role: the kerux of the divine ceremony… .

This is John ’s testimony, according to John, and such is its power that I have myself little doubt in ascribing the title of the Gospel to John the Baptist , a long overdue ascription.

The proem at the beginning of The Gospel of John reads like a Gnostic retelling of the opening lines of Genesis , as it says:

In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God… . All things were made by him, and without him was not anything that was made.

It has long been thought that these words may have been influenced by

Philo of Alexandria ’s teaching on the Logos as the “first born Son of God. ” Philo was a Hellenistic Jewish philosopher writing at the time of Jesus and John. To him, the Logos was the Demiurge, as well as the mediator between that material realm and the Father of all. It was the “Nous ” or universal mind, the organizing principle of creation, as well as a kind of cosmic glue. He stated in his book De Profugis :

[T]he Logos of the living God is the bond of everything, holding all things together and binding all the parts, and prevents them from being dissolved and separated.

Yet while separation of elements is necessary for creation, and for change, Logos was responsible for that as well, He was borrowing from Herclitus the concept of the “dividing Logos, ” which “creates ” individual objects in the universe by separating their element from the undifferentiated All. He compared it to the Jewish concept of Chokmah (“Divine Wisdom ”) that we mentioned in a previous chapter as being analogous to Sophia, described by Aryah Kaplan as “pure thought, which has not yet been broken up into different ideas. ”

But to Philo, this was no mere abstract concept: it was actually a living thing. Philo viewed God as someone who could actually “impregnate ” a soul with his wisdom and virtue, which may explain the origin of the idea in The Gospel of John that the Logos could be born in the person of Jesus. In The Gnostic Religion , Hans Jonas describes Philo ’s viewpoint:

Philo uses various images to describe [the] relation of divine activity and human receptivity, notably that of sowing and begetting. This image points to the idea, widespread in the Gnostic world also, of a quasi-sexual relation in which the soul is the female and conceiving part, and is impregnated by God. God alone can open the wombs of the souls, sow virtues in them, make them pregnant, and cause them to give birth to the Good.

Strangely, though, while Philo ’s ideas in this regard could have been the origin of the concept of the virgin birth, out of all the Gospels in the New Testament, John ’s Gospel, seemingly influenced by Philo, is the only one to give no account whatsoever of the circumstances of Jesus ’ conception or birth. (Indeed, the subject of his childhood is utterly neglected there.)

The Gospel of John seems to have greatly inspired later Gnostic, Valentinian and Hermetic movements. Or conversely, the groups that originated those movements may have been the ones who inspired and even wrote the text. In A Separate God , Simone Petrement writes:

The Fourth Gospel, though profoundly Jewish, is at the same time the most Hellenistic of the Gospels. It is certainly steeped in knowledge of the Old Testament, but at the same time it is steeped in a mysticism that is rather inspired by Greek philosophy, in particular by Platonism. (The Old Testament is more ethical in spirit than mystical). This blending of thoughts or expressions derived from the Old Testament with philosophical mysticism derived from Hellenism, as Dodds remarks (Historical Tradition , 16), is not superficial but belongs to a very profound level and, whatever one says, evokes Alexandrian Judaism.

Petrement also seems to think that The Gospel of John was written by Apollos, the rival and adversary of Paul who accused him of preaching “another Jesus ” and “another Gospel. ” This theory is outside of our argument here, but it is an intriguing possibility. The Jesus depicted in John seems to be more glorious and divine, even in his earthly life than the Jesus of the other gospels. It almost seems like he has only the appearance of a human body, and was really just a spirit who “appeared ” to have a body, or that his original nature was not earthly but purely divine. This was an actual doctrine known as the “heresy ” of “Docetism. ” It is these subtle differences that highlight the Gnostic and even Marcionite orientation of this Gospel.

There are many aspects of The Gospel of John that make it seem Gnostic, or proto-Gnostic. Jesus as presented here seems very rejecting of Mosaic Law, telling the Pharisees scornfully that it ’s “your law ” (10:34). Also, by proclaiming that his kingdom to come is “not of this world, ” it seems like he is denying the Jewish belief of the Resurrection of the carnal flesh at the End of Days. He appears to imply rather that his kingdom will be in the Gnostic Pleroma, outside of known existence.

Along the same line of thinking, we find a lengthy Gnostic/Valentinian commentary on The Gospel of John quoted by Irenaeus in Against Heresies (1.8.5). According to this source, the opening verses actually reveal the very origin of the Pleroma, and explicitly mention many of the names of the “aeons ” that Gnostics believed had emanated forth in succession from the Father. These are called in Greek: Arche (the Beginning), Aletheia (Truth), Logos (the Word or Reason), Zoe (Life), Anthropos (Man), Ekklesia (Church) and Charis (Grace). We also see these same terms used in the Nag Hammadi codices as well. Arche is elsewhere called “Monogenes, ” and has been referred to in Gnostic texts as the “only begotten Son ” of the unknown Father. This aeon is apparently referred to in John ’s gospel by verses 1:18 (“No man hath seen God at any time; the only begotten Son, which is in the bosom of the Father, he hath declared him . ”), and by 17:25 (“O righteous Father, the world hath not known thee: but I have known thee, and these have known that thou hast sent me. ”) These aeons make up the heavenly “Ogdoad, ” or council of eight aeons that are a part of the eternal, spiritual Godhead, and The Gospel of John does seem to enumerate them. It even says “of his pleroma (“fullness ”) we have received ” (John 1:16), which seems to mean that Jesus imparted knowledge of the Pleroma to his disciples.

In addition to the Hellenic Judaism of Philo, there is evidence that The Gospel of John may have been influenced by the cult of Asclepius as well. This was the Greek god of healing we mentioned before, whose name and imagery was adopted by one of the most famous students of Hermes Trismegistus, to whom several of the Hermetic dialogues are addressed. John 5:2-9 contains the story of Jesus at the pool of Bethesda, outside the walls of Jerusalem, where he healed the lame man (John 5:2-9). There is archaeological evidence that this was an Aesclepion —a healing center dedicated to Asclepius. The phrase Jesus used in this scene, hygies genesthai (“Do you want to be healed? ”) and the word used in this Gospel for bathing in the healing waters, louein (“to wash ”), are reminiscent of language of the Asclepius cult.

Many writers throughout history also recognized the Hermetic and Egyptian undertones in The Gospel of John ’s Proem , such as Marsillio Ficino, the Italian translator of The Corpus Hermeticum into Latin. Philip Coppens writes of this in his article, “Ficino: The high priest of the Renaissance, ” published on his website, PhillipCoppens.com:

Many of the Hermetic writings closely resemble portions of the Gospel of John , one of the few if not only Christian texts cherished by the medieval Cathars. Later, Martin Luther actually believed that the author of the Corpus had merely copied the writings of John the Evangelist. A very old Egyptian text says: “In the beginning was Thoth; and Thoth was in Atum; and Thoth was Atum in the unfathomable reaches of primordial space. ” The Prologue of John ’s Gospel, beginning with “The Word was with God and The Word was God ”, closely resembles the actions of Thoth —and Thoth was the Egyptian name of Hermes, the god of Wisdom. Ficino himself did not fail to see the similarities between the Corpus Hermeticum and John ’s Gospel and even stressed these in his introduction to his translation.

So The Gospel of John , it seems, was not only proto-Gnostic, but also proto-Hermetic, and it may have been inspired by the teachings of John the Baptist even more than those of Jesus. John was a hero, apparently, for early Hellenistic and proto-Gnostic Christians such as Paul, and laid the foundation for the Simonians and the Mandaeans. The true place of John in Christian history is somewhat obscured by the Church. Some would say that this contention between Johannite religion and Christianity began with Paul, or the Pauline camp, as Tobias Churton has argued. Lynn Picknett and Clive Prince suggested in their hit book The Templar Revelation that Jesus was an upstart rival of John ’s that threatened his leadership. They purport that the Gospels rewrote John ’s story to fit the Christian Jesus movement narrative, as they observe the following:

Although the Church of John apparently disappeared after approximately 50 CE, its continued existence can be deduced from the Church Fathers' fulminations against John ’s successors—Simon Magus and Dositheus —for about another two hundred years. Then, again in the twelfth century, this tradition also surfaces once more in the Templars ’ mystical veneration of John.

If The Gospel of John was actually written from John the Baptist ’s viewpoint, and if that viewpoint corresponds to Hermeticism, then we should not be surprised to discover that the Baptist and Hermes are symbolically linked to the same broader archetype of “wisdom god, ” and also to each other specifically. Briefly we mentioned before the figure of Oannes, the sage with a fishtail who came out of the sea each day to teach rude humanity the civilized ways. Interestingly, it seems that some comparative mythologists have connected this character to none other than John. We first became aware of this because of a throwaway line from Robert Graves, who wrote in The White Goddess that:

Oddly enough John the Baptist seems to have been identified by early Christian syncretists in Egypt with the Chaldean god Oannes who according to Berossus used to appear at long intervals in the Persian Gulf, disguised as the merman Odacon, and renew his original revelation to the faithful.

Searching for more information on the subject, we discovered what early twentieth century Viennese writer and historian Richard Eisler wrote in Orpheus the Fisher . They appear to imply that John was actually a reincarnation of Oannes! As the text states:

We should not hesitate even to presuppose that the same syncretism of John and Oannes, which seems so natural with Neo-Babylonian Gnostics [the Mandaeans], existed also among the more immediate Jewish followers of the Baptist, seeing that … influence of the Babylonian belief in ever new incarnations of the primeval Oannes —Berossus knows as many as six such reincarnations in past times… .

Another passage from that same book by Eisler says even more:

I am fairly convinced that the rapid propagation of John 's ideas, and especially the spreading of his fame into the low-lands of South Babylonia, has indeed a good deal to do with the striking resemblance of his traditional name to that of the primeval Babylonian fish- and fisher-god, the teacher and lord of all wisdom.

So we have an alleged etymological connection between Oannes and Ionnes (John 's original Greek name), as well the association with fish and water symbolism that both figures have. John is associated with fish not only because of his baptisms in the river, but also because his namesake is the prophet Jonah. You will recall that this hero from the Old Testament spent three nights inside of a sea creature, variously called either a “fish ” or a “whale, ” that Jewish legends and cabalists unanimously link to Leviathan.

Another piece of evidence cited by Eisler to prove his point connecting John and Oannes was that the latter reportedly ate nothing when he was above the ocean 's surface giving mankind lessons in wisdom, just as the former reportedly ate nothing but locusts and wild honey. If we analyze John in what Robert Graves would call a “mythopoeic ” manner, we see that John 's purported itinerant lifestyle (living in the wilderness, eating bugs, wearing a hair shirt, ranting and raving in public like a lunatic) connects him with the archetype of the “wild man ” discussed in the previous chapter, including the figures of Pan, Puck, Dionysus, Hermes, and the Green Man.

In the Catholic liturgical calendar, John ’s feast day falls on June 24th, also known as “Midsummer ’s Day ” (or to modern neo-pagans, “Litha, ” embracing an Old Saxon term). This is most certainly a day in which the Wild Man is celebrated. Falling on or around the Summer solstice, this is when the Green Man-related character known as the “Oak King ” would be venerated in the British Isles, before paganism was completely stamped out. It was Midsummer Night, on which Shakespeare invoked Puck in his famous play. Midsummer Night was also called the “Honey Moon ” night in Britain because it was considered the best time to harvest honey. Of course, honey is something we can connect with John. This connection was not missed by Tobias Churton in The Mystery of John the Baptist , where he wrote:

The solstice coincides with what used to be called the “honey moon, ” the origin of our costly nuptial abandon… . A marble figure attributed to Leonardo ’s workshop, now in the Kaiser Friedrich Museum, Berlin, depicts a youthful John the Baptist gracefully gazing at a honeycomb held in his left hand (an allusion to John ’s wild honey diet; Mark 1:6). One wonders if this Midsummer link to honey may have informed the traditional idea of Masons as “busy bees. ”

Taking the iconotropy a step further, Churton connects the honey to Dionysus and thus, Dionysus to John, via Leonardo da Vinci, who painted and drew many images of John. After analyzing several of those, Churton writes this:

Underlying the ambiguous and arguably pagan inspiration of Leonardo ’s John is the existence of a similar work, thought to have been painted between 1510 and 1515 by a follower of Leonardo from a drawing by the master. The painting has a dual identity. It is known both as St. John in the Wilderness and as Bacchus , the god of religious ecstasy, wine, and intoxication.

[The painter] chose to add vine leaves to the figure ’s head and leopard spots to John ’s hairy loincloth. A vine wreath added to the Baptist ’s former staff transformed it into a Bacchic thyrsus, Dionysus ’ sacred staff borne by his wine-intoxicated followers. According to Euripides, the thyrsus dripped with honey… .

Although it may seem strange to connect a prophet known for abstaining from wine with the very god of the vine himself, Churton is definitely onto something. He also talks about “John ’s role here as one incarnating the divine Hermes, the psychopomp leading the soul upward through the waters to a higher life… . ” Churton suggests that the baptism in this Gospel might actually be secretly hinted at as having taken place in the Underworld, with the river Jordan symbolically representing the rivers of Hades that one must travel to get from the realm of the living to the realm of the dead. He writes:

Symbolically, the “ferryman ” may then be seen as John-Hermes. Hermes, remember, was seen in Hellenistic tradition as a “psychopomp ”: literally a guide of souls through the darkness of death to the other side, the herald of another world attainable only through death.

As Churton points out, many others have connected the figure of John to that of Hermes before:

Less than a decade before Leonardo painted his late masterpiece … German artist Conrad Celtes … produced a woodcut wherein … the Greek god Hermes appeared as a straight stand-in for John the Baptist… . Celtes simply hooked into the idea of Hermes as the divine messenger and made the identification of John-Hermes by reference to the … understanding of John the Baptist as revered “forerunner ” or herald of Christ: the one crying in the wilderness.

The most famous statue of Hermes by Giovanni da Bologna (which, according to Edith Hamilton, is what makes him the most recognizable Greek god to modern people) shows him pointing a finger up to the sky in the same manner that John the Baptist is often shown doing, particularly in Renaissance art. However, he has several times also been depicting with his other hand pointing downward towards the Earth, just like Eliphas Levi ’s depiction of Baphomet, doing what we will call the “As above, so below ” pose.

The reason why St. John ’s Day is near the summer solstice is because Luke 1:36 tell us that Mary ’s cousin Elizabeth was already six months pregnant with John when Mary conceived Jesus. Since Jesus was born on Christmas (ostensibly), near the winter solstice, putting John ’s birthday on Midsummer Night just made sense. In Freemasonry, both John the Baptist and John the Evangelist are considered their two main patron saints. The Evangelist ’s feast day in on December 27th, while the Baptist ’s, as we know, is on June 24. It has been quite common historically for Masonic lodges two have mandatory meetings scheduled twice a year on the feast days of the “two Johns. ” During Masonic initiations, an illustration is used called the “Masonic point within a Circle. ” It shows the two Johns standing astride a circle with a dot in the middle, possibly representing the orbit of the Earth around the sun, with the solstices, represented visually with pictures of the two Johns, on either end. In this Masonic icon, the Baptist is always shown in the Baphometic “As above, so below ” pose described above, wearing his hair shirt.

John the Baptist ’s feast day is on his birthday, which is unusual for a Christian saint, since they are usually honored on the anniversary of their martyrdom, and John ’s story ended just as badly as those of other saints. But there is a date fixed for that event, which happens to be August 29th. Tobias Churton points out that this coincides with the time of wheat and barley harvest in the western world. This would have been around the time that the traditional English folk song “John Barleycorn ” (famously performed by the band Traffic on their fourth album, John Barleycorn Must Die) would have been sung. This creepy tune talks about killing and dismembering the title character in a seemingly sacrificial manner that appears to be connected to harvest rituals, and he may have been named “John ” with the beheaded Baptist in mind. The connection seems close enough for Churton to definitively write:

The beheading of John became linked to a profound archetype, rooted in ancient conceptions of the head of wheat and barleycorn being severed to fulfill the promise of life and abundance for the people… .

Interestingly, the time in which churches celebrate the “Baptism of the Lord ” (January 19th for the Orthodox, and the first Sunday following January 6th for the Catholics) is close to the time (January 20th) when the sun enters the house of Aquarius, the water-bearer.

There is yet another pagan “Wild Man ” entity that Churton saw fit to connect with John the Baptist: the aforementioned Pan. To hear him tell it, the waters of the sacred Jordan may have actually been the waters of Pan. He mentions that there was a sanctuary and sacred spring dedicated to Pan called Paneas, issuing from none other than Mount Hermon (where the Watchers landed on Earth from Heaven, according to The First Book of Enoch). He says it may have been the source of the river that John used to baptize people:

We must presume that John the Baptist would have come to Paneas also. How could he not? For in his day, a giant spring used to gush from a limestone cave whence the waters wove their way down to the Huela marshes, thence southward. According to Josephus, this mighty spring was held to be the source of nothing less than the living waters of the holy River Jordan: “Now the fountains of Jordan rise at the roots of this cavity outwardly; and, as some think, this is the utmost origin of Jordan ” (Wars 1:21:3).

So by linking John to this half-goat fertility god, Churton presents what can obviously be construed as yet another symbolic link between the Baptist and the idea of Baphomet. The other obvious link, besides the fact that the Templars revered him, is that his head was severed, and the Baphomet idols purportedly used by the Templars took the form of a severed head or skull. The idea that the Baphomet head might have been John ’s is written about in almost every nonfiction book ever penned about this dark chapter in the Templars ’ history.

John ’s connection with Freemasonry is interesting. Of course, it is assumed to have been absorbed from the Templars. Tobias Churton points out that, before the Grand Lodge of London completely took over and homogenized the craft in the eighteenth century, there was a time during which the members of lodges who had not yet been incorporated were known cryptically as “St. John ’s Men. ” It was clear at the time that the St. John they were referring to was the Baptist. However, after the Grand Lodge takeover, Churton notes that the Masons began celebrating John the Evangelist as well, and he seems to think they did this to muddy the waters and make it hard to tell which John was really special to them. He quotes from the famous Sloane Manuscript, a fifteenth-century collection of texts on file in the British Museum, which contains a script for a Masonic ritual in which the candidate must state that the first Masonic “word ” was “given ” at “the Tower of Babylon, ” and that the first Masonic lodge, back then, was called the “Chapel of St. John. ” So here we have John and the origins of Freemasonry connected to the Babylonians, and perhaps an echo of their priesthood ’s initiation into the rites of Oannes, the memory of which may have been later transposed onto the figure of the Baptist.

This brings us to the next noteworthy quotation, from The Cauldron & the Grail: Ritual Astronomy & the Quest for Enlightenment by Hank Harrison. Here he talks about the Greek rites of Eleusis, an offshoot of the Dionysian cult, and how they would drink hallucinogenic intoxicants proffered to them by Pluto, the lord of the underworld, who would then transform into a “man-fish ” like Oannes and reveal to them secret, sacred wisdom:

In the rituals of Eleusis, as enacted at the height of Athenian power in the Greek Golden Age, it was crucial that Pluto entice Persephone in her human form into a state of expanded consciousness. She must see more in order to understand the mystery. To do this Pluto has her drink a psychotropic substance from a special goblet, the Kykion — another proto-Grail. Pluto then transforms himself into Iakchos —an anthropomorphic man-fish who performs a passion play, based on ritual astronomy. This is not a strictly Atlantic ritual. Clearly the man fish can be traced to Vishnu and the Vedic scriptures. But the Atlantic contribution is also apparent, especially in the transformation process and in the fact that the audience becomes an intrinsic part of the mystery. At Eleusis the spectators sing hymns to the man-fish, a figure who shows up fifteen hundred years later in the Grail literature as the Fisher King. Only Iakchos can return the maiden Persephone (essentially the vessel of the Grail) to the world of light and only the Fisher King can reveal the Grail secrets to Perceival.

Of course Oannes is linked to John, as we have established, and “Iakchos ” brings to mind “Jack, ” a common nickname for men named John, as well as “Bacchus, ” the Roman term for Dionysus. In some versions of the above- mentioned rite, it is Dionysus himself who is transformed into “Iakchos ” or “Iacchus. ” Drinking the wine of Dionysus could very well be symbolic of drinking “divine wisdom, ” as we saw, with Marcus the Magician and his version of the Eucharistic cup. The Mandaeans venerated John the Baptist as a Gnostic figure who dipped others in water, immersing them in a flood of Gnosis. Simon Magus presumably taught the same thing to his disciples.

What John was teaching was that salvation through Gnosis (represented by the Logos, or by Christ to the Christians) is readily available to those who seek the hidden wisdom of the Nazarenes (a term even the Mandaeans used to refer to their priests). For the Templars, however, it seems likely that the secret knowledge they sought was symbolized by their idol Baphomet, and conferred upon their initiates via the “Baptism of Wisdom ” rite, which they may or may not have believed to have had anything to do with John ’s baptism. As we will see, this rite was perhaps more blasphemous and scandalous than most people could even imagine.

Chapter 7: The Baptism of Wisdom

The ancient mysteries later fell into a perverted decline, and were replaced with ceremonial sorcery, incantations in lieu of divine magic, and also were filled with the indescribable practices of the orgies of Bacchus… . The keys to esoteric knowledge were thrown over the hedge of time.

—Henry C. Clausen, former Sovereign Grand Commander of the Supreme Council of the Southern Jurisdiction of Scottish Rite Freemasonry, USA

If John is connected to the cults of Dionysus and Pan, then we should not be surprised to find that those who practiced similar Gnostic baptismal religions at later times also indulged in ceremonies involving intoxication, frenzy, ecstasy, and sexual license. In Hippolytus ’ Refutation of All Heresies , there is evidence that the Naassenes may have performed homosexual acts in their rituals. If this is true, then it may be that they believed their sexual practice was somehow reversing the normal course of sex, and turning the energy backwards—turning the Jordan River in a different direction, as the Mandaeans may have allegorized —and thereby restoring themselves to divinity. Similarly practitioners of “Tantric ” sexual yoga withhold from ejaculating in order to retain the sexual energy within, for alleged spiritual gains. Perhaps in the Naassenes, or similar groups, we can find the origins of the Templars ’ supposed homosexual initiation rituals. Hippolytus tells of the Naassenes, while quoting from scripture:

Romans 1:27, “And likewise also the men, leaving the natural use of the woman, burned in their lust one toward another; men with men working that which is unseemly ” —now the expression that which is unseemly signifies, according to these (Naasseni), the first and blessed substance, figureless, the cause of all figures to those things that are moulded into shapes — “and receiving in themselves that recompense of their error which was meet. ” (Romans 1:27) For in these words which Paul has spoken they say the entire secret of theirs, and a hidden mystery of blessed pleasure, are comprised. For the promise of washing is not any other, according to them, than the introduction of him that is washed in, according to them, life-giving water, and anointed with ineffable ointment (than his introduction) into unfading bliss.

This entire section indicates that the Naassenes believed that Paul secretly taught them to practice homosexual rites. We suspect that the terms “washing, ” “life-giving water ” and “ineffable ointment ” mentioned above all refer to a ritual of bathing in semen. Judging from Epiphanius ’ explicit accounts of Gnostics eating semen and menses as the Eucharist, as well as consuming aborted embryos pounded with honey and pepper, it doesn ’t seem too far-fetched. A lot of Epiphanius ’ criticism against Gnostic groups is based on his interpretation of a metaphor of gathering up the “spiritual seeds ” of the world for the Gnostic church. These are the “spiritual elect. ” The Greek word for seed is sperma . Here is an example of the metaphor being used in The Gospel of Eve that was twisted by Epiphanius in Panarion 26.3.1:

I stood upon a lofty mountain, and saw a man who was tall, and another, little of stature. And I heard as it were the sound of thunder and drew nigh to hear, and he spake with me and said, I am thou and thou art I, and wheresoever thou art, there am I; and I am sown in all things. And from wheresoever thou wilt thou gatherest me, but in gathering me, thou gatherest thyself.

The Gospel of Philip (a Gnostic gospel not part of the Nag Hammadi Codices) tells us something similar as well:

The Lord hath shown me what my soul must say on its ascent to heaven, and how it must answer each of the powers on high. “I have recognized myself, ” it saith, “and gathered myself from every quarter, and have sown no children for the archon. But I have pulled up his roots and gathered my scattered members, and I know who thou art. For I, ” it saith, “am of the ones on high. ”

All of this is consistent with idea that some Gnostic sects believed they were gathering spiritual seeds from the world and returning them to the realm above. It seems to have something to do with refraining from conceiving children, while at the same time not refraining from sex (quite the opposite). Simon Magus is also said to teach the same libertine practices, calling it “perfect love. ”

It might be wise to consider that Epiphanius was perhaps just misinterpreting a mystical teaching, and indulging in gossip about the same rumors that were once heard in the Roman empire about Christians. We saw how Celsus conflated the Christians and the Ophites with each other, accusing the Christians of being involved in the Ophites ’ secret orgies and cannibalistic rites. However, it is undeniable that the authors of early Gnostic scripture were practically obsessed with erotic symbolism.

In Refutations (5.21), Hippolytus referred to the phallic deity Priapus, who the Gnostic teacher Justin claimed had “fashioned all things. ” Epiphanius, in Panarion 25.2.4, also connected the teaching of the libertine Nicolaitans (who The Revelation of St. John condemns in the strongest terms), together with a great female power called Barbelo who “emitted from the Father. ” Her relation to the world-creating powers or Archons is highly erotic because she “continually appears to the Archons in some beautiful form and, through their climax and ejaculation, takes their seed to recover her power, which has been sown in several of them. ” This continued emitting of semen is an important part of the recovery of a female force situated in the eighth heaven. Nicolaus is quoted as saying, “Unless one copulates every day, he cannot have eternal life. ” (Panarion 25.1.5) We must look to the observations of Jacque Lacarriere on all of this when he connects Gnostic sex rituals as reported by the Church Fathers with the

Satanic Black Mass in his book The Gnostics :

The Black Mass is not far removed from the Barbelo Gnostic ritual — certainly no farther than Sabaoth is from Lucifer— and it is no mere chance that certain aspects of these rites are to be found, right down to the present day, among the Luciferean sects, where they are spiced with cabbalistic demonology. The ambivalence of the whole Gnostic attitude, the perpetual temptation that oscillates between rigorous asceticism and rigorous debauch (since both have the same sateriolagical value) is to be found there and, in the historical evolution of Gnosticism, was translated into the opposing paths of mystic Catharism (far the first) and magic Luciferism (for the second).

In Roman History (39.12), the Roman historian Livy makes the same accusations against those who partook in the Bacchanalia ceremonies, when he writes:

When once the mysteries had assumed this promiscuous character, and men were mingled with women with all the license of nocturnal orgies, there was no crime, no deed of shame, wanting. More uncleanness was wrought by men with men than with women. Whoever would not submit to defilement, or shrank from violating others, was sacrificed as a victim. To regard nothing as impious or criminal was the very sum of their religion.

These Bacchus worshipers were pretty hardcore! Even more amazing, there is evidence that there was a strong Bacchic/Dionysian influence on Christianity, as well as on the Johannite heresy. As we mentioned, when we first encounter John in the Gospels, especially in Matthew , we find that John described as a homeless madman living on insects. He seems to be demonstrating the sort of mania (etymologically related to manteia , meaning “prophecy ”) described by Plato in Phaedrus (244de):

This madness can provide relief from the greatest plagues of trouble that beset certain families because of their guilt for ancient crimes: it turns up among those who need a way out; it gives prophecies and takes refuge in prayers to the gods and in worship, discovering mystic rites and purifications that bring the man it touches through to safety for this and all time to come. So it is that the right sort of madness finds relief from present hardships for a man it has possessed.

Baptism was one of the sacraments of the Thracian moon and fertility goddess Kotys (or “Kotyto ”). Ian C. Storey writes in Eupolis, Poet of Old Comedy :

“Baptai ” were worshipers (in this case of the goddess Kotyto) who had undergone a ritual immersion or washing as a rite of initiation.

We also find much Dionysian symbolism in The Gospel of John as well (some of it discussed in the previous chapter). In John 2:1-11 we see Jesus turning water to wine at the wedding at Cana (once celebrated by the Catholic Church on the same feast day as Jesus ’ baptism). Similarly, there were many myths of Dionysus ’ miraculous production of wine. The Middle Platonist and historian Plutarch relayed this wine miracle in the Life of Lysander (28, 4), where he says that the handmaidens and nurses of the infant Dionysus dipped him into a spring and the water changed into wine of a pleasant taste. For a polytheistic Greek audience, the Dionysian resonance in the story of Jesus ’ wine miracle would have been unmistakable.

Moreover, John ’s Gospel employs further Dionysian imagery when Jesus is quoted as saying: “I am the true vine ” (15:1). John ’s Jesus presents himself as a “New Dionysus, ” superior to the previous version of the god. In 1 Corinthians 12:12-13 (NASB) we read:

For even as the body is one and yet has many members, and all the members of the body, though they are many, are one body, so also is Christ. For by one Spirit we were all baptized into one body, whether Jews or Greeks, whether slaves or free, and we were all made to drink of one Spirit.

To “drink of one spirit ” parallels the Dionysian ritual of imbibing the god through the consumption of wine. (The word “spirit ” is even a term applied to alcoholic beverages.) This is the basis of the Catholic Eucharist, with the consumption of Jesus Christ ’s blood symbolized as wine, and his flesh as the wafer of bread.

The Bacchic possession of “divine madness ” has parallels with Paul ’s teaching on how possession of the Holy Spirit was meant to affect a convert who “received ” it through baptism, resulting in things like glossolalia (speaking in tongues). The Greek word entheos , meaning “within is a god, ” was used to describe someone that is divinely possessed. This is the origin of the word “enthusiasm. ” This is the state of ekstasis (ecstasy), when the boundaries between the egoic self, other people, and the god worshipped are dissolved into an experience of rapture and unity. The ecstasy of the god ’s presence was said to be induced by music, dance, wine, and omophagia (the eating of raw flesh). Similarly, in John 6:53-56 (NKJV), Jesus said to his disciples:

Most assuredly, I say to you, unless you eat the flesh of the Son of Man and drink His blood, you have no life in you. Whoever eats My flesh and drinks My blood has eternal life, and I will raise him up at the last day. For My flesh is food indeed, and My blood is drink indeed. He who eats My flesh and drinks My blood abides in Me, and I in him.

Jesus implored his followers to consume his divine flesh and blood to regenerate their souls from their fallen state, decaying in meat sacks because of their progenitor ’s exile from Eden after the consumption of the fruit of the Tree of Knowledge of Good and Evil. This can be compared to ambrosia, the food of the gods on Olympus, which gave their blood, called “ichor, ” the power to keep them immortal. Not too that the fruit of the Tree of Life in the Garden of Eden had such properties, as do the rivers of the “water of life ” that are said to flow through the New Jerusalem for the saved ones at the End Times. As we mentioned, these rivers are described as ultimately issuing from the sliced-open jugular vein of the Agnes Dei (Lamb of God) depicted as standing on the altar at the center of the holy city. Clearly, the latter description is a metaphor for the blood of Christ. Semen and blood were both substances considered by all ancient societies to be the givers of life and the carriers of soul essence. Especially included here was menstrual blood, which many ancient cultures thought was a coagulant from which the body of a fetus was formed, possessing the germ of life in itself, not understanding the role played by the ovum. Under a more Hermetic or Gnostic lens, one can interpret ingesting these holy foods as medicine to transcend one ’s fate, controlled by the fixed stars of the Zodiac.

This is the key to understanding “the elixir of life ” spoken of by the alchemists, which Ignatius of Antioch equated with the Eucharist. He called it the “medicine of immortality ” in Ignatius to the Ephesians 20:2. In modern times, the self-purported neo-Templar “Ordo Templi Orientis ” serve at their “Gnostic Mass ” what they call “cakes of light ” (a mix of menstrual blood, semen, honey, cake batter, and olive oil) instead of the traditional Eucharist wafer. We are not quite sure how many of the participants are aware of the ingredients of the cakes, as these rites are open to the public, and no warning is given to congregants about what they are about to consume.

In Liber Aleph , Aleister Crowley writes that pre-eminent in all sex magick “is the Formula of the Serpent with the Head of the Lion ” —which he says is a reference to semen, and another personification of Baphomet— “and all this Magick is wrought by the Radiance and Creative Force thereof. ” To Crowley, the personal will and magical prowess was symbolized by the erect phallus. The woman is a necessary, respected and consecrated essential of the formula for sex magic, but only in a reflective sense as a vessel, for the manifestation of the sacred.

Returning to Paul, in 1 Corinthians 14:23 (NIV) he discusses how speaking in tongues is indicative of one possessed by the Holy Spirit, having a private conversation with God that only He can understand. The Acts of the Apostles shows Paul seemingly “gone mad ” from his own divine encounter with the risen Christ, and we are to understand that this behavior is a sign of one touched by God. But here in 1 Corinthians , Paul explains that speaking in tongues will not be particularly useful for winning over converts because it makes Christians look totally insane:

So if the whole church comes together and everyone speaks in tongues, and inquirers or unbelievers come in, will they not say that you are out of your mind?

Similarly, imbibing or absorbing the spirit of Dionysus leads to “madness ” and ecstatic speech. Thus the followers of Dionysus were called “Maenads, ” which was sort of a pun on a Greek term that meant “maddened one. ” But perhaps not all such spiritual experiences are the same. Earlier in 1 Corinthians 10:20-22 (NIV), Paul distinguished between possession by the Paraclete or Holy Spirit and demonic possession by contrasting Christian worship with Greco-Roman pagan sacrifice:

[T]he sacrifices of pagans are offered to demons, not to God, and I do not want you to be participants with demons. You cannot drink the cup of the Lord and the cup of demons too; you cannot have a part in both the Lord ’s table and the table of demons.

In Ephesians 5:18-19 (NIV), Paul admonishes the newly regenerated Christians to live a conservative lifestyle instead of a libertine, Dionysian one when he writes:

Do not get drunk on wine, which leads to debauchery. Instead, be filled with the Spirit, speaking to one another with psalms, hymns, and songs from the Spirit.

For Paul, imbibing the Spirit of God doesn ’t induce drunkenness and debauchery, but edification and maturity. It is probable that Paul (or the true Pauline author, whoever that was) wrote part of this letter with the Bacchanalia in mind. Plato took a moderate or tempered stance on celebrating the rites of Dionysus when he said that no one under eighteen should drink wine, but that adults over forty should take part in the “convivial gatherings and invoke Dionysus… . ” (Leg . 2.666B) He also suggested mixing water with the wine to temper its intoxicating effects.

But whether wine, spiritual possession or some other vector is used, it seems that this state of mind was commonly thought to be the desirable result of ritual for many Gnostic groups. As Hans Jonas about Philo:

Among the impressive things which he [Philo] coins in this connection (by way of Scriptural allegory) is that of “defecting from oneself ”; and a favorite one, “to fly from oneself and flee to God. ” “He who runs away from God flees to himself … he who flies from his own nous (mind) flees to that of the All. ” (Leg .all.III.29; cf.ibid.48).

This fleeing from oneself can, besides the ethical meaning which we have so far been considering, assume also a mystical meaning, as in the following passage: “Get thee out, not only from thy body … [“country ”] and from sense-perception … [“kindred ”] and from reason … [“father ’s house ”], but escape even thyself, and pass out of thyself, raving and God- possessed like the Dionysian Corybantes. With this mystic version of the abandonment of the self we have to deal in the context of gnostic psychology.

In order to achieve this state of mind, the Greco-Roman mystery cults, such as the rites of Dionysus, Eleusis, and Orpheus, engaged in things meant to temporarily divorce their minds from the everyday world. The goal was to force their souls to venture forth into the wilderness of mystical ecstasy, to be absorbed fully by the deity worshipped. Wine and other intoxicants, as well as unusual forms of group sex, were to be expected.

This brings us to the famous alabaster “Ophite Bowl ” found in Syria and dated from the third to fifth century. According to Kurt Rudolph in Gnosis: The Nature & History of Gnosticism , there is actually a controversy over whether this relic belonged to the Ophites, as the ritual depicted inside seems Ophitic, or if it came from the mysteries of Orpheus, as the inscription on the outside of the bowl seems to imply. Either way it is pertinent to our inquiry, as both Orphism and Ophitism seem to have contributed to the stream of tradition that may have eventually influenced the secret practices of the Knights Templar.

Let us consider what we see depicted inside of this bowl. We see a serpent surrounded by sixteen naked initiates arranged in a circle, each making an obscure ritual hand gesture towards the snake as if in veneration. Ewa Osek remarks on the Ophite bowl in “Hermes ’ Tablet (Nonnus D 41.343-44): An Allusion to the ‘Orphic ’ Gold Leaves? ”

Delbrueck and Vollgraff, who examined this bowl in the early 1930s, excluded the possibility of forgery. They maintained that this was an alabaster copy of the metal original, both (copy and original) impossible to date more precisely than to AD 300 –529. “The special importance of the bowl ” —the scholars claim — “lies in the fact that it is, so far as we know, the only representation of a cult-scene … from the jealously-concealed Orphic mysteries. ” This led them to the conclusion that the radiant snake, pointing at the omphalos, had to be Phanes, the Orphic god of the sun. Hans Leisegang (1955), who saw the vessel in question a few years before them, supposed it was associated with the cult of the heavenly serpent worshipped by Gnostic sects (Ophites, Sethians, Naassenes) as well as by the Orphics, who sang their Bacchics to honor Phanes, envisioned as dragon.

The image of the winged serpent in the center of the bowl brings to mind the caduceus, the double-snaked staff of Hermes. Note that the snake here is coiled, much like the Hindu yogic “kundalini serpent, ” which is said to be “coiled ” energy hidden dormant within the human spinal column. It is “released ” when the devotee has done yogic practices or spiritual meditations to manipulate the subtle energy centers (called “chakras ”) along the spine. This may be connected to the “Nagas ” of Kashmir, which were likely the Hindu equivalents of the Ophite Gnostics, venerating Hindu, Buddhist, and Jainist “Devas, ” or deities who were depicted with the lower bodies of serpents. The concept of the kundalini is very similar to how the Naassenes allegorized the serpent as a presentation of the spinal column combined with the pineal gland (the “third eye ”) within the brain. As reported by Hippolytus (Refutation of All Heresies 5.11):

… They adduce the anatomy of the brain, assimilating, from the fact of its immobility, the brain itself to the Father, and the cerebellum to the Son, because of its being moved and being of the form of (the head of) a serpent. And they allege that this (cerebellum), by an ineffable and inscrutable process, attracts through the pineal gland the spiritual and life- giving substance emanating from the vaulted chamber (in which the brain is embedded). And on receiving this, the cerebellum in an ineffable manner imparts the ideas, just as the Son does, to matter; or, in other words, the seeds and the genera of the things produced according to the flesh flow along into the spinal marrow.

The imagery in the bowl has been taken by most writers on the subject to represent the sacred orgies celebrated in secret by the Ophites, as described by Epiphanius. In the Panarion (1.37.5:5-5:8), he wrote that the Ophites held a Eucharistic ceremony which included kissing snakes.

And therefore these people who possess the serpent ’s portion and nothing else, call the serpent a king from heaven. And so, they say, they glorify him for such knowledge and offer him bread. For they have a real snake and keep it in a basket of some sort. When it is time for their mysteries they bring it out of the den, spread loaves around on a table, and call the snake to come; and when the den is opened it comes out. And then the snake— which comes up of its own accord and by its villainy —already knowing their foolishness, crawls onto the table and coils up on the loaves. And this they call a perfect sacrifice. And so, as I have heard from someone, not only do they break the loaves the snake has coiled on and distribute them to the communicants, but each one kisses the snake on the mouth besides— whether the snake has been charmed into tameness by some sort of sorcery, or coaxed by some other act of the devil for their deception. But they worship an animal of that sort and call what has been consecrated by its coiling around it the eucharistic element. And they offer a hymn to the Father on high —again, as they say, through the snake —and so conclude their mysteries.

This ritual sounds exactly like the depiction of a ritual found by Joseph von Hammer-Purgstall, also on a ceremonial bowl that had been discovered on a former Templar property. In that image we see naked men and women kissing snakes on the lips. Similar bowls, along with images from cups coins, and the walls of cathedrals, also depict children, and animals such as dogs, bears, and camels, involved in what Hammer-Purgstall interpreted as ceremonial rites of bestiality and pederasty. They show women suckling snakes to their breasts, and blasphemous acts, like a naked woman using a water pitcher to put out the candles on a menorah, to represent extinguishing the light of the Judaic god and tradition. If these were truly ritual practices borrowed from Gnostics sects, it could explain what Justin Martyr meant, in a passage that will be quoted in the next chapter, when he spoke of the “upsetting of the lamp ” as a deed that certain heretics had been accused by their enemies of doing (1 Apology 26).

Another counterpart to the Ophite/Orphic ritual seen in the bowl is the so-called “Gnostic Mass ” of the OTO previously mentioned. This ritual —which culminates in an act between a priest and a naked priestess on top of an altar, obscured from view by a curtain —involves the congregants performing the exact same hand signal as those seen in the Ophite bowl. This is made with the left hand raised, with flat palm, above the head, and the right hand placed flat over the heart. The OTO calls this “the Hailing Sign of the Magician, ” and it can also be found in Duncan ’s Ritual of Freemasonry , where it is called “the Sign of a Fellow Craftsman. ” Ceremonial bowls were used throughout the ancient world for conjuring, and even trapping, spirits. They were also used to collect fluids, such as blood, baptismal water, and Eucharistic wine, used in rituals. Magical or holy bowls and cups also appear quite frequently in mythology. The most well-known to the Western audience is that of the Holy Grail, which is a mythic item tied directly to the Knights Templar. In the Grail stories, the knights who guard the holy relic are depicted in ways that make it quite clear they are Templars, and in Wolfram von Echenbach ’s version of the tale (Parzival), he called them that explicitly. But what the Grail is, and the origin of the myth, has been debated for centuries.

Perhaps the most interesting connection in regards to our present inquiry has to do with the alleged “Baptism of Wisdom, ” seemingly the best translation of the name “Baphomet, ” and according to Joseph von Hammer-Purgstall, the name of an Ophite Gnostic ritual that the Knights Templar engaged in to conjure Baphomet. In The Corpus Hermeticum

’s fourth chapter, the “Discourse of Hermes to Tat on the Mixing Bowl or the Monad, ” Hermes explains that the Father of all didn't give Nous (mind, intelligence, or wisdom) to every person born in the world. Rather, he put it in a “mixing bowl ” which he sent down from Heaven, intending for humans to compete with each other for access to it, along with a herald to proclaim to us below:

Immerse yourself in the mixing bowl if your heart has the strength, if it believes you will rise up again to the one who sent the mixing bowl below, if it recognizes the purpose of your coming to be.

All those who heeded the proclamation and immersed themselves in mind participated in knowledge and became perfect people because they received mind.

After hearing this, Tat understandably pleads: “I too wish to be immersed, my father. ”

This Hermetic discourse is mentioned by Hammer-Purgstall himself in reference to the Baptism of Wisdom, which he describes as a “Baptism of Fire. ” Here is a translation of Hammer-Purgstall ’s words (from the first-ever English edition, soon to be published with commentary from Tracy R. Twyman):

Let us now take a look at the place in Hermes Trismegistus … where God sends a messenger with a bowl full of “Mens ” [“wisdom ”, or “mind ”], where perfected souls tending towards gnosis are ordered to immerse themselves. Other patristic authorities [discuss] the mystical baptism of the Gnostics, and various words distorted out of Hebrew and other languages are adduced, of which one is [the Greek] “basema. ” What wonder, therefore, if “baptism ” was changed into “Baphen, ” just as “Metin ” [was changed] into “Meten. ”

It was amazing to us when we stumbled upon this passage in The Corpus Hermeticum while researching the subject of Hermes for the purpose of writing this book. It was especially amazing considering that one-half of our team, Tracy Twyman, spent decades researching the subject of another sacred vessel, the Holy Grail, and had even written a book about it (The Merovingian Mythos , 2004), and has been writing about the subject of Baphomet for just as long, but somehow had never taken any special notice of this passage. We discovered it about the same time that we learned about the Ophite bowl, while studying Gnosticism. What was really strange was that as we found out from further reading, both the subject of the Ophite bowl and the Hermetic bowl of Mind popped up repeatedly in several very obscure references we were looking at. Emma Jung, writer and wife of Carl Jung, wrote about both topics in her book The Grail Legend , actually comparing and connecting the two. She said:

Think of that vessel filled with nous (understanding and consciousness) which is mentioned in the Corpus Hermeticum and which, as Hermes taught his pupil Thoth, was sent from heaven to earth so that men, plunging into it, might understand the purpose for which they were created. A vessel of this kind also played a part in the Gnostic mystery celebrations of late antiquity. In Hans Leisegang ’s study, “The Mystery of the Serpent, ” an illustration is given of a bowl that appears to have originated in an Orphic community. On it sixteen naked men and women, in reverential and worshipping attitudes, stand around a coiled and winged serpent, the symbol of the Redeemer and Son of God in the Orphic Gnosis… . In this bowl the Logos- serpent is clearly being worshipped by the initiates.

Depiction of magician creating teraphim for divination using the severed heads of young boys. From Athanasius Kirscher's Oedipus Aegyptiacus, 1652.

In the same section she mentions several other holy cups or bowls, including a tradition from Ibn Malik that God gave Mohammed a special green goblet of light “for thine enlightenment. ” She also talks about a vision by the third-century Gnostic alchemist Zosimos of Panopolis, who, she says, “saw an altar in the form of a shallow bowl in which men in torment were being cooked and thereby sublimated into a state of spirituality. ” Mrs. Jung pointed out that Zosimos himself, had in his own writings, mentioned the bowl of Mind from The Corpus Hermeticum , “in which he advises his soror mystica to immerse herself. ” On this topic her husband once wrote that this bowl was “a font or piscina, in which the immersion takes place and transformation into a spiritual being is effected. ” The transformation, however, is described as a very bloody and horrifying process. From Zosimus:

And when I had heard the voice of him who stood in the altar formed like a bowl, I questioned him, desiring to understand who he was.

He answered me in a weak voice saying, “I am Ion, Priest of the Adytum, and I have borne an intolerable force. For someone came at me headlong in the morning and dismembered me with a sword and tore me apart, according to the rigor of harmony. And, having cut my head off with the sword, he mashed my flesh with my bones and burned them in the fire of the treatment, until, my body transformed, I should learn to become a spirit. And I sustained the same intolerable force. ”

And even as he said these things to me and I forced him to speak, it was as if his eyes turned to blood and he vomited up all his flesh. And I saw him as a mutilated image of a little man and he was tearing at his flesh and falling away.

The decapitation and dismemberment process described here reminds us of the decapitation of John, and the ritual dismemberment of both Dionysus and Orpheus, as celebrated in their respective mystery cults. The vomiting up of one ’s own flesh sounds like something out of the movie Hellraiser .

What we are talking about is the alchemical process of spiritual sublimation, the nigredo , wherein all things are dissolved into blackness —what St. John of the Cross called the “Dark Night of the Soul. ” It might also be what Jesus and John the Baptist both referred to as the “Baptism of Fire. ” For many Gnostics, Hermeticists, and alchemists, this is a personal process of self-transformation through meditation, ritual, and various processes designed to dissolve ego awareness. We do not deny, however, that some may have also performed ritual sacrifices or other dark deeds with the purpose of soul transmutation.

In the case of modern Aleister Crowley acolytes, it may involve both. Above the Ordo Templi Orientis there is a secret inner circle is called the “Argentum Astrum ” (the Silver Star), consisting entirely of people who have gone through a ritual called “Crossing the Abyss. ” It is supposed to be a form of ego death, after which the initiate is “reborn ” as a master magician. The idea is that the self is dissolved in the “Abyss ” of primordial chaos. Normally, this sort of experience either kills or at least mentally destroys the average person, and they are never the same again. But a true master, they say, can go through this, burn off the dross of his false self (the common ego), and come out retaining his true self (the super-ego). He then realizes his “True Will ” or personal destiny.

This is analogous to being dissolved in the Hermetic bowl and retaining your true self, thus being able to recognize “the purpose of your coming to be. ” It is something not for the weak, but only, like with the Hermetic baptism, “if your heart has the strength, if it believes you will rise up again. ” Tracy R. Twyman has heard from a reliable witness, whose name we must keep secret for obvious reasons, that in the Argentum Astrum this is achieved by kidnapping the initiate from his home with chloroform. When he wakes up, he is in a dark room where he is sodomized horribly by hooded figures (his brothers in the order), for several hours, the humiliation of which is supposed to achieve the necessary purification. We are not making any formal accusations here, but simply passing along what we have heard.

This concept of “crossing ” or “immersing ” yourself in the Abyss, a process which only the elect few are able to pass through still whole, is also related to a repeated theme found in mystery cults in which a soul (either after death, or during the transformation of an initiation ritual) is offered two cups. One brings forgetfulness of the previous life (filled with water from the river Lethe [“forgetfulness ”] which flows through Hades), while the other allows he who drinks it to retain his memory even after death or transformation, and on into the new life or new form. The Gnostic Pistis Sophia talks about “Adamas, ” in this source the equivalent of Hermes, and someone described as “a receiver of the Little Sabaoth [the Lords of Hosts] ” offering these two cups to recently discarnate souls:

And there comes Ialouham, the receiver of Sabaoth, the Adamas [ie, Hermes] who gives to the souls the cup of forgetfulness, and he brings the water of forgetfulness and gives it unto a soul [and it drinks it], and it forgets all things and all places unto which it had gone. Afterwards there comes a receiver of the little Sabaoth … and he himself brings a cup filled with understanding and wisdom, and sobriety is found in it, and he gives it to the soul and they cast it into a body that will not be able to sleep nor to forget, because of the cup of sobriety which is given to the soul, but the body will lash the soul's heart continually to seek after the mysteries of the Light.

According to Hammer-Purgstall, a ritual baptism of fire was represented on the artifacts he claimed to have found:

In support of spiritual baptism and tincture of fire were the sculptured bowls at the feet of our idols, and full of fire, so that it might become well- known how that mystic rite should be administered. A double representation of the same thing is brought to view. The first is of an infant (which means a neophyte Gnostic) be placed by Mete at the pedestal to this bowl; the other of a boy of this type standing over a flaming bowl.

In the same text he also talks about the concept of the two vessels that one can drink of after death, writing that there is "a double bowl [that] pertains to souls; the one part, oblivion , leading to generating (Greek, geneseos), the other part to Sophia , to wisdom. "

When one thinks of a bowl or a vessel containing wisdom, one obvious connection to make is with the image of the human head, the cup that holds the brain, the presumed organ of mind and, as Plato, Socrates, and later Descartes would have said, the "seat of the soul. " Talking about the vessel used in alchemy, Emma Jung wrote:

The "Liber quartorum, " a Latin translation of a Sabean text, emphasizes that the vessel is "like the work of God in the vessel of the divine seed

(germinis divi), for it has received the clay, moulded it, and mixed it with water and fire. " "This, " says [Carl] Jung, "is an allusion to the creation of man, but on the other hand it seems to refer to the creation of souls, since immediately afterwards the text speaks of the production of souls from the "seeds of heaven. " In order to catch the soul, God created the vas cerebi , the cranium. "

So if a person 's head is the cup or bowl that contains his mind, then could this Hermetic vessel, this cup of "universal mind, " be thought of as a giant "universal " head? Well actually, yes! In regards to this notion, the previously-mentioned work from Berossus (or from Alexander Polyhistor, supposedly quoting Berossus) contains a passage supposedly written by Oannes that is really worth reproducing here:

There was a time in which there existed nothing but darkness and an abyss of waters, wherein resided most hideous beings, which were produced of a two-fold principle. There appeared men, some of whom were furnished with two wings, others with four, and with two faces. They had one body, but two heads; the one that of a man, the other of a woman; and likewise in their several organs both male and female. Other human figures were to be seen with the legs and horns of a goat; some had horses ’ feet, while others united the hind quarters of a horse with the body of a man, resembling in shape the hippocentaurs. Bulls likewise were bred there with the heads of men; and dogs with fourfold bodies, terminated in their extremities with the tails of fishes; horses also with the heads of dogs; men, too, and other animals, with the heads and bodies of horses, and the tails of fishes. In short, there were creatures in which were combined the limbs of every species of animals. In addition to these, fishes, reptiles, serpents, with other monstrous animals, which assumed each other's shape and countenance. Of all which were preserved delineations in the temple of Belus at Babylon.

The person who presided over them was a woman named Omoroca, which in the Chaldean language is Thalatth , in Greek Thalassa , the sea; but which might equally be interpreted the moon. All things being in this situation, Belus came, and cut the woman asunder, and of one half of her he formed the earth, and of the other half the heavens, and at the same time destroyed the animals within her (or in the abyss).

All this was an allegorical description of nature. For, the whole universe consisting of moisture, and animals being continually generated therein, the deity above-mentioned took off his own head; upon which the other gods mixed the blood, as it gushed out, and from thence formed men. On this account it is that they are rational, and partake of divine knowledge. This Belus, by whom they signify Jupiter, divided the darkness, and separated the heavens from the earth, and reduced the universe to order. But the animals, not being able to bear the prevalence of light, died. Belus upon this, seeing a vast space unoccupied, though by nature fruitful, commanded one of the gods to take off his head, and to mix the blood with the earth, and from thence to form other men and animals, which should be capable of bearing the air. Belus formed also the stars, and the sun, and the moon, and the five planets.

It seems to us that in many instances in mythology from around the world, composite chimera beings and being with multiple faces are presented as a product of the undifferentiated chaos that preceded creation. The idea is that there were no natural laws preventing such monstrosities, and all possibilities existed in potentia simultaneously —thus, in complete confusion. The chimera later presented by Levi as a depiction of Baphomet, and many of the purported Templar idols given by Hammer-Purgstall in his book about Baphomet, shown as composite creatures, may be depicted thus to signify this concept of the chaos before creation. In the story given above, a hero creator god came and ripped that chaos apart, then imposed order on it to make creation —mixing the ingredients inside his own decapitated head! It was the intellect or mind within this head that provided the wisdom that brings reason and order to the universe. This may explain the Templar use of a severed head as a symbol of divine wisdom. The concept behind their Baphomet idol may have evolved ultimately from the same archetype. In the tenth discourse of The Corpus Hermeticum , entitled “The Key, ” Hermes says to his son Tat:

Since the cosmos is a sphere —a head, that is —and since there is nothing material above the head (just as there is nothing of mind below the feet, where all is matter), and since mind is a head which is moved spherically — in the manner of a head, that is —things joined to the membrane of this head ([in which] is the soul) are by nature immortal.

This head symbolism may even figure into one of the epithets of Hermes Trismegistus, “Poimandres ” (originally taken to be Greek in origin) thought derive from the late Egyptian peimentere , meaning “Mind of Re ” (the sun god), which could also mean the “head of Re. ” From the description above, it is as if we should view this primordial cosmic head as a ceremonial bowl as well, in which elements are mixed to create the brew of divine gnosis in which initiates seek to be baptized. It seems worth noting here that in some of their rituals, Freemasons drink out of ceremonial chalices made from (or made to look like) human skulls inverted. The symbolism seems appropriate for a Templar-derivative order, and now we know for sure what it means.

With these symbols—the bowl and the head —some of the seemingly divergent aspects of this secret doctrine of Gnosis come into clearer view. The head is the cup. The cup contains wisdom. He who is immersed in the wisdom of the cup dies to himself, and is reborn. The Baptism of Wisdom is not for the faint of heart. It is the wisdom of death. The head, especially as a skull, represents both wisdom and death. This cup or bowl, although it be a cup of chaos, of the Abyss that tears one ’s soul apart, is also overflowing with the greatest revelation of insight achievable by man—if you can stand to drink of it. When Jesus ’ disciples asked to be allowed to sit by him in Heaven, he asked them, in Mark 10:38 (KJV):

Ye know not what ye ask: can ye drink of the cup that I drink of? and be baptized with the baptism that I am baptized with?

On the central porch of the Notre Dame cathedral in Paris, there is a bas relief of a woman seated on a throne hitting a servant who is in front of her. In the cryptic alchemical book Mystery of the Cathedrals , Fulcanelli includes this image and labels it “The Queen Kicks Down Mercury, Servus Fugitivus, ” the latter being a Latin term which means “runaway slave ” (Strangely, in The Grail Legend , Emma Jung writes that alchemical mercury is symbolized by the cervus fugitivus , which she translates as “fugitive stag, ” referring to yet another animal that symbolizes wild sexuality, and which she links to the rites of Dionysus.) Elsewhere in the Fulcanelli text, he says that Mercury is here acting as the royal cupbearer, “who comes with a cup in his hand to offer her his services ” before being kicked away. This image of the Queen (probably Sophia) abusing her servant shows up in another noteworthy context.

In the Welsh story of Taliesin, called Hanes Taleisin , the witch Ceridwen has a cauldron full of “Awen, ” which Malcolm Godwin, in his book The Holy Grail: Its Origins, Secrets and Meaning Revealed , translates as “knowledge. ” It is more commonly translated as “poetic inspiration. ” Some of it splashes on the hero of the story, a little boy named Gwion, who was acting as her servant. He is suddenly able to transform himself into whatever form he wishes. (Actually, he was quite lucky, because only three drops splashed on him, and it was only the first three drops of the potion that conferred inspiration, while one drop more would have been deadly poison.) The witch, angry at him, ends up swallowing him (in the form of a piece of grain), but nine months later he is born from her body, having become a new man, the poet Taliesin. After being tossed in the ocean in a leather bag by the witch, he is later rescued, and begins his career as a bard whose compositions work magic on those around him. In one of his poems, he brags of having been alive throughout the ages in a number of religiously and mythologically significant situations, including: hanging on the cross with Jesus; “at the building of the Tower of Nimrod ” (a.k.a. the Tower of Babel); “supporting ” the baby Moses as he floated on the river (here changed from the Nile to the Jordan); and, most importantly, playing the role of “Johannes the Diviner. ”

Now you might think this is a reference to St. John the Divine, a title given to the author of The Revelation of St. John . This person was originally claimed by the Church to be John the Evangelist, the apostle of Jesus who they purported was the author of The Gospel of John . However, it is now generally acknowledged that these two books have different authors. Also, as we mentioned previously, some, like Tobias Churton, have suggested that this Gospel was actually written by (or more likely, from the projected perspective of) John the Baptist. As a prophet, the term “Diviner ” certainly fits for the Baptist just as well as for the other John. The Taliesin poem seems to indicate that the poet is identifying himself with the Baptist. But he also clearly seems to be playing the role of Mercury, and the witch who gives birth to his new form is undoubtedly another representation of Sophia, the antagonistic goddess of wisdom and inspiration.

Another thing Taliesin brags about in the poem is being in the “Cair Sidin. ” According to Robert Graves in The White Goddess , this is a reference to something called the “Chair of Idris ”:

There is a stone seat at the top of Cader Idris, the “Chair of Idris ” where, according to the local legend, whoever spends the night is found in the morning either dead, mad, or a poet.

Again, you may be thinking that this Idris is the Muslim prophet, their Hermes and Enoch, and wonder why a Welsh legend is talking about him (although that Idris is, rightly, associated with poetic inspiration). However, in Wales Idris Gawr is actually the name of a legendary giant of whom many tales are told. This seat of his is where, supposedly, he would sit at night studying the stars—another possible connection to Hermes, the purported inventor of astrology. Elsewhere in the book, Graves says that the cauldron of Awen that the witch Ceridwen brewed in the Taliesin story— “for a year and a day, ” according to the recipe —was located near this seat as well. The length of cooking time for liquid inspiration in the recipe seems like another connection between the hero of this story and Hermes, because as we have discussed, Enoch (the biblical Hermes) was said to have lived 365 years, and written 366 books. (The Gnostic figure of Abraxas, the subject of the next chapter, is also associated with the number 365.)

There is another Welsh myth, connected to the Holy Grail cycle, which seems to toy with the symbolism of John the Baptist. The story of Peredur, upon whom Parzival of the Grail legend is based, can be found in The Mabinogian , the earliest collection of British prose literature (compiled in the twelfth to thirteenth centuries from oral traditions). In this tale, the main character attends a banquet at his uncle ’s castle in which a bloody sword and a bloody head on a charger are brought through the room by servants, but the host continues to talk, even as the rest of the guests express dismay at the sight. Peredur, however, is too shy to say anything about it, and later it is revealed that if he had asked what the bloody head and sword were all about, he would have immediately accomplished his mission in the story, which was to lift the enchantment of barrenness and waste that had come upon the land. Instead he is cursed with more trials in his quest. In later Grail stories, a similar scene of a banquet at the castle of the Fisher King (Parzival ’s uncle) takes place, called the “Grail Service, ” and he is similarly punished for not asking him uncle the question of what has been bothering him lately (in this case, a stab wound in the genitals that won ’t heal).

Hammer-Purgstall certainly seems to have felt that the Holy Grail story was an allegory about the Templar Baphomet and the Hermetic concept of baptism in the bowl of Mind, along with the idea of eucharistically absorbing its contents. He wrote:

There remains no doubt that the most celebrated bowl of the Middle Ages, under the name of St. Graal, signifies nothing but a symbol of the Templar community and of Gnostic wisdom… .

One of the alleged Templar artifacts that he catalogued included a bowl on which the letters “R ” and “L ” are written. There was also a vase with two heads on its base, like the Roman Janus (and like some of the Baphomet head idols of the Templars were said to be), which featured the letter “G. ” Hammer- Purgstall said he believed G stood for Gnosis, but also that it should be taken along with the R and L on the other vessel, so that together they indicated the German word “Graal ”: the Grail. He conjectured that the word could be an acrostic code:

Thus, GRAL could signify: Gnosis Regit Animas Liberas [Gnosis Rules Free Souls]; or Gnosis Regina Artium Liberalium [Gnosis Queen of Liberal Arts]; or Gnosis Retribuit Animi Laborum [Gnosis Requites Labor of the Soul]; or, finally, what perhaps is most similar and most in agreement with Gnostic doctrine, Gnosis Reducit Animam Lapsam [Gnosis Brings Back the Lapsed Soul]; or Redintegrat Animum Lapsum [Restores the Lapsed Soul].

Elsewhere he also says:

It ought to be understood that, under the custody of St. Graal, those brothers of the militia [the Templars], as custodians of the Gnostic chalice, were initiated into the gnostic mystery of iniquity.

What could this iniquity be if not the obscene rites that both the Templars and the Gnostic cults were accused of engaging in? As we mentioned before, Hammer-Purgstall called this “genital wisdom, ” a term which he claimed he found encoded on the artifacts both in Greek (zoogogon sophian) and in Arabic (ma-ta na-sha). Comparing these rites not only to the “sacred marriage ” and Eucharistic rituals of the Ophites, but also the Bacchanalia, he wrote:

These are the ceremonies of that mystical sacrament and of the abominable orgies of which the Gnostics are accused by the Fathers, which, with the lights dimmed, with promiscuous ugliness they celebrated sometimes under the name of a meal, other times under the name of marriage. These orgies are manifestly portrayed in all three of our bowls there used, so that it might be clear to the onlooker what these orgies are, and to what Gnostic sect these bowls, with the same inscriptions as the abovementioned idols, belonged. For the first bowl contained, in a double circle, a double representation of the orgies, the inferior [circle] baccanalium , where Liber [“the Free One, ” a version of Bacchus] is observed, in triumph borne by Satyrs and Maenads (female votaries of Bacchus)… .

It is on this bowl that the snake-kissing orgy is represented, which image Hammer-Purgstall admitted to altering “for decency, ” omitting several erect phalluses on the participants. Regarding the snakes, he believed that they represented the demon Samael as an incarnation of the Nous or Gnosis. Serpents were connected to Dionysian rites as well. As Hammer-Purgstall wrote:

It is well known to everyone that in all the ancient mysteries of Ceres and Liber, both the Elysian as well as the Bacchic, the serpent played the main parts. Hence, through the same serpent the connection to be discovered with great difficulty between the Ophitic and Bacchic orgies will be illustrated by evidence. We learn, indeed, from Clement of Alexandria that a notable likeness of the Bacchic orgies was the serpent, consecrated by the arcane rite.

In addition to the overt depiction of the phallus (which he omitted), Hammer-Purgstall claimed that the same symbolism of “genital wisdom ” was represented by the mystical symbol of the Tau, or the letter T, which he also found used frequently on the artifacts. He stated:

The serpent and phallus which are handed around in the Bacchic orgies we encounter also in those of the Ophites, where the T which Achamoth holds in her hands, and is impressed on her forehead, we discern on the bowl, as if upholding the tree of life serpent, that is, genital wisdom. [This] retained a double signification (which it already had among the Egyptians), of a Phallus and a key, and was called, among the Ophites tree of life and key of Gnosis.

… Therefore, we see it elevated in orgies in imitation of the elevation of the Phallus in Bacchic orgies and a figure of the same not only put into the hand of Mother Achamoth, or Mete, but also impressed on her forehead, by which figure is indicated the character of life, which are noted the foreheads of the elect (see in Apocalypse 7, verse 3). This T is, therefore, the character of Baphomet and thus, a part for the whole, signified the instrument of life and life-begetting wisdom.

Hammer-Purgstall censored the phalluses on several other images to. Another artifact that Hammer-Purgstall presents, which we mentioned before, and which he also describes as depicting an “Ophitic orgy, ” shows two pots shaped like wombs (and also much like alchemical vessels) placed on either side of a goose-human hybrid creature that ’s seated on an eagle. From one vessel emerges a baby, while, according to Hammer-Purgstall ’s description, there was a phallus coming out of the other vessel, which, in his line drawing reproduction, has been smudged out. Other obscene pictures, he says, have been, in many cases, obliterated by priests and nuns at the churches they were found in, out of embarrassment.

But what he and the clergy weren ’t willing to show us is not nearly as bad as what he says that the images imply. The number of images and words in these artifacts that Hammer-Purgstall claims represent bestiality and pederasty is rather shocking. For instance, one of the statues of Mete that he found included an engraving that said, in Arabic: “… He ordered the camel to lie down on its knees, ” which, according to his interpretation, “would signify to do the most disgusting things. ”

This evidence of sexual interest in animals on the part of the Templars may hint that the famous osculum inflame which they confessed to conducting during their initiation rites (involving kissing the anus of a goat), may have been more that just a hazing prank. It may have been foreplay for what came later, which the tortured knights could have chosen to overlook in their testimony (having already said enough to be convicted of both blasphemy and indecency). This kissing rite is implied in one of the images said to come from the same coffer that features the figure seated on an eagle with a goose on his head, discussed above. Strangely this particular picture featuring the obscene kiss is not included in Hammer-Purgstall ’s book, but Thomas Smith, writing about Hammer-Purgstall ’s research, includes it in Worship of the Generative Powers . Smith also seems to have known many other details in the pictures also mentioned but not reproduced by Hammer-Purgstall, so that we may presume that Smith made his own independent trip to the museum where it was once kept. At any rate, the picture in question shows a statue of a horned entity with both breasts and testicles, which is being kissed by an initiate on the rear, while other participants baptize him with water pots held aloft.

According to Hammer-Purgstall, the eagle is Ialdabaoth, the Gnostic Demiurge, and this is showing him being subdued, just like another image he features in his book, of a male toddler riding an eagle. But we think it is possible, considering that the Templar rites allegedly involved sex with children, that it could be interpreted as a standard icon of Zeus in the form of an eagle carrying away his boy sex slave, Ganymede, who also happened to be his nephew. Ganymede is presently a mascot for homosexual “boylovers ” who openly proclaim their attraction to male children. Perhaps it meant something similar to the Templars as well.

Regarding another drawing of a statue included in his collection of images, Hammer-Purgstall described it thusly:

You see such a dog at the rear of a genuflecting idol … in which we recognize nothing other than a Gnostic or Templar, who by means of a dog adhering to the posterior parts, indicates nothing other than the most disgusting outrage of the Templars.

Elsewhere, describing a collection of Templar coins that Hammer-Purgstall had identified, he discussed the depiction of “the cross, as a sign of life, arising out of a dog ’s head, ” saying that it “alludes to the well-known predilection for the dog. ” He also says that this is something which goes back to the Gnostics, noting that heresiologist Epiphanius “indicated why dogs are held in the greatest veneration among the Ophites. ”

In another image, engraved in bronze high up on the walls of a church in Schoengraber, Austria (too high for most people to see it), he found a picture of Adam, Eve and the Devil in the Garden next to the forbidden tree, where:

Eve was not veiled, as modesty would demand, but by her own hand was thoroughly laid bare and, in addition to the serpent, also a dog assaulted her.

This was Eve ’s introduction to “Gnosis, that is, carnal knowledge, ” which, we assume, is the same as “genital wisdom. ” This peculiar term was probably related, at least in Hammer-Purgstall ’s mind, to his interpretation of the Ophite concept of Gnostic enlightenment:

The Ophites, though, by no means tending toward moral perfection, thought that the highest peak of all science [knowledge] is to be placed in carnal cognition, and under the term enlightenment, [included] nothing other than coitus and promiscuous shameful desire.

Another term that Hammer-Purgstall claimed the Templars coined for the same concept was “distinguished charity of Mete, ” which he said stood for “nothing other than paiderastian [Greek for ‘pederasty ’]. ” He claimed to have found, in a former Templar church in Prague, an image of a knight trying to uphold two collapsing columns, below which were engraved the words “the distinguished charity of Mete uproots the enemy. ” He also claimed that their specific symbol for this was the flaming star, now used by Freemasons. Elsewhere in the text, Hammer-Purgstall gives further reasoning behind this concept:

That arcane doctrines and paiderastias common among them are to be excused, various dogmas and imaginings of the ancients seem to suggest. There were two opinions especially that they twisted in defense of their shameful indecencies; the socratic one, “know yourself, ” and the prior, Epicurean one, “respect God. ” That first one [know yourself], since by “cognition ” they understood nothing but the carnal, was to their shame. The other one [respect God] they interpreted so as to teach that by means of the moistening with seminal luminescence they themselves became gods. Above we have seen what, formerly, Plotinus objected to regarding the Gnostics always bearing in their mouths, “respect God. ” Here it must be added also that the Templars, as Gnostics, held themselves to be gods.

In another picture in the Schoengraber church, images of pedophilia and bestiality are combined:

At the first station is discerned a boy, a future Ophite or Gnostic Templar, immodestly fondling a bear, an animal … addicted to this vice … to prevent which and to claim the nursling for himself, the Templar charges forward with a lance in order to pierce the bear through and to lead the infant over to his own enticements, at which the abovementioned dog not obscurely hints. On the other hand, the boy, now having become an adolescent, resists the girl ’s flatteries, whom she tried to entice by offering to him flowers… . The Freemasonic ornaments about this station agree very well with the Bacchic sense of the same for, composed from grape clusters and vine foliage, with phalluses intermixed (placed so high up that from the lower part they are difficult to discern)… .

Note that, in Hammer-Purgstall ’s interpretation, these pictures show a boy being corrupted sexually from infancy onward so that later in adolescence he has no interest in normal sexual activity with a female, i.e. actual procreative sex. This supports the idea that Gnostic orgies involved the redirection of energy normally put towards reproduction, since they believed that giving birth was just trapping more souls into the archontic prison of matter. We will discuss this more in depth later.

Recall also what Morton Smith said, mentioned earlier, in his book Jesus the Magician regarding the animal forms used to represent demons. He stated that images or descriptions of sex between humans and animals were often used to represent the idea of people possessed by demons. Keep in mind that with the exception of the ass, all of the animals forms (goat, lion, dragon eagle, bear, dog, and ass) used to represent the Archons in the Ophite diagrams, as described by Origen and Celsus, are seen here among Hammer-Purgstall 's collection. So perhaps these pictures were meant to show the demonic possession of the Templars (or whoever actually created them). However, we do not deny that rituals to facilitate such possession could involve actual sex with animals also.

While we may find it hard to believe that grown men of respectable positions (such as the Templars always were) would convince themselves that sexual abuse of children and animals was somehow spiritually enlightening, we should keep in mind that this could also be yet another veneer, with a more practical agenda behind it. In our own time, our politics is occasionally rocked with scandals of child sex abuse by the rich and powerful. This usually involves so- called “pedophile rings ” that are quite secret and exclusive, making use of child prostitutes that have been obtained from orphanages. Photos are taken at their meetings for the purpose of establishing the ever-present threat of blackmail, and mutually-assured destruction should any members of the abuse ring be tempted to give information to the authorities about what they have been involved in. This ties the participants together in a bond of evil, which is used for the coalescence of power into the hands of a small cabal. On more than one occasion it has come out that these rings were actually being orchestrated by the intelligence services, acting on orders of some group within the government that was using it to control other powerful people. According to Hammer-Purgstall, something similar may have been going on with the Templars:

It remains for us to comment on yet another expansion, or rather subversion, of the Delphic dictum. They substituted in place of that golden sentence, “Know yourself, ” the crafty, “know all, but let no one know you. ” On this truly Machiavellian principle rests their whole politic, which up to now they try to sustain by the gospel precept, “Be wise as serpents. ” To this depraved wisdom they connect unrestrained conduct, so that, “Pursue all, and all is permitted, ” they seem to have proposed as the highest branch of wisdom. That this goal of the moral, or better, immoral, Gnostic-Ophitic doctrine is precisely the same as what has been placed before true initiates at the ultimate doctrinal grade of the Assassins and of the Ishmaelites, we see in the words, “Nothing to be believed, and, everything is permissible. ” To what deeds exceedingly shameful this goal of the Gnostic-Ophite doctrine precipitates its followers, once all types of evil desires have been poured out … is clear enough. Certainly nothing either great or good was ever to be expected from the followers of this doctrine, unless men endowed with a higher political genius, the doctrine having been subjected to their ambition, used it as an instrument for attaining the highest goal of [their] ambition. Such persons, already destined by nature as leaders, sought the highest goal of their labors not in satisfying desires, but in conducting state affairs. Finally, people eagerly followed this doctrine because, once a person wickedly indulges every sensual craving, it renders his associates more inclined to all types of illicit activities.

The quotation, “Nothing to be believed, and, everything is permissible ” (More commonly translated “Nothing is true, everything is permitted ”) was a proclamation made by the aforementioned Assassin chief Hassan-i-Sabbah. The Assassins were a secret Islamic fighting order that operated contemporary to the Templars and fought against them on the battlefield. The two orders are often compared because of their rigorous training, their suicidal approach to battle, and the accusations both orders faced of having a secret inner doctrine of blasphemy. For the Assassins (with whom the Templars have been accused by some historians of having a friendly relationship behind the scenes), it really wasn ’t all that secret.

The doctrine of the Nizari Ismailis (the Islamic sect which the Assassins belonged to) was developed with the help of Hassan-i-Sabbah around 1095, just four years prior to the earliest date given for the founding of the Templars. According to James Wasserman, author of The Templars and the Assassins (2001), Hassan was “reputed to be deeply versed in mathematics, astronomy, magic, and alchemy. ” Beginning with him, the Assassins were accused, by both Western chroniclers and their Sunni foes within Islam, of, as Wasserman states:

… drug taking and licentious sexual orgies. Unlimited powers of mind control were ascribed to Assassin leaders… . Nizari leaders were said to follow no law but their own and to be willing to stoop to any depth, including witchcraft, to mislead their flock. The Sunni establishment accused them of plotting to undermine Islamic law and renew the ancient pagan faith of Persia.

Hassan-i-Sabbah ’s successor was Hassan II, who on August 8, 1164, proclaimed something called Qiyama (the resurrection of the dead). He was asserting that the last days had come, and that those who accepted his new teaching were to go to Paradise right away. Those who did not would go to Hell. He then explained this new teaching, which Wasserman described thusly:

While holding aloft his sword, he is reported to have announced that the Hidden Imam [the prophet whom Shia Muslims believe will herald the last days] had proclaimed a New Dispensation and freed his faithful from the Shariah practices of Islam… . At the conclusion of this breathtaking speech, he descended from the pulpit, and held a banquet, stating that Ramadan [which they were in the midst of] was at its end. This supreme act of blasphemy was reportedly accompanied by wine-drinking, pork- eating, and sensual indulgences.

… The holy practices prescribed by Muhammed as Shariah were merely outward symbols of inward spiritual truths. Outward symbols were now profanations of inner truth… . One no longer prostrated oneself and prayed to Allah five times per day… .

Those Nizaris who persisted in the traditional practices of Islam and refused to follow the New Dispensation were chastised, stoned, and killed as blasphemers—exactly as those who had previously been found guilty of breaking the Shariah were treated.

A few years later, in 1175, Burchard of Strassbourg, Frederick Barbarossa ’s envoy to Egypt and Syria, described the Assassins, as paraphrased by Wasserman, as “men who lived without law, ate pig ’s flesh, shared their women, and practiced incest with their mothers and sisters. ”

We cannot be sure what secret beliefs lay behind Hassan II ’s bizarre proclamation, whether the “Twelfth Imam ” really talked to him, and if so how. Was it in the form of a severed head, which, as we have discussed before, the Assassins made use of for divination, or at least pretended to? Nor do we know if these secrets were ever communicated to the Templars, whether through secret cooperation with them, or through information obtained from spying. But it does seem to go along with the “everything is permitted ” creed of his predecessor. We don ’t know how much either of the Hasans were influenced by Gnosticism directly, but they were both students of Hermeticism and Neoplatonism, so they would have at least been exposed indirectly. While much of Hermetic thought seems compatible with monotheism and Mosaic law, other strains (even some seen in The Corpus Hermeticum itself) seem to be informed more by what we might call the “anti-creation ” attitude of some Gnostics. At times this attitude manifests in something akin to the modern philosophy of Nihilism, as Hans Jonas has observed in his book The Gnostic Religion .

Dread as the soul ’s response to its being-in-the-world is a recurrent theme in gnostic literature. It is the self ’s reaction to the discovery of its situation… . Knowledge, gnosis, may liberate man from his servitude; but since the cosmos is contrary to life and to spirit, the saving knowledge cannot aim at integration into the cosmic whole and at compliance with its laws… . For the Gnostics, on the contrary, man ’s alienation from the world is to be deepened and brought to a head, for the extrication of the inner self which only thus can gain itself. The world (not the alienation from it) must be overcome… .

Viewing creation as a prison for the soul made by the evil Demiurge, and equating that entity with the God of the Bible. Some Gnostics had codes of behavior and rituals that were meant to reverse the “natural order. ” Just as all religious ritual is based at least somewhat on the primitive notion of sympathetic magic—that by acting out a certain thing, you will affect the larger world in an analogous way —the belief would have been that, by doing these acts of natural reversal (amounting also to the reversal of all considered holy), one might harm the creator, reduce his power, or even bring the corrupt world closer to a dissolution that they must have welcomed.

In Matthew 11:12 (KJV) Jesus states that “… [F]rom the days of John the Baptist until now the kingdom of heaven suffereth violence, and the violent take it by force. ” This has been taken by some to mean that, during that time, in which the advent of the messiah and the End of Days was believed by many to be near, there were those who thought that, by consciously bringing about the conditions foretold by prophets at the End Times, they could force God to initiate this process and bring the kingdom of Heaven to Earth sooner. This is the reasoning behind the firm that today is breeding red cows to be sacrificed in the Jewish temple once it is rebuilt, as the birth of such a heifer, to be used as an offering in the new temple, has been foretold. As Robert Eisler explained in his book Orpheus the Fisher (1920):

This much debated saying presupposes the Jewish conviction that men could accelerate the coming of the Kingdom and even force it down immediately by certain actions, either of obedience or of disobedience to the commandments of God… That such an apparent violation of the Divine plan of Providence was not always considered as sinful, “hybris, ” may be seen from the repeated saying in the Talmud, that God “loves to be conquered by a sinner through repentance. ”

One must wonder what sort of acts of “disobedience ” would be considered useful in this regard. But, it seems, a ritual with exactly that intent may have been depicted in the supposedly Templar artifacts discovered by Joseph von Hammer-Purgstall.

During Templar times and afterwards there were, in certain pockets throughout Western Europe, several religious groups that seemed to be influenced by the Gnostics, and which seem to bleed into each other at times, their membership not being mutually exclusive. These include the Waldensians, the Patarini, the Bogomils, and the Cathars, the latter having actually earned their own military Crusade from the Church aimed against them (to which their last fortress of Montsegur in the Languedoc region of Southern France finally fell in 1244). They were charged by the Church with “unnatural sexual practices, ” which seemed to involve abortions and non-procreative sex (to prevent the incarnation of souls), despite the fact that St. Bernard of Clairvaux, the man who chartered the Knights Templar, had said of them, “No sermons are more Christian than theirs, and their morals are pure. ”

“The Pure Ones ” was in fact the meaning of their name. It may have been that, just like the creed of the Assassins ’ “New Dispensation, ” they believed that they were inherently “pure ” to the extent that nothing which they did could defile them. In fact, indulging debaucheries in the form of a ritual may have, in their minds, sanctified a sin that they viewed as an otherwise unavoidable fact of carnal existence. Dr. Iwan Bloch, in his biography of the Marquis de Sade, mentions these groups as an outgrowth of the Persian Gnostic movement of Manichaeism, and indeed, of Satanism, stating:

The real “Satan ’s Church ” was founded by the Manichees in southern France… . The secret societies of “Perfect Beings ” formed everywhere, serving exclusively the most obscene sexual vices… . In spite of the persecution of the church the sect and its motto persevered: “Nemo potest peccare ab umbilico et inferius ” [“No one can not sin, from the navel and below ”]; it found continual support from “unsatisfied ” priests. Sins slay sins! That was the great principle of their sexual orgies. The priest sanctifies all women who sin with him. The nuns are “consecrated, ” i.e. they become the mistresses of the priests.

The same attitude was expressed by Severus, founder of a Gnostic group (the Severians) that was part of a larger Christian sect called the Encratites who abstained from marriage. In the book Gnosticism: Its History and Influence , author Benjamin Walker explains:

According to Severus, a disciple of Marcion, man is divine from the navel up, and the creature of the devil from the navel down.

Women, meanwhile, were evil and entirely the product of Satan.

The descriptions of many of these groups ’ secret rites are quite clearly similar to what the Templars were accused of. For instance, in some of their confessions, Templar knights told of worshipping Baphomet in the form of a black cat, and kissing its anus instead of that of a goat. Likewise, according to Walter Mapes, as quoted by Thomas Wright, speaking of the Patarini of Milan:

Some apostates from this heresy, he tells us, had related that, at the first watch of night, they met in their synagogues, closed carefully the doors and windows, and waited in silence, until a black cat of extraordinary bigness descended among them by a rope, and that, as soon as they saw this strange animal, they put out the lights, and muttering through their teeth instead of singing their hymns, felt their way to this object of worship, and kissed it, according to their feelings of humility or pride, some on the feet, some under the tail, and others on the genitals, after which each seized upon the nearest person of a different sex, and had carnal intercourse as long as he was able.

This connection with the figure of the cat is explored further by Wright, who conjectures that the Cathars were actually named after the animal. Noting that “the name of the … sect is often spelt Gazai, Gazeri, Gacari, and Chazari, ” he relates:

It was suggested by Henschenius that this name was derived from the German Katze or Ketze , a cat, in allusion to the common report that they assembled at night like cats, or ghosts; or that the cat may have been an allusion to the belief that in their secret meetings they worshipped that animal.

A Cathar group in Germany called the Stedingers were accused of worshipping the Devil in the form of a cat by Pope Gregory IX himself in the famous bull Vox in Rama of 1232. It is believed that this papal pronouncement led to the widespread bloody persecution of black cats throughout Christian Europe as “incarnations of Satan. ” Some even claim that this led to a proliferation of rats and thus, outbreaks of plague. Thomas Wright, paraphrasing the bull, gives us the juicy details:

As the novice proceeded, he encountered a man who was extraordinarily pale, with large black eyes, and whose body was so wasted that his flesh seemed to be all gone, leaving nothing but the skin hanging on his bones. The novice kissed this personage, and found him as cold as ice; and after this all traces of the Catholic faith vanished from his heart. Then they all sat down to a banquet; and when this was over, there stepped out of a statue which stood in their place of meeting, a black cat, as large as a moderate sized dog, which advanced backwards to them, with its tail turned up. The novice first, then the master, and then all the others, in their turns, kissed the cat under the tail, and then returned to their places, where they remained in silence, with their heads inclined towards the cat. Then the master suddenly pronounced the words “Spare us! ” which he addressed to the next in order; and the third answered, “We know it, lord; ” and a fourth added, “We ought to obey. ” At the close of this ceremony the lights were extinguished, and each man took the first woman who came to hand, and had carnal intercourse with her. When this was over, the candles were again lighted, and the performers resumed their places. Then out of a dark corner of the room came a man, the upper part of whom, above the loins, was bright and radiant as the sun, and illuminated the whole room, while his lower parts were rough and hairy like a cat. The master then tore off a bit of the garment of the novice, and said to the shining personage, “Master, this is given to me, and I give it again to thee. ” The master replied, “Thou hast served me well, and thou wilt serve me more and better; what thou hast given me I give unto thy keeping. ” When he had said this, the shining man vanished, and the meeting broke up.

The descriptions of these allegedly “Gnostic ” heretical groups sound identical not only to the supposed secret practices of the Templars, but also to the rites of the Black Mass, and the Sabbath celebrated by European witches, as described by them, usually while under trial from Christians. The main difference between the Witches ’ Sabbath and the Black Mass is that the Sabbath is a satanic rite in homage to the Devil, whereas the Black Mass is a Christian rite performed for evil purposes. Witch Sabbaths were sometimes, but not always, done with the help of an ordained Catholic priest. But Black Masses were, by definition, always performed by a real Catholic priest. Although the descriptions of the sabbaths were extracted under duress, sometimes torture, and may be considered untrustworthy because the trials were part of a campaign of persecution against certain groups of non-Christians, the Church would seemingly have no reason to accuse its own priests of performing such blasphemous rites, unless it were undeniably true. Yet the fact remains that throughout history, more than a few respected priests have confessed to performing the Black Mass, including the sacrifice of children.

The Black Mass is specifically a mockery and parody of the Catholic mass. It is meant to be officiated by an ordained priest, so that the Real Presence of the Holy Spirit can be called into the host wafer, and then defiled. Traditionally, everything in such a rite is done backwards. The priest has his back to the altar, the cross is turned upside-down, the Lord ’s Prayer is read backwards, and the meaning of everything is inverted. The altar is supposed to be formed by the naked body of a female, and the Holy Host is to be humiliated by being placed inside of her nether regions. Instead of wine, the blood of unbaptized babies sacrificed on the fleshy altar was consumed.

The history of the Black Mass begins with the case of Catherine de Medici, queen consort of King Henry II of France from 1547 to 1559. She was born into an influential noble family that had provided the world with two Popes and numerous noble figures. They had a tremendous influence upon the spread of Humanist philosophy, art and science throughout Renaissance Europe. But they were also known for being dabblers in the occult.

Catherine de Medici ’s sons were heir to the throne, and she herself was appointed regent for a time. According to French political writer Jean Bodin, Catherine attempted to prolong the life of her son Philip, who was dying of a wasting disease, by employing a priest to perform black masses involving the murder of young boys. Catherine is known to have worn a magical amulet featuring the sigil of the demon Asmodeus. Another son of hers, Henry III, continued her interest in the Dark Arts, and had an altar in his home that featured cloven-hoofed devils bearing their backsides to the Cross. Catherine de Medici was never convicted of child murder, blasphemy or witchcraft, and in fact, these stories about her are rarely mentioned by modern historians, although they were widely believed at the time.

But in the famous case of the Abbe Guiborg and Catherine Deshayes (La Voison), mistress to King Louis XIV, the perpetrators were actually brought to justice. The mistress hired the Abbe to perform hundreds of black masses in which the demon Asmodeus was invoked and children were sacrificed. La Voison herself acted as the naked female altar in these ceremonies, and after the child was slain, the blood would be poured into the ceremonial chalice. The host would be inserted into La Voison ’s vagina during consecration, instead of the traditional “Tabernacle. ” Afterwards, the Abbe and La Voison would engage in sex acts and then the fluids would be mixed in with the blood and the foully consecrated host. This mixture was then surreptitiously added to the King ’s food, the purpose being to cause him to continue to love La Voison to the exclusion of all others, including his wife. This is all according to both Deshayes and Guiborg ’s confessions at the trial, and the documentary evidence, in the form of signed demonic pacts between La Voison and Asmodeus, which were entered as evidence in the trial. That a consecrated wafer could be used for black magic of this sort is a common theme in European occultism.

The similarities between these rites and the so-called Witches ’ Sabbath, at which the goat god was himself said to be present, becomes quote obvious once you read the descriptions of them. As Thomas Wright put it:

In order to “mix impiety with the other abominations, ” they pretended to perform religious rites, which were a wild and contemptuous parody on the Catholic mass. An altar was raised, and a priest consecrated and administered the host, but it was made of some disgusting substance, and the priest stood with his head downwards and his legs in the air, and with his back turned to the altar. Thus all things were performed in monstrous or disgusting forms, so that Satan himself appeared almost ashamed of them.

At the Sabbath, attendees were expected to kiss the goat god. But only the chosen ones were permitted to kiss him on the face. The rest had to perform the humiliating osculum infame , placing their lips on his second face, which was beneath his tail. Sexual debaucheries ensued, including the painful rape of young girls by the goat god with his enormous penis. As Wright said:

The young witch, Jeannette d ’Abadie, told how she had seen at the Sabbath men and women in promiscuous intercourse, and how the devil arranged them in couples, in the most unnatural conjunctions —the daughter with the father, the mother with her son, the sister with the brother, the daughter- in-law with the father-in-law, the penitent with her confessor, without distinction of age, quality, or relationship, so that she confessed to having been known an infinity of times at the Sabbath by a cousin ... of her mother, and by an infinite number of others... . This girl said that she had been deflowered by the devil at the age of thirteen —twelve was the common age for this —that they never became pregnant, either by him or by any of the wizards of the Sabbath; that she had never felt anything come from the devil except the first time, when it was very cold, but that with the sorcerers it was as with other men. That the devil chose the handsomest of the women and girls for himself, and one he usually made his queen for the meeting. That they suffered extremely when he had intercourse with them, in consequence of his member being covered with scales like those of a fish. That when extended it was a yard long, but that it was usually twisted. Marie d ’Aspilcuette, a girl between nineteen and twenty years of age, who also confessed to having had frequent connection with Satan, described his member as about half a yard long, and moderately large. Marguerite, a girl of Sare, between sixteen and seventeen, described it as resembling that of a mule, and as being as long and thick as one ’s arm… . The devil, we are further told, preferred married women to girls, because there was more sin in the connection, adultery being a greater crime than simple fornication.

Despite the pain and humiliation, the witches loved being raped by the goat god, and he always left them wanting more. To quote from Wright again:

Some of the witches examined spoke of the delight with which they attended the Sabbath. Jeanne Dibasson, a woman twenty-nine years old, said that the Sabbath was the true Paradise, where there was far more pleasure than can be expressed; that those who went there found the time so short by reason of the pleasure and enjoyment, that they never left it without marvelous regret, so that they looked forward with infinite impatience to the next meeting.

Another relevant detail is that witches at the Sabbath were made to pass through a fire that did not burn them. This was meant to teach them not to be afraid of the fires of Hell which they would be going to at the end of their mortal life. So again, they were taught to have an abnormal and unnatural reaction to something that would cause a normal person unbearable pain.

This brings us to the notion of “storming heaven, ” and the idea that performing certain rites, either in direct obedience, or direct disobedience , to the word of God, could actually force him to do something—even something destructive, even the destruction of the entire world. A perfect example of this was described in anthropologist Sir James Frazer ’s classic ritual reference book The Golden Bough , which explored primitive concepts of magic and religion throughout the world. He wrote:

French peasants used to be, perhaps are still, persuaded that the priests could celebrate, with certain special rites, a Mass of the Holy Spirit, of which the efficacy was so miraculous that it never met with any opposition from the divine will; God was forced to grant whatever was asked of Him in this form, however rash and importunate might be the petition … in some villages, when a change of pastors takes place, the parishioners are eager to learn whether the new incumbent has the power (pouder), as they call it.

The belief that the Holy Spirit can be drawn down from Heaven into a wafer is really not so different from the ancient idea (expressed repeatedly in The Book of Nabathean Agriculture) that one can draw down the essences of stars and planets into objects and substances such as plants, potions, and metals. The book refers to this as “star-bathing, ” and it really is the basic concept behind natal astrology. The essences of the heavenly bodies, as they were arranged on the nativity of a person or thing, purportedly stain that person or thing forever —a tincturing baptism.

In alchemy, there is talk of something called the “Bath of the Stars, ” and it seems to be an allegory for ritually bathing the metals to be transmuted in these stellar essences. The allegorical drawings of this, however —which usually feature a king and a queen, or an anthropomorphized sun and moon, bathing naked in a fountain—also seem to indicate that the bath is filled with the blood of their own “children. ” These are the other planets, viewed in this system as the offspring of the sun and moon. These pictures are often coupled with another image, usually labeled “the Massacre of the Innocents, ” as can be seen in Nicolas Flamel ’s The Book of Abraham the Jew and in Fulcanelli ’s The Mystery of the Cathedrals . This shows babes being slaughtered and the blood collected in barrels, presumably for the bathing of the king and queen. While there are numerous ways of interpreting these metaphors, alchemy is certainly a science of death and rebirth, of substances, and of souls. Tracy R. Twyman has pointed out in her books that this imagery is connected to the ancient idea that drinking and bathing in the blood of children can help retain youth, or even resuscitate the dead.

There is another way to interpret this also. The notion of drawing down heavenly things into earthly things seems like an aptly Hermetic way of bringing Heaven down by force — another way of looking at the notion of “storming Heaven, ” to make the “below ” like the “above. ” In Sefer Hekhalot , also known as The Third Book of Enoch , it tells the story of the fallen angels that bred giants with human women, and it says that they taught their hybrid children the abominations of ritual magic. One particular passage is worth quoting:

They brought down the sun, the moon, planets and constellations, and placed them before the idols on their right hand and on their left. How was it that they had the strength to bring them down? It was only because Uzza, Azza and Azael taught them sorceries that they brought them down, for otherwise they would not have been able to bring them down.

Interestingly, in Christopher Marlowe ’s Doctor Faustus , this is one of the things that the title character asks the demon Mephistopheles to be ready to do for him:

I charge thee wait upon me whilst I live

To do whatever Faustus shall command,

Be it to make the moon drop from her sphere

Or the ocean to overwhelm the world.

Let us remember that Azazel, the goat demon who taught men to bring down the heavens, is also said to be the “Groomsman ” for the demons Lilith and Samael, responsible for facilitating their sexual union. At the Witches ’ Sabbath, the goat god was sometimes also called the “Groomsman, ” and arranged the sex partners who were to perform at that night ’s festivities. We have already theorized here that the people at these orgies may have been channeling Lilith and Samael, thus acting as vessels to facilitate the mating of these two lovers who could otherwise never reconnect. It makes sense, then, that the icon which came to symbolize these orgy rituals was a Hermaphroditic figure (like Lilith and Samael once were), sporting a staff with twin serpents on it, symbolizing the two demons. When Samael and Lilith come together, via the bodies of the ritual participants, they form the conjuration of the Baphomet.

Perhaps we can imagine a ritual, possibly performed by the Templars, that might have utilized all of the symbolism we have seen in the Hammer-Purgstall images, as well as many of the motifs found at witch sabbaths, black masses, and Gnostic orgies. We know that many of the Gnostic groups were accused of performing sexual perversions which did not result in babies that were seen alive outside of the ritual chamber. That does not necessarily mean that babies were not born. Sodomy and abortion are the most commonly imagined acts that might have taken place to fulfill these requirements. But what if some of their rituals did result in births? What if that was, in some cases, the point? Thomas Wright describes a group that once met in Orleans, about which a document was found at the abbey of St. Pere in Chartres that described their alleged activities. After calling a demonic spirit to appear “in the form of an animal, ” they would purportedly indulge in group sex (men and women both). Then, Wright says:

The child which was the fruit of this intercourse was taken on the eighth day, and purified by fire, “in the manner of the ancient pagans ” —so says the contemporary writer of this document —it was burnt to ashes in a large fire made for that purpose. The ashes were collected with great reverence, and preserved to be administered to members of the society who were dying, just as good Christians received the viaticum. It is added that there was such a virtue in these ashes, that an individual who had once tasted them would hardly ever be able to turn his mind from that heresy and take the path of truth.

Similarly, in modern times, there is an elite, secret resort in California called the “Bohemian Club ” which performs a “neo-Druidic ritual each summer called the “Cremation of Care, ” involving the sacrifice of a baby “in effigy ” by fire. The ashes are then swept up and used in future rituals. After the rite, the congregants commence with a two-week-long orgy with prostitutes of both sexes and reportedly all ages.

Now let us again recall some of the images presented by Hammer- Purgstall. There are several of children being brought out in front of a burning brazier, and in at least one instance, Hammer-Purgstall described the child as being placed “into ” the fire. He seems to have viewed the children as allegorical of “neophyte Templars, ” which is surprisingly naive, considering all of the diabolical acts that he believed the Templars had engaged in. He also included in his book several images of people, mostly children, halfway inside of the mouth of a dragon.

This he interprets as Ialdabaoth, the Demiurge, spitting out the person, who instead of being absorbed fully by the beast, was able to reemerge from death intact, just as the true Gnostic is supposed to be able to survive immersion in the Abyss or bowl of Mind with his self and memory whole. While we might assume that the dragon would be synonymous with the serpent of Genesis , and therefore a hero to Gnostic Templars, Hammer-Purgstall thought that to them the dragon was the Demiurge, and that images of St. George or St. Michael subduing the dragon were taken by them to represent the conquering of Ialdabaoth (while Michael was himself viewed as a serpent). He mentioned it in connection with an illustration on a bowl:

The infant is threatened with absorption, and lest there be a hint of doubt that that dragon is the same about which Epiphanius speaks as a gnostic symbol of the one who presides over the world (who absorbs and again spits out every man not imbued with Gnosis), in this place a double infant can be seen, of whom one adheres to the jaws; the other, through the lower part of the body, is cast out by means of withdrawal. This is the dragon whom the Templars, having sculpted on their graves, trampled underfoot in the London temple. This, finally, is the same dragon who, at the time of establishment of the Brotherhood of the Temple Militia, out of gnostic fabrications on the life of St. George, and with him, but without the infant, transferred into the British Shield, and for sure the Gnostic dragon absorbing the infant gave rise to the serpent Viscount, who up to the present can be seen in the seals of Milan.

This seal of Milan, as you may know, featuring a boy being swallowed by a dragon, is now also the logo for the Alfa Romeo luxury car company.

The way Hammer-Purgstall thought that the Templars saw it, these impious deeds of debauchery would not have counted against them in the afterlife. Rather they would earn them brownie points. He believed that this was illustrated by one of the images he found:

On the left side is exhibited the end of a Templar ’s life, already dead and lying on the ground, with the Archangel Michael holding a judgment scale and weighing his deeds. The scale, on which were placed apples, desserts and other blandishments of the senses, and by which the Ophitic Templar ’s life is represented, descending to the earth, shows that the judgment of Michael favors him, because in order to hinder Jaldabaoth, he tries to depress the other, ascending, part of the scale… . The … serpent, called by the gnostics Michael, carries out the details of judgment in this way: thinking, in the day of judgment, about the life of the Templar, or Gnostic, he accepts all of his disgraceful deeds as good works. In this way [goes] the cycle of a Gnostic ’s life.

The goal of all these impieties may have been, as we have suggested, nothing less than the toppling of the heavenly order. This may explain, then, several of the images presented by Hammer-Purgstall which involve a bearded and breasted figure (Mete, or Baphomet, according to him) holding a set of chains —one in each hand, seemingly attached to and hanging down from the sky. Hammer-Purgstall had said these represent “a chain of aeons … of the Gnostics, ” “the hermetic chain of the Neoplatonists, and “the gods ’ chain in Homer. ”

This Gnostic, Hermetic, and Neoplatonic “chain ” appears to be the chain of causality, and of the interconnected hierarchies of creation. Since in Gnosticism, each aeon corresponds to an archontic entity, and each Archon corresponds to one of the seven “classical planets ” (the Sun, the Moon, Mercury, Mars, Venus, Jupiter, Saturn), and each planet was, in antiquity, believed to rule over one of the seven heavens (viewed as being spherical and concentrically stacked inside each other like a Russian doll, with the Earth in the middle), one can imagine this as a chain running from the center of the Earth, through the sky, then up through each of the seven heavens and all the way up to the Pleroma on the outside, where the real “Father ” resides.

Hammer-Purgstall ’s reference to “the gods ’ chain in Homer ” points to The Iliad , where Zeus posits a challenge to the other gods to assert his superiority over them. He says:

Try me and find out for yourselves. Hang me a golden chain from heaven, and lay hold of it all of you, gods and goddesses together—tug as you will, you will not drag Zeus the supreme counselor from heaven to earth; but were I to pull at it myself I should draw you up with earth and sea into the bargain, then would I bind the chain about some pinnacle of Olympus and leave you all dangling in the mid firmament. So far am I above all others either of gods or men.

If you were to try to connect the Gnostic Hermetic chain concept with the chain of the gods, you might say that Zeus, as the Demiurge, tried to pretend that he was in the highest sphere, controlling everything below with his chain, but the Gnostics believed there was a higher sphere above him, and a higher power than his. Indeed, someone did connect the concepts already. In 1723, a book called Aurea Catena Homeri was published, edited by Anton Josef Kirchweger. It was an influential alchemical and Hermetic text that was specifically about this subject. It even features a diagram that shows his interpretation of the chain that runs through the universe.

However, the real clue comes from the one most detailed versions of the picture of Mete holding the chains, which is described but strangely not depicted in Hammer-Purgstall ’s book, in which we see what the chains are hanging from. A line drawing of it can be found in Thomas Wright ’s Worship of the Generative Powers , and we actually discovered the physical object it came from at the British Museum, as we describe in the final chapter. At the top of each chain, respectively, we see an inverted moon and an inverted sun. (You can tell they are inverted because each one has a face). Between her feet there is a skull. Perhaps this shows Mete actually using these chains —the chains by which the Archons bind us to our fates —to actually pull the Sun and Moon down from the sky. Maybe it represents the destruction of the universe—dethroning the Archons, and making the heavens fall. Recall the message that he found on one of the artifacts: “The distinguished charity of Mete uproots the enemy. ” The enemy, of course, was the Demiurge, and the universe that he created.

Another set of images presented by Hammer-Purgstall contains other clues as to what this ritual might be. We have the one in which the penis is going into the womb/vase, above which there is an upright moon with a face. To the right, on the other side of a figure sitting on an eagle, a child emerges from another vessel, above which there is an upright sun. Would it be wrong to suppose that this represents the insemination of a womb at night, and the birth of a child during the day?

Perhaps, then, the image of the woman pouring water on the seven candles of the menorah is actually meant to represent the counting of seven days after the child ’s birth. On the eighth day, of course, a child from a normal family would have been either circumcised (if male and Jewish), or baptized (if Christian). But in this case, maybe it was more like with the heretics of the city of Orleans, and the child was baptized instead with fire.

As it turns out, this is exactly one of the things that the Templars were actually accused of —although we have no proof that any of them ever confessed to it. According to Jules Michelet ’s History of France, Volume 1 , published in 1860 (and drawing on the Chroniques Francaises de Saint-Denys, compiled during the Templar trials):

Baphomet, in Greek, (after, it is true, a very doubtful Greek etymology,) is the God who baptizes; the Spirit, he of whom it is written, “He shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost and with fire. ” (St. Matthew , iii.11.) He was to the Gnostics, the Paraclete, who descended on the Apostles in the shape of “cloven tongues like as of fire. ” In fact, the Gnostic baptism was with fire. Perhaps, we must see an allusion to some ceremony of the kind in the reports spread among the people against the Templars, qu ’un enfant nouveau engendre d ’un Templier et d ’une pucelle estoit sacree et ointe leur idole. (that a new-born infant, begotten of a Templar and a maid, was cooked and roasted by the fire, and all the grease roasted out, and their idol consecrated and anointed with it.) … Might not this pretended idol have been a representation of the Paraclete, whose festival, that of Pentecost, was the highest solemnity of the Temple?

So could this be the Baptism of Wisdom —a ritual sex orgy that vicariously unites the parted demon lovers, Samael and Lilith, and produces a child whose sacrifice is somehow supposed to “bring down the heavens ” and hasten the Apocalypse, just like the union of Samael and Lilith is supposed to cause. The participants must have felt “immersed ” in a form of hidden wisdom that they saw as the “Holy Spirit, ” but which seems to be the knowledge of chaos and death. Perhaps they felt “immersed ” because their own souls were actually pulled over to the Abyss for that time, to make room for the invading demon spirits to occupy —a sensation often reported by those who claim to have suffered demonic possession, and supposedly for that very reason.

This fiery baptism, in which, it seems, they may have cremated infants, probably represented to them the universal fire that many Gnostics (starting with John the Baptist himself), and many Jews and Christians as well, believed would bring an end to this fallen realm. Some Gnostics thought that this fire would burn up the ignorant rabble, preserving only the wise elect. Actually, catastrophes involving both fire and water were envisioned as being involved in the world ’s end (which reminds us of the Simonian baptism ritual, of both fire and water.) In Orpheus the Fisher by Robert Eisler, the author argues that John the Baptist was meant to be seen like a second Noah, baptizing with water just like God baptized the Earth in Noah ’s day. In Luke 17:26 (KJV), Jesus talks about his Second Coming at the End Times, declaring that, “And as it was in the days of Noe, so shall it be also in the days of the Son of man. ”But just a couple of lines later, in 17:28-30, Jesus also prophesies a fiery destruction that is to come:

Likewise also as it was in the days of Lot; they did eat, they drank, they bought, they sold, they planted, they builded;

But the same day that Lot went out of Sodom it rained fire and brimstone from heaven, and destroyed them all.

Even thus shall it be in the day when the Son of man is revealed.

This fire and water symbolism also corresponds to lunar and solar symbolism. The Moon is usually associated with water (as it is associated with mutability and fluidity). The Sun, for obvious reasons, is easily associated with fire. So that picture of Mete pulling down the Sun and Moon could also be showing her bringing down fire and water from Heaven. Hammer-Purgstall plainly associated the image of fiery baptism that he discovered with an apocalypse of flame. He wrote:

The ritual fire, having been lit (according to Tertullian), signifies the mystic pyre of universal conflagration, which the Gnostics adopted from the Stoics, and through which they taught that at the end of the world, everything will be dissolved.

The concept of the destruction of life on Earth by both fire and water was described by alchemist Fulcanelli in The Mystery of the Cathedrals as the “double cataclysm. ” He chose to interpret the letters INRI —often written above the head of Jesus when he is shown hanging on the cross, and usually taken to stand for Iesus Nazarenus Rex Iudeorum (Jesus of Nazareth, King of the Jews), as a covert allusion to the words Igne Natura Renovatur Integra (By fire nature is renewed whole). He goes on:

For it is by fire and in fire that our hemisphere will soon be tried. And just as, by means of fire, gold is separated from impure metals, so, Scripture says, the good will be separated from the wicked on the great Day of Judgment.

Interestingly, Midsummer Day, on which the feast of John the Baptist is celebrated, is said by Robert Graves in The White Goddess (citing Frazer ’s Golden Bough) to have “always ” been “a water as well as a fire festival. ” Frazer also said that the bonfires of these festivals were specifically called “fire of heaven. ”

Returning to the subject of the Baptism of Wisdom rite, the actual production of a child through ritual orgy, to be used for further ritual magic purposes, may have been hinted at with the story of the Templar who had sex with the dead body of the girl named Yse, resulting in the birth of a “son ” in the form of a talking magic skull. Perhaps this is represented by the skull beneath Mete ’s feet in the picture of her drawing down the heavens. Maybe they even believed that children produced this way did not possess real souls, but rather were animated merely by the essences of the heavenly bodies that they had drawn down into them during the rituals, so that, with their sacrifices, they really weren ’t killing babies (in their minds), but rather subduing the Archons.

If one wonders how on Earth one could believe that bringing spirits down from stars and planets in a sex rite and entrapping them in the bodies of the resulting offspring could in any way cause the end of the world, recall that the Flood was purportedly caused by angels breeding hybrid children with humans — fallen angels led by the goat demon Azazel.

Now it should be noted, of course, that while there were Gnostic groups that seemed truly motivated to offend God and corrupt his creation, not all Gnostics were really against the material universe, and some were only so in part. Kyle Fraser, in his paper “Baptized in Gnosis: The spiritual alchemy of Zosimos of Panopolis, ” is careful to acknowledge the differences between the Hermetic and Sethian Gnostic views on spiritual alchemy and cosmic redemption:

For the Hermetic tradition the realization of gnosis does not imply the rejection of the material universe; gnosis is described instead as a noetic transformation, from the embodied and finite perspective to a transcendent perspective in which the outer cosmos is perceived within the mind. As Tat [the son of Hermes] exclaims in a visionary moment: “I am in heaven, in earth, in water and air; I am in animals and plants; in the womb, before the womb, and every the womb — everywhere. ” (CH XIII 1.1). The Sethian notion of rupture between the created world and the spiritual universe is nowhere to be found in the Hermetica. This distinction gives us a clearer insight into what it means to speak of alchemy as a properly Hermetic science: the phases of alchemy seem to reflect the phases of Hermetic initiation, from an initial blackening, an experience of spiritual disorientation and imprisonment, to a higher realization of the unity of spirit and matter, a gnosis or enlightenment symbolized for the alchemists as Gold.

We do see many anti-cosmic sentiments expressed in The Corpus Hermeticum . But we can also see this anti-cosmic dualism as being simply a stage of initiation, preliminary to the rebirth of the spirit and the fresh view of creation that the initiate would experience later. Gregory Shaw describes it thusly in Taking the Shape of the Gods: A Theurgic Reading of Hermetic Rebirth :

From a theurgic perspective, dualism and acosmicism mark a preliminary stage of the initiate ’s experience followed by a monist or non-dualist embrace of the entire cosmos, one that marks the culmination of rebirth and immortalization. The reversal of sequence that I propose reflects a reversal of orientation: when the initiate ’s particular and mortal perspective is replaced by the universal perspective of a god . I would argue that this is the goal of both theurgy and Hermetism.

Presumably, not all Templars wanted to bring about cosmic destruction (and most likely not all of them participated in the sick rituals we have described). Though some Gnostic groups seem to have done similar ceremonies, and did have a nihilistic, anti-creation worldview, we know that not all Gnostics wanted to see the universe annihilated. We are sure that most of the Hermeticists did not have this worldview. Even most avowed Satanists today would disagree.

There have only been a few throughout the ages who have both known about and embraced these doctrines. Others have embraced some of them but did not know about the rest. Still others knew about these traditions, but chose to pursue their own ideas, or other interpretations, instead. Most Hermeticists from pre-Christian times would undoubtedly be appalled, for instance, by the orgies, excesses, and blasphemies of the rites of the modern Ordo Templi Orientis, with its “Gnostic Mass ” invoking the words “Baphomet ” and “Baptism of Wisdom ” as the congregants consume semen and menstrual blood before a naked lady sitting on an altar. (The OTO members also eagerly anticipate of the kingdom of the Antichrist and the death of most of humanity.)

So although we do not wish to paint all occultists with this brush, we feel that these destructive rites and ideas are an inseparable part of the chaotic underground stream of Baphometic wisdom, and all of its tributaries. We will provide more evidence to this effect, particularly with regard to the Templars, before the end of this book. Next, though, we will examine a symbol used by the Templars that makes their interest in Gnosticism rather clear: the enigmatic anguipede known as “Abraxas. ”

Chapter 8: Abraxas: Secret of the Temple

This is a god whom ye knew not, for mankind forgot it. We name it by its name ABRAXAS. It is more indefinite still than god and devil.

—Carl Jung, The Seven Sermons to the Dead

The chimera figure of Abraxas (pronounced “ah-BRAKS-us ”) seems to have greatly influenced the Templar concept of Baphomet. Abraxas seems to have played a central role in the Gnostic cult of Basilides in the second century AD. Basilides was an Alexandrian mystic and teacher who for all intents and purposes can only be learned about from the Church Fathers who hated him. He is variously depicted as a disciple of either Menander or Saturninus (both of whom belonged to the schools of Simon Magus in Syria and Alexandria), or as an interpreter of St. Peter named Glaucias. It is interesting to note that Basilides is said to come out of either of these two supposedly diametrically-opposed traditions (those of Simon Magus and St. Peter).

Basilides was more than likely the first major Gnostic writer who viewed himself as a Christian theologian (or the first major Gnostic to write voluminous commentary on the Biblical canon). But unlike his predecessor Simon Magus, he rejected the Old Testament. (Simon seemed to favor an esoteric interpretation of the Samaritan Torah, as we mentioned earlier.) Basilides ’ system seems like an attempt to reconcile the New Testament, Egyptian Gnosticism, and Platonic philosophy (particularly of the Aristotle tradition) with his own mystical revelations. We know from the Church propaganda minister Eusebius that Basilides wrote 24 commentaries, called Exegetica , on the Gospels, only fragments of which now remain. He also wrote hymns and odes to his congregation, all of which are now lost to us.

According to preserved fragments of his writings quoted by the Church Fathers, like Clement of Alexandria, Irenaeus, and Hippolytus, Basilides taught that there was a form of reincarnation (the Platonic metempsychosis) and karma. He may have been influenced by Buddhism. He saw spirit and matter as opposing natures, while passions were caused by spirit attachments in the human soul, which Basilides ’ successor, his son Isidore, likened it to the Trojan horse. The only way to tame this inferior element in man, Basilides felt, was to strengthen the rational part of him. He placed a great deal of emphasis on faith, just as much as Marcion and Paul did. He was also an ascetic, unlike many of his Gnostic compatriots. Faith and asceticism were, in his mind, the only means by which one could disentangle the soul from matter.

Suffering was not considered something to be escaped, but rather a blessing, the purpose of which was to turn the spiritual essence away from its entanglement in matter. Faith was an inborn ascent of the soul for Basilides, and is equated by him with Gnosis. It wasn 't a matter of instruction or indoctrination. It was a sort of nature. Perhaps for Basilides, faith and knowledge were the same thing. Basilides, therefore, had a lot in common with other Gnostics and even with the later Protestant John Calvin, as they all shared the idea of predestined salvation. The "three natures " doctrine attests to this.

The elect were those who had the capacity for faith. They considered themselves "strangers " or "aliens " to the world, longing for the transcendent and salvation in Christ. According to Epiphanius in Panarion (24: 5:2), those who feel perfectly at home in the world are "swine and dogs, " while "We are the 'men. ' " They believed that this was the meaning behind the words of Jesus in Matthew 7:6, "Cast not thy pearls before swine, neither give that which is holy unto dogs. " Birger Pearson, in his book Ancient Gnosticism , reflects on this "Gnostic elitism " exemplified by the cult of Basilides, similar to what is written in Matthew 22:14 about "many " being "called, " but few "chosen ":

Another matter of dispute in scholarship is Basilides ' doctrine of human nature and his classification of some people (that is, Gnostic Christians) as elect, over against the rest of humanity. A dominical saying is cited by Irenaeus as current among the Basilidians: "Few people can know these things—only one in a thousand, and two in ten thousand " (Against Heresies 1.24.6; compare The Gospel of Thomas 23)

Like many of Basilides ' Gnostic contemporaries, he too rejected the Orthodox doctrine of the carnal resurrection and the idea that the spirit only was worthy of salvation, while the flesh was worthless. Many Church Fathers used the Gnostic stance on the Resurrection as proof that Basilides was a libertine, but judging from the evidence provided by our favorite heresy hunters, and as we said before, he was very much a strict ascetic.

It is to Basilides ’ favorite symbol of Abraxas that we now turn our attention. Abraxas is a Gnostic name that appears in many ancient texts. It should be noted that “Abrasax ” is actually the more “official ” spelling of this contradictory but powerful deity ’s name. The word doesn't have a definition in the traditional sense, but rather a mystical meaning. The seven letters that make up the name are meant to represent the seven planets known in antiquity. Abraxas is a complicated figure whose image has changed with the passing of time. But as far as we can tell, originally he was the head of 365 other spiritual beings of Gnostic lore.

Along with the lion-headed Chnoubis, Abraxas was considered to be roughly equivalent to the Agathodaemon, the “good spirit ” of fortune and health revered by the ancient Egyptians and Greeks (mentioned in a previous chapter in relation to the student of Hermes Trismegistus with the same name). They were all often represented as serpents. Abraxas, according to Gnostic myth, was a redeemed Archon who rose above the Hebdomad to rule over it as an intercessory figure between the Pleroma and the world of matter. He became a figure of veneration for many Gnostics, including those who belonged to Basilides ' cultus . This astral god was feared by those who believed in him because they thought that he controlled the universe and their fate.

Abraxas was most often depicted as an "anguipede " (having two serpents for legs) with a human male torso and the head of a cock. We know this because of all the ancient amulets with his image engraved on them. These amulets or gemstones were used as "tokens " by the Gnostics themselves to propagate their ideas, a sort of advertising for their mythos. Edward P. Butler, in his book Esoteric City: Theological Hermeneutics in Plato 's Republic , explains what a token is in the context of magic and the Neoplatonic philosophy of Proclus, which is closer to Gnosticism than most scholars admit:

Proclus explains that "symbols [symbola] are not imitations of those things of which they are symbols "; and thus "If a poet is inspired and manifests by means of symbols " — literally "tokens, " synthemata , a technical term in theurgy — "the truth concerning beings, " or if, using science, he reveals to us the very order of realities, this poet is neither an imitator, nor can be refuted by the arguments [in the text].

There are some similarities between Abraxas and the anguipede giants of the ancient Greeks. These are those featured in the Titanomachy, who were birthed by the titans Gaia and Ouranos in retaliation against Zeus and the Olympian gods for consigning them to Tartarus. They undoubtedly connect to the Nephilim giants of Genesis Chapter 6 and The First Book of Enoch (who owed half their DNA to fallen angels that were later associated with the Serpent of Eden). The various giant children of Gaia (such as the Titans, Oceanus, and Tethys) are naturally associated with the Earth and its waters. In Antiquities of the Jews (1.3), Flavius Josephus confirms that the Jews indeed knew their own scriptures mirrored or mimicked Greek myth:

For many angels of God accompanied with women, and begat sons that proved unjust, and despisers of all that was good, on account of the confidence they had in their own strength; for the tradition is, that these men did what resembled the acts of those whom the Grecians call giants.

These giants may also be regarded essentially as demonic beings of chaos, similar to the Asuras of Hinduism. There are Etruscan artworks and gems which depict Zeus smiting a snake-footed giant from the sixth century BCE and that have served as a forerunner to the writings of Pseudo-Apollodorus and Ovid ’s Metamorphoses , as detailed by Rachel Dodd in Morphing Monsters: The Evolution of Anguipede Giants . In this paper, Dodd attributes the snakey characteristic of the giants to that of Typhon, usually described as Gaia ’s youngest monstrous anguipede son, who is considered by mythologists to be interchangeable with the evil anguipede Seth, the brother of Osiris in the Egyptian pantheon. He also has strong connections with Abraxas as well as Ialdabaoth.

Typhon was an anguipede, both born from Tartarus and Gaia. Typhon is also closely associated with the giants and is sometimes considered the reason why giants became anguipedes in mythology. Yet whenever this is mentioned, it is often only in passing or within a footnote. Ustinova explains the adaptation of snake-legs as a conflation of the giants with the Titans, and moreover of the Titans with Typhon (all of which are children of Gaia). Yet, if the giants received snake-legs from Typhon through the Titans, would not more images depict the Titans as anguipedes as well? In fact, current scholarly theory connects the archaeological evidence of a Typhon vase in Etruria with the adaptation of snake- legged giants, which also appeared first in Etruria.

However, there is another myth regarding giants that may figure into the symbolism of Abraxas ’ snake legs, in this instance from Judeo-Christian tradition. Regarding the giants spawned by the Watchers, The Zohar (Shelah Lecha 160b, from Volume 5 of the Soncino Edition) tells us:

They lived to a great age until at last half their body became paralyzed while the other half remained vigorous. They would then take a certain herb and throw it into their mouths and die, and because they thus killed themselves they were called “Refaim. ”

It makes sense, then, to symbolize the wise elders of this race as having serpents for legs, as they could no longer walk upright.

Moreover, there are scriptures stating that during the time in which the Watchers were breeding the Nephilim giants with humans, different species of animals were being mixed together as well —just as Oannes had said that such things existed before the present stage of creation. (Think of the Greek and Persian myths of Satyrs, Manticores, Griffins, Minotaurs, Centaurs, Chimeras, etc.) As The Book of Jasher 4:18 tells us:

And their judges and rulers went to the daughters of men and took their wives by force from their husbands according to their choice, and the sons of men in those days took from the cattle of the earth, the beasts of the field and the fowls of the air, and taught the mixture of animals of one species with the other, in order therewith to provoke the Lord; and God saw the whole earth and it was corrupt, for all flesh had corrupted its ways on the earth, all men and all animals.

Naturally, there is a direct parallel to the Genesis account (emphasis added):

And God looked upon the earth, and, behold, it was corrupt; for all flesh had corrupted his way upon the earth . And God said unto Noah, The end of all flesh is come before me; for the earth is filled with violence through them; and, behold, I will destroy them with the earth.

In the Dead Sea Scrolls, The Book of Giants (1Q23 Frag. 1 + 6) tells us that the Watchers mated not only with human females, but animals as well, spawning hybrid monsters:

[… two hundred] donkeys, two hundred asses, two hundred … rams of the] flock, two hundred goats, two hundred [… beast of the] field from every animal, from every [bird …] […] for miscegenation […]

Later in the same text (4Q531 Frag. 2), we are told that the fruits of these unions were freaks of nature:

[…] they defiled […] 2[… they begot] giants and monsters […] 3[…] they begot, and, behold, all [the earth was corrupted]… .

“Monsters ” seems to be the term used specifically for these animal-angel hybrids, while the word “giants ” is reserved for the human-angel hybrids. We must presume that, being partially angelic in origin, these monsters could very well have been sentient and conscious, perhaps even with the ability to speak. This would explain why later in The Book of Giants the monsters and giants are described as though they are political partners. Could it be that figures like Baphomet and Abraxas are emblems of chimeric union between angel and beast?

As we have noted, the Archons of Gnosticism also seem to have chimeric qualities since they are often depicted as animal-headed angels, much like the gods of Egypt. Just like Abraxas, there are certain Scythian goddesses who are portrayed with snake legs as well, which serve as forerunners for the “Melusines ” of European folklore. These Melusine images (showing a woman with two serpents for legs) show up on heraldic coats of arms throughout the continent.

The figure of Melusine is based on a character from the mythology of European aristocracy. She is said to have been either the daughter of Godfroi de Bouillon (Advocatus of the Holy Sepulcher), and cousin of Hughes de Payens (founder of the Templars), or of Godfroi ’s successor Baldwin II (who took the title “King of Jerusalem ”). The latter is probably more likely to be Melusine ’s true father, as the research of the Plant Family History Group ’s website (plant- fhg.org.uk) shows that her mythic character is based on Baldwin II ’s daughter Melisande, who married Fulk V, an ancestor of the Plantagenet kings of England (heirs also to the Scottish House of Stuart).

The myth surrounding Melusine is that her mother was a she-demon (clearly a Lilith character). Whenever she bathed, and whenever she witnessed the miracle of the Eucharist, her legs would turn into serpents. Therefore she did not attend mass and would never allow her husband to watch her bathe. When Fulk finally discovered the truth about her, she shrieked like a banshee, sprouted demonic wings, and flew away. This may be the meaning behind the statement once made by Richard the Lionheart, a Plantagenet king, about his own family lineage, declaring, “From the Devil we came, and to the Devil we shall return! ” Thus, the Melusine symbol, though sometimes altered to look more benign, with two fish tails instead of snakes (like the Starbucks logo), was originally an anguipede meant to symbolize the serpent seed that slumbers in the blood of Europe ’s royalty. It is also sometimes combined with the fertility symbol called, in Gaelic, “Sheela Na-Gig ” (though they are found well beyond the British Isles). Sheela is a female gargoyle with spread legs displaying her vagina (a female version of the Priapian phallus talismans). In the Scottish monastery of St. Jacob in Regensburg, Germany, there is an image of Melusine with fish tails for legs, showing off her vagina like Sheela Na-Gig.

Since the snake is an animal that slithers on the ground, it was viewed as possessing strong chthonic features, associated with the Earth and the underworld. At the same time, giants were also connected to the underworld, both in the ancient Greek pagan and the Judeo-Christian traditions. Therefore, the snake legs of Abraxas embody and encompass not only Heaven, but also Hell. (Remember, as we mentioned before Severus taught that “man is divine from the navel up, and the creature of the Devil from the navel down. ”) Abraxas being an anguipede giant with the head of a cock would make sense considering that the Hebrew root word “GBR ” (GiBoR), translated in the King James Version of Genesis as “giant, ” specifically means “warrior, ” while “GeBoR ” refers to a rooster.

The form of Abraxas is frequently said to include that of a basilisk —either his bottom, snakey half, or his whole body (depending on which definition of basilisk you embrace). According to the Encyclopedia of Ancient Deities by Charles Russel Coulter and Patricia Turner, a basilisk (a word meaning “little king ”) is a:

… deified creature. This frightening-looking lizard is able to run on water. Those who annoy it can be frozen in their tracks by its angry glare. It is generally found by those who are not looking for it in the inaccessible regions of the Swiss Alps and the African desert. It has the body and wings of a dragon and the head of a serpent. It is usually shown with its tail in its mouth. Sometimes it is depicted as half cock and half snake. Basilisk is connected with the Gnostic Abraxas in that Agathodemon or “good spirit ” was said to have hatched by a cock from a serpent ’s egg.

This fierce and terrifying creature goes by many other names as well. The shield that he holds could be connected to the goat-skinned impenetrable Aegis shield of Zeus and Athena mentioned earlier, emblazoned with the snakey head of the gorgon that can kill people who look at it by turning them to stone (which we also compared to the identical powers of the Arabic mythological creature Al- Ghul). This deadly aspect of the gaze of the basilisk (more than just causing mere muscle paralysis) is more commonly reported, for example, by Pliny the Elder (in his Natural History), and by Albertus Magnus (in his De animalibus). Also, just as Medusa was killed by Perseus, the basilisk is vulnerable to its own gaze, and can be killed by forcing it to look into a mirror. Both Albertus Magnus and an alchemist named Theophilus Presbyter stated that, once dead, the basilisk could be used to transmute metals, either with its blood (according to the latter), or by its ashes (according to the former).

In Thomas Wright ’s The Worship of Generative Powers , there are drawings that depict a variation on the chicken-headed and winged basilisk with an elongated penis for a tail. Like Abraxas images, these were often placed on amulets to protect their owners from the “evil eye. ” Thomas Wright claims that these are all votives belonging to the cult of Priapus, stating:

The first of these is the figure of a double phallus. It is sculptured on the lintel of one of the vomitories, or issues, of the second range of seats of the Roman amphitheatre, near the entrance-gate which looks to the south. The double and the triple phallus are very common among the small Roman bronzes, which appear to have served as amulets and for other similar purposes. In the latter, one phallus usually serves as the body, and is furnished with legs, generally those of the goat; a second occupies the usual place of this organ; and a third appears in that of a tail.

The mythicist Acharya S. (a.k.a. DM Murdock) has also written on Priapus- like images that are very close to those of Abraxas. At freethoughtnation.com, in the article entitled “The phallic ‘Savior of the World ’ hidden in the Vatican, ” she points out that there is a sculpted bust, supposedly of St. Peter, that depicts a man with a rooster ’s head and an erect phallus for a nose, and which was once on display in the Vatican. Acharya S quotes Barbara Walker from The Woman ’s Dictionary of Symbols and Sacred Objects :

It is no coincidence that “cock ” is slang for “penis. ” The cock was a phallic totem in Roman and medieval sculptures showing cocks somehow transformed into, or supporting, human penises. Roman carvings of disembodied phalli often gave them the legs or wings of cocks. Hidden in the treasury of the Vatican is a bronze image of a cock with the head of a penis on the torso of a man, the pedestal inscribed “The Savior of the World. ”

Acharya S also quotes from Richard Payne Knight ’s A Discourse on the Worship of Priapus , which talks about this image:

… [T]he celebrated bronze in the Vatican has the male organs of generation placed upon the head of a cock, the emblem of the sun, supported by the neck and shoulders of a man. In this composition they represented the generative power of the [Eros], the Osiris, Mithras, or Bacchus, whose centre is the sun… . The inscription on the pedestal [says] … The Saviour of the World … a title always venerable under whatever image it be presented [with].

Acharya S found a rare actual photograph of the “Saviour of the World ” presented as an image of Priapus in Otto Augustus Wall ’s book Sex and Sex Worship (Phallic Worship): A Scientific Treatise on Sex, where it states that it was “found in an ancient Greek temple… . ” She also quotes an article titled “Priapus Gallinaceus: The Role of the Cock in Fertility and Eroticism in Classical Antiquity and the Middle Ages, ” by Dr. Lorrayne Baird, where it says:

This object was published under papal and royal authority, exhibited for a time in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, and is now said to be held inaccessible in the secret collections of the Vatican. During the public life of this bronze, officials disagreed upon the probity of the exhibit. One offended cardinal requested that the object be removed… .

… [T]he Vatican Saviour-as-Phallic-cock was a scandalous satire on early Christians.

Obviously, this cock-headed imagery corresponds greatly with that of Abraxas. Much like the twin-snaked caduceus that serves as the phallus of Eliphas Levi ’s Baphomet, the cock-head of Abraxas represented not only enlightenment but also sexual energy.

Abraxas was frequently associated with the Gnostic figure of Ialdabaoth, usually shown as a lion-headed serpent. This ancient image is first found at the start of the Christian era, sometimes depicted as crowned or surrounded by a halo or streaming rays, indicating its inherent solar and magical nature. The actual name for the character is “Khnoubis ” or “Chnoubis, ” and it can be found carved on old gems and amulets. Hebraic names such as “IAO, ” “Adonai, ” “Sabaoth, ” and the Gnostic corruption of “Ialdabaoth ” are also found on these tokens for superstitious purposes. The Chnoubis figure turns up fairly regularly on these Gnostic gems, especially with the healing formulae for stomach and abdominal issues. It turns up in a few spells in The Greek Magical Papyri as well.

According to Atilio Mastrocinque in Jewish Magic and Gnosticism , the Chnoubis-Ialdabaoth figure originates in the syncretistic Jewish-Gnostic-Egyptian context of the Jewish Temple in Leontopolis. It is sometimes linked with the satirical god of Lucian, Glykon. Chnoubis was considered synonymous with the Gnostic deities Abraxas and Ophis, since the image shows up often along with these gods on amulets and coins.

The sixth-century philosopher Damascius Diodochos recounts some Orphic teachings, and describes Chronos (the Greek god of time) as having both the head of a lion and of a bull in Problems and Solutions Concerning First Principles :

But as for the third principle after the two, it arose from these, I mean from water and earth, and it is a serpent with the heads of a lion and a bull grown upon it, and in the middle the countenance of a god, and it has wings on its shoulders, and the same god is called Ageless Time [Aion], and Heracles.

However, this is a late source, so we are simply left to guess if any of this was believed in the ancient world. The scholar Franz Cumont, in The Mysteries of Mithra , placed Aion, a lion-headed and winged god enveloped by a serpent (a figure called a “leontocephaline ”), as Chronos, who emerged from the primordial chaos and in turn generated Heaven and Earth, like the Orphic deity Phanes. Aion here is much like the Demiurge of Gnosticism.

Ancient magical texts such as The Greek Magical Papyri often invoke images of Chnoubis, which were used for the purpose of warding off malevolent demonic influences, to banish and overcome the cosmic rulers that guard each succeeding section of the “astral realm. ” The Greek Magical Papyri also provides the means for summoning demons for various practical purposes, such as making thievery invisible to others, sending dreams to others via demons, winning favors from both men and women, inflaming lust in the person of desire, punishing enemies, defeating rivals, etc. It is obvious that these spells were used to achieve deeply personal goals for the individual.

If this seems to reflect a sense of moral ambiguity, in a way, that ’s true.

Like Baphomet, Abraxas is a transcendental symbol linking light and darkness, consciousness and unconsciousness. In his Hellenistic form, he is already a chimeric emblem of the unification of opposites, which was reflected several hundred years later in Carl Jung ’s writings on Abraxas. The figure ’s cuirass is that of a Roman-Mithraic soldier, perhaps indicating the militant character of the God of Israel, in his role as the “Lord of Hosts, ” being represented as “Sabaoth. ” To Jung, Abraxas symbolized the wholeness of the soul when repaired from the fragmentation of creation, bringing the end to the schizophrenia of dualism. In Hermann Hesse ’s Demian: The Story of Emil Sinclair ’s Youth , Abraxas is described as functioning in the same way. In Systema Munditotius , Jung writes that Abraxas is also an emblem of the lower, mundane world, guarded over by the Demiurge:

He represents Dominus Mundi , the Lord of the physical world and is a world creator of a polarized nature. From him sprouts the tree of life with the title Vita , life. The lower world of Abraxas is characterized by the number of the natural man, five… . The accompanying animals of the natural world are a devilish monster and a worm, these point to death and rebirth. So the bottom of the Munditoitius is the natural human being, the instinctual Abraxas, this world. And this is in a strong tension and contrast to the upper world.

In the Middle Ages, Abraxas was also known as the king of demons, a title also shared in cabalistic demonology with Asmodeus, a son of Lilith and Samael. Abraxas is in some ways similar to the Hindu Narasimha, the lion-headed avatar of Vishnu, also the latter is thought of as benevolent. (However, Narasimha is considered fearsome by other demons, and is often depicted as disemboweling them on his lap!) In the Dictionnaire Infernal by Jacques Collin de Plancy (1818), Abraxas is spelled “Abracas. ” He is listed here as one of the many demons to be used for the purpose of evocation, similar to what was said about him in The Greek Magical Papyri . In many Gnostic texts, the Demiurge was associated with the element of fire, and bore many chimeric qualities, as The Apocryphon of John describes him:

And when she saw (the consequences of) her desire, it changed into a form of a lion-faced serpent. And its eyes were like lightning fires which flash. She cast it away from her, outside that place, that no one of the immortal ones might see it, for she had created it in ignorance.

In The Pistis Sophia , the Demiurge isn ’t by any means a handsome fellow, being depicted as a fiery yet dark lion-faced demon. He resides within the chaotic underworld of Hades where he and his forty-nine demons torture wicked souls in boiling rivers of pitch-black darkness. Also, in The Gospel of Judas , Ialdabaoth dwells in Hades with “Nebro ” (meaning “rebel angel ”) and his other henchman. He is said to be one of the twelve angels to come “into being [to] rule over chaos and the [underworld]. ” Also, his “face flashed with fire and whose appearance was defiled with blood. ” In the Manichaean Kephalaia (30.34-31.1), it describes the “King of Those of Darkness ” like this:

His head [is lion-faced, his] hands and feet are demon-faced, [his] shoulders are eagle-faced, while his belly [is dragon-faced,] (and) his tail is fish-faced.

In verse 280 of the Right Ginza of the Mandaeans, there is a very similar description of Satan as well, which is also closer to the Sethian Ialdabaoth, except for the fact that he has angelic wings, tortoise legs and demonic feet. The chimera found in the Homer ’s Iliad was also described with similar features as:

… a thing of immortal make, not human, lion-fronted and snake behind, a goat in the middle, and snorting out the breath of the terrible flame of bright fire.

In the context of the Templars, Abraxas seems to have the most in common with the archangel Michael, as we will explore later. Under the name of “Iao, ” Abraxas appears in a few instances throughout the Nag Hammadi codices, in such Sethian texts such as The Great Book of the Invisible Spirit , The Apocalypse of Adam , and Zostrianos . In these he is basically a minor aeon or angel that works in tandem with Sophia and the “four spiritual lights ” to rectify the error of our universe. The sixth-century author John the Lydian wrote in De Mensibus , 83:

… The Roman Varro, when discussing him, says that among the Chaldaeans, in their mystical [writings], he is called “Iao, ” meaning “mentally perceived light ” in the language of the Phoenicians, as Herennius [Philo] says. And he is frequently called “Sabaoth, ” meaning the one who is “above the seven heavenly spheres ” —that is, the creator.

Abraxas was in many ways interchangeable with Sabaoth, who, according to the Gnostic mythology presented in On the Origin of the World , was the son and offspring of Ialdabaoth. In that text, he rebels against his father in a great war, repents of his “sins, ” and sides with his grandmother, Sophia-Achamoth. He is then elevated “above the seventh heaven ” to become the “Ogdoad ” (the eighth power), and enthroned, surrounded by ministering cherubim within a mansion that is “huge, magnificent, seven times as great as all those that exist in the seven heavens. ” The idea of Sabaoth being redeemed is very similar to the account we just mentioned where the Archons and Abraxas were enlightened by the Gospel.

However, there is a lot of conflicting information about the nature of Abraxas. There were supposedly a total of 365 heavens in Basilides ’ cosmology, and Abraxas was the chief ruler over them. It doesn ’t explicitly say that Abraxas was an evil Archon like Ialdabaoth, however. The ruler over Basilides ’ 365th and final heaven was the Jewish god, the Demiurge shared by all major Gnostic systems, and he was indeed evil. Irenaeus and Hippolytus say that Abraxas was the chief Archon of Basilides ’ cosmology, not the supreme god, whereas Tertullian says that Abraxas and the highest god are the same. Most scholars think that Tertullian was dependent on Irenaeus and misread what he said. In Against Heresies (1.24.3-4.7), Irenaeus lays out Basilides ’ system (which isn ’t particularly dualist) pertaining to Abraxas ’ domain:

They make out the local position of the three hundred and sixty-five heavens in the same way as do mathematicians. For, accepting the theorems of these latter, they have transferred them to their own type of doctrine. They hold that their chief is Abraxas; and, on this account, that word contains in itself the numbers amounting to three hundred and sixty- five.

Then other powers, being formed by emanation from these, created another heaven similar to the first; and in like manner, when others, again, had been formed by emanation from them, corresponding exactly to those above them, these, too, framed another third heaven; and then from this third, in downward order, there was a fourth succession of descendants; and so on, after the same fashion, they declare that more and more principalities and angels were formed, and three hundred and sixty-five heavens. Wherefore the year contains the same number of days in conformity with the number of the heavens.

Those angels who occupy the lowest heaven, that, namely, which is visible to us, formed all the things which are in the world, and made allotments among themselves of the earth and of those nations which are upon it. The chief of them is he who is thought to be the God of the Jews; and inasmuch as he desired to render the other nations subject to his own people, that is, the Jews, all the other princes resisted and opposed him. Wherefore all other nations were at enmity with his nation.

In Refutation of All Heresies , Hippolytus reports that Basilides taught the concept of a non-existent deity. This is similar to what other Gnostics called the “Unknowable Father. ” But this concept seems to refer to a realm of infinite potentiality rather than simply nothing . Abraxas (spelled “Abrasax ” in this instance) is said to be an Archon that exists within the Hebdomad beneath the Ogdoad. He is mentioned as the third of three great Archons. Here are the words of Basilides regarding the non-existent god, as quoted by Hippolytus:

Whatsoever I affirm to have been made [beyond] these, ask no question as to where. For the Seed had all seeds treasured and resting in itself, just as non-existent entities, and which were designed to be produced by a non- existent Deity.

According to Hippolytus, Basilides ’ system began with the non-existent god, from whom came the Seed. From the Seed came the three-fold or triple- sonship (the three natures), the existent cosmos, the Great Archon of the Ogdoad, the Lesser Archon of the Hebdomad, and a peculiar Archon who is said to be the sum of all the powers of the Hebdomad, including the 365 heavens therein: Abrasax (Abraxas). In Refutation of All Heresies (7:10-15) we read:

There existed, he says, in the Seed itself, a Sonship, threefold, in every respect of the same Substance with the non-existent God, and begotten from nonentities, Of this Sonship thus involving a threefold division, one part was refined, another lacking refinement, and another requiring purification.

The refined portion, therefore, in the first place, simultaneously with the earliest deposition of the Seed by the non-existent One, immediately burst forth and went upwards and hurried above from below … and attained, he says, unto him that is nonexistent.

For every nature desires the nonexistent God… . However, each nature desires this after a different mode. The unrefined portion of the Sonship continuing still in the Seed … was not able to hurry upwards. For this portion was much more deficient in the refinement that the Sonship possessed … and was left behind. Therefore the unrefined Sonship equipped itself with some such wing as Plato, the Preceptor of Aristotle, fastens on the soul in his Phaedrus.

That last remark refers to Plato ’s dialogue Phaedrus , where it is said that the soul must acquire “wings ” through the practice of philosophy in order to regain its memory and to return to its original divine estate. This is the Platonic equivalent of Gnostic knowledge. Hippolytus continues:

And Basilides styles such, not a wing, but Holy Spirit; and Sonship invested in this Spirit confers benefits, and receives them in turn… . For the Sonship, carried upwards by the Spirit as by a wing, bears aloft… . And it approaches the refined Sonship, and the non-existent God, even Him who fabricated the world out of nonentities.

Hippolytus tells us about a “third Sonship ” that requires purification from above. This third Sonship is of course, the Great Archon, Abraxas. He is also called the “Head of the World, ” and a master of the air (which sounds similar to “prince of the power of the air, ” a title given to the Devil by Paul in Ephesians 2:2). The text continues:

This Archon, when begotten, raised Himself up and soared aloft, and was carried up entire as far as the firmament. And there He paused, supposing the firmament to be the termination of His ascension and elevation, and considering that there existed nothing at all beyond these.

… He became more wise, more powerful, more comely, more lustrous … pre-eminent for beauty above any entities you could mention with the exception of the Sonship alone, which is still left in the conglomeration of all germs.

For he was not aware that there is a Sonship wiser and more powerful, and better than Himself. Therefore imagining Himself to be Lord, and Governor, and a wise Master Builder, He turns Himself to the work of the creation of every object in the cosmical system.

… [A]nd the Archon caused Him to sit on his right hand. This is, according to these heretics, what is denominated the Ogdoad, where the Great Archon has his throne. The entire celestial creation, then, that is, the Aether, He Himself, the Great Wise Demiurge formed. The Son, however, begotten of this Archon, operates in Him, and offered Him suggestions, being endued with far greater wisdom than the Demiurge Himself.

The account, therefore, which Aristotle has previously rendered concerning the soul and the body, Basilides elucidates as applied to the Great Archon and his Son. For the Archon has generated, according to Basilides, a son; and the soul as an operation and completion, Aristotle asserts to be an entelecheia [an actuality formed from an ideal potential] of a natural organic body. As, therefore, the entelecheia controls the body, so the Son, according to Basilides, controls the God… .

When all objects in the aethereal regions, then, were arranged, again from the conglomeration of all germs another Archon ascended, greater, of course, than all subjacent entities with the exception, however, of the Sonship that had been left behind, but far inferior to the First Archon. And this second Archon is called by them Rhetus ... [and] ... is styled Hebdomad, and this Archon is the manager and fabricator of all subjacent entities. And He has likewise made unto Himself out of the conglomeration of all germs, a son who is more prudent and wise than Himself, similarly to what has been stated to have taken place in the case of the First Archon... .

The Gospel then came, says Basilides, first from the Sonship through the Son, that was seated beside the Archon, to the Archon, and the Archon learned that He was not God of the universe, but was begotten. But ascertaining that He has above Himself the deposited treasure of that Ineffable and Unnamable and Non-existent One, and of the Sonship, He was both converted and filled with terror, when He was brought to understand in what ignorance He was involved.

When, then, the Great Archon had been orally instructed, and every creature of the Ogdoad had been orally instructed and taught, and after the mystery became known to the celestial powers, it was also necessary that afterwards the Gospel should come to the Hebdomad... .

The Son of the Great Archon therefore kindled in the Son of the Archon of the Hebdomad the light which Himself possessed and had kindled from above from the Sonship. And the Son of the Archon of the Hebdomad had radiance imparted to Him, and He proclaimed the Gospel to the Archon of the Hebdomad. And in like manner, according to the previous account, He Himself was both terrified and induced to make confession.

When, therefore, all beings in the Hebdomad had been likewise enlightened, and had the Gospel announced to them; for in these regions of the universe there exist, according to these heretics, creatures infinite in number, viz., Principalities and Powers and Rulers (Ephesians 6:12), in regard of which there is extant among the Basilidians a very prolix and verbose treatise, where they allege that there are three hundred and sixty- five heavens, and that the great Archon of these is Abrasax, from the fact that his name comprises the computed number 365… .

Note that the text here indicates that the 365 heavens exist within the region of the Hebdomad, as opposed to the Ogdoad of the Great Archon. Thus Abrasax exists within the confines of the Hebdomad and is not to be identified with the Great Archon himself. Moreover, Abrasax is connected here with the wicked “principalities and powers ” of Ephesians 6:12, which implies that he is a malevolent or Satanic being. (That scripture says, “For we wrestle not against flesh and blood, but against principalities, against powers, against the rulers of the darkness of this world, against spiritual wickedness in high places. ”) However, what is fascinating in this account is that the Archons become enlightened when they are preached the Gospel! This is very unique to Basilides. This may explain why Clement of Alexandria accused Basilides of “deifying ” the Devil. However, this seems hardly fair. Hippolytus goes on:

When these two events, viz. the illumination of the Hebdomad and the manifestation of the Gospel had thus taken place, it was necessary, likewise, that afterwards the Formlessness existent in our quarter of creation should have radiance imparted to it, and that the mystery should be revealed to the Sonship, which had been left behind in Formlessness, just like an abortion.

And as far as this, the entire Sonship, which is left behind for benefiting the souls in Formlessness, and for being the recipient in turn of benefits—this Sonship, I say, when it is transformed, followed Jesus, and hastened upwards, and came forth purified. And it becomes most refined, so that it could, as the first Sonship, hasten upwards through its own instrumentality. For it possesses all the power that, according to nature, is firmly connected with the light which from above shone down… .

When, therefore, he says, the entire Sonship shall have come, and shall be above the conterminous spirit, then the creature will become the object of mercy. “For the creature groans until now ” (Romans 8:19-22) and is tormented, and waits for the manifestation of the sons of God, in order that all who are men of the Sonship may ascend from thence.

When this takes place, God, he says, will bring upon the whole world enormous ignorance, that all things may continue according to nature, and that nothing may inordinately desire anything of the things that are contrary to nature.

But far from it; for all the souls of this quarter of creation, as many as possess the nature of remaining immortal in this region only, continue in it, aware of nothing superior or better than their present state. And there will not prevail any rumour or knowledge in regions below, concerning beings whose dwelling is placed above, lest subjacent souls should be wrung with torture from longing after impossibilities.

It would be just as if a fish were to crave to feed on the mountains along with sheep. For a wish of this description would, he says, be their destruction. All things, therefore, that abide in this quarter are incorruptible, but corruptible if they are disposed to wander and cross over from the things that are according to nature.

In this way the Archon of the Hebdomad will know nothing of superjacent entities. For enormous ignorance will lay hold on this one likewise, in order that sorrow, and grief, and groaning may depart from him; for he will not desire anything of impossible things, nor will he be visited with anguish. In like manner, however, the same ignorance will lay hold also on the Great Archon of the Ogdoad, and similarly on all the creatures that are subject unto him, in order that in no respect anything may desire anything of those things that are contrary to nature, and may not (thus) be overwhelmed with sorrow. And so there will be the restitution of all things which, in conformity with nature, have from the beginning a foundation in the seed of the universe… .

The underlying wisdom in Basilides ’ doctrine is that all sorrows are the result of a longing for the non-existent realm by those who have an essence of that realm within them, having this from their connection with the third sonship that is confined and formless in the existent cosmos. Those souls who have a portion of the third sonship in themselves will be purified along with it and restored to the non-existent realm. A fascinating detail is that Basilides seems to construct this interpretation in part from Paul and the passage from Romans 8:19 (“For the earnest expectation of the creature waiteth for the manifestation of the sons of God). Basilides was saying that the “manifestation of the sons of God ” refers to the revealing and ascension of the triple-sonship, while the “groaning of the creature ” refers to the remaining sonship, within the creation, that is in need of purification.

The description of the non-existent god sounds curiously close to the Buddhist concept of Nirvana. Also notice how Hippolytus links the “formlessness ” of matter with that of an “abortion, ” which is exactly how Ialdabaoth is described in other Gnostic texts. There may be a link here with the use of this language and the claims that some Gnostic groups aborted the fruitful results of their alleged orgies —which, as we have mentioned, could have been done as a way of preventing spirit from being trapped in matter through incarnation in a human body. Epiphanius claimed that the Phibionites induced abortions with honey and pepper, and ritually consumed the fetus in some twisted parody of the Eucharist.

According to Hippolytus, Basilides taught that one day there would be no unification with the Godhead possible, since, he believed, each level of existence will remain to its own. Spirit will go to spirit, while flesh will remain flesh, and no salvation or grace will be enacted to make anything contrary to its nature. This is what Basilides meant by the term “Great Ignorance ” in his eschatology. He stood on the fringe of Gnostic thought. He felt that in the end, ignorance will win against knowledge. This is radically different from other Gnostic teachings, as well as Christianity, Judaism, and Platonism, all systems wherein it is taught that knowledge (even “unknowing knowledge ”) leads to union with God. Perhaps in Basilides ’ “non-existent god ” concept (a kind of religious atheism), we can find the first instance of “apophatic theology, ” describing the divine in negative terms (by defining what it is not). We see this in other Gnostic texts like The Apocryphon of John and Allogenes , as well as Neoplatonic thinkers like Plotinus. We also find some similarities in Paul ’s 2 Thessalonians 2:9-12, where God causes a “strong delusion ” in the sinful world so that it can be damned because it rejected the Gospel:

Even him, whose coming is after the working of Satan with all power and signs and lying wonders, and with all deceivableness of unrighteousness in them that perish; because they received not the love of the truth, that they might be saved. And for this cause God shall send them strong delusion, that they should believe a lie: That they all might be damned who believed not the truth, but had pleasure in unrighteousness.

In this context, the aforementioned Greek concept of Lethe, the river of forgetfulness in Hades, and the “cup of forgetfulness ” from The Pistis Sophia both seem pertinent.

As we can see, Hippolytus ’ account of the Basilidean system is very different from Irenaeus ’. Scholars dispute as to which one is older, but we are guessing that Irenaeus ’ system is the eldest, since it is much simpler than the other. Also, according to Irenaeus ’ account, Basilides ’ Jesus was docetic (only a spirit and not at all human), whereas Hippolytus says that Basilides saw him as fully human. Hippolytus also claims that Basilides was, as Simone Petrement put it in A Separate God , “nourished by philosophy, ” particularly that of Aristotle and Pythagoras.

Moving on to other viewpoints on the matter, in Thrice-Great Hermes , GRS Mead discusses the possible connection of Abraxas to the celestial spheres of the cosmic rulers of fate:

The name Abraxas, which consisted of seven elements or letters, was a mystery-designation of the God who combined in himself the whole power of the Seven Planets, and also of the Year of 365 days, the sum of the number-values of the letters of Abraxas working out to 365. This mysterious Being was the “Year ”; but the Year as the Eternity, also conceived of in a spatial aspect, as the Spirit or Name that extends from Heaven to Earth, the God who pervades and full-fills the Seven Spheres, and the Three Hundred and Sixty-five Zones, the Inner God, “He who has His seat within the Seven Poles… ” as the Papyri have it, and also without them, as we shall see.

Sencan Altinoluk and Nilufer Atakan also see Abraxas as a solar deity, much like those from the Egyptian pantheon, such as Horus, Osiris, and Ra. In Abraxas: A Magical Gem in the Istanbul Archaeological Museums , they wrote:

Abrasax is the god of the solar year… . Abrasax was thought to be a mighty tutelary deity. People imagined him as a kind of sun god similar to the Greek Helios, who could protect people all of the year —i.e. 365 days — and who was able to see everything that happens on earth… .

In Greek and Roman belief the rooster was generally considered to be a protector from evil, as the rooster guards the farm where it lives, and as the Greek name of the animal was connected with [a word meaning] “to ward off, to avert. ” Furthermore, this animal was very often associated with the sun, as roosters are wont to crow at sunrise, which was interpreted as a kind of greeting to the rising sun. Roosters are widely used in magic practices and rituals. The whip and the shield are thought to be used for warding off demons. Therefore such gems are applied for the purposes of protecting their wearers from any sort of evil. Also the whip assimilates Abrasax to the sun god who uses his whip to drive his horses on. In the case of Abrasax the whip is a symbol of the god ’s power to prevent demons from attacking the owner of such a gem. Abrasax ’s shield is an instrument to protect men from demons and all kinds of evil.

As we mentioned earlier, Abraxas was also equated with the archangel Michael by the Gnostics. Recall that the Ophites demoted Michael to a serpent- like demonic power. In The Testament of Solomon , Sabaoth, through his intermediary, the archangel Michael, is said to entrust Solomon with a magical ring bearing a pentagram that enables to command 72 demons to build his temple. The same text tells us:

…I entered the Temple of God, and prayed with all my soul, night and day, that the demon might be delivered into my hands, and that I might gain authority over him. And it came about through my prayer that grace was given to me from the Lord Sabaoth by Michael his archangel. [He brought me] a little ring, having a seal consisting of an engraved stone, and said to me: “Take, O Solomon, king, son of David, the gift which the Lord God has sent thee, the highest Sabaoth. With it thou shalt lock up all demons of the earth, male and female; and with their help thou shalt build up Jerusalem. [But] thou [must] wear this seal of God. And this engraving of the seal of the ring sent thee is a Pentalpha. ”

Following these connections, it seems that Abraxas, perhaps operating under the guise of “Sabaoth, ” may be seen as a sort of guardian spirit or “demon ” for the Temple of Solomon.

The demon that Solomon took as the chief architect for his project was Asmodeus, said by cabalists to be the husband of Lilith the Younger. Asmodeus takes a stance reminiscent of the "As above, so below " pose struck by Baphomet in Eliphas Levi 's depiction of him in this description given by Louis Ginzberg in the fourth volume of his Louis Ginzberg classic Legends of the Jews (emphasis added):

Although Asmodeus was captured only for the purpose of getting the shamir, Solomon nonetheless kept him after the completion of the Temple. One day the king told Asmodeus that he did not understand wherein the greatness of the demons lay, if their king could be kept in bonds by a mortal. Asmodeus replied, that if Solomon would remove his chains and lend him the magic ring, he would prove his own greatness. Solomon agreed. The demon stood before him with one wing touching heaven and the other reaching to the earth . Snatching up Solomon, who had parted with his protecting ring, he flung him four hundred parasangs away from Jerusalem, and then palmed himself off as the king.

The pentagram on Solomon ’s ring is a symbol that has been used in many different cultures, even by medieval Christians, to whom it represented the five wounds of Christ. It was generally thought to be protective against evil. The students of Pythagoras also used the sign to represent he ether or spirit ruling over the other four elements of fire, earth, water and air. The Freemason Christoph Friedrich Nicolai, in Versuch uber die Beschuldigungen welche dem Tempelherrenorden gemacht worden, und uber dessen Geheimniß (Essay on the Accusations Which Have Been Made Against the Templar Order, and Its Mysteries , 1782), writes that the Gnostic Ophites, like Solomon, had the power to subdue the Archons and their demonic minions by the usage of tokens featuring the pentagram:

What properly was the sign of the Baffomet, “figura Baffometi, ” which was depicted on the breast of the bust representing the Creator, cannot be exactly determined… . I believe it to have been the Pythagorean pentagon … of health and prosperity: … It is well known how holy this figure was considered, and that the Gnostics had much in common with the Pythagoreans. From the prayers which the soul shall recite, according to the diagram of the Ophite-worshippers, when they on their return to God are stopped by the Archons, and their purity has to be examined, it appears that these serpent-worshippers believed they must produce a token that they had been clean on earth. I believe that this token was also the holy pentagon, the sign of their initiation… .

Fourteenth to fifteenth-century writer Joannes Marcarius, in his book Abraxas seu Apistopistus (as described by Peter N. Miller in The Antiquary ’s Art of Comparison: Peiresc and Abraxas), compares Abraxas to the Trojan horse, for “just as the Greek heroes emerged from its womb, so Abraxas hides in its womb all the family of the gods, whether Egyptian, Greek, Latin, or Persian. ” Perhaps this is what Charles William King was getting at in his 1887 book The Gnostics and Their Remains , when he compared Abraxas to the Egyptian sun deity Horus, drawing from The Pistis Sophia as well as from Hindu myths :

Horus is often figured sailing through the heavens in the sacred boat, the Baris steered by two hawks; solar emblems, with sun and moon overhead, and taking the same titles … as the great Abraxas-god himself, and with reason, the same idea being couched in the two personifications. Horus, as Heliodorus records, was also applied to the Nile, whose Greek name … also contained the mystic solar number 365; this voyager in the baris is analogous to the Hindoo Neryana, the child floating in his argah leaf upon the face of the waters having his whole body coloured blue… . Those common emblems, the baris and the coiled serpent, have their Gnostic meaning fully explained by a remarkable passage in the Pistis-Sophia .

This passage he then quotes:

And the disk of the sun was a Great Dragon whose tail was in his mouth, who went up into the Seven Powers on the left hand, being drawn by four Powers having the similitude of white horses. But the going of the Moon was in the shape of a boat, the rudder whereof showed a male and female dragon with two white cows drawing the same, and the figure of a child on the stern guiding the dragons, who drew away the light from the Rulers (the regular synonym in the book for the rebellious aeons, lords of the Zodiac), and in front of the child was the similitude of a cat.

King also recognized the similarities between Abraxas and Baphomet, as well as the connections between these two characters and other ancient gods such as Osiris. He writes:

Interesting above the rest for the part it played in medieval superstition is the Osiris, or old man, with radiated head, a terminal figure always shown in front face with arms crossed on the breast, the true Baphomet of the Templars . Sometimes he is borne aloft upon the heads of four Angels, upon whom two streams pour forth from his sides. This group has been explained as Ormuzd borne up by the Four Elements; although it may possibly refer to the notion the prophet Enoch mentions [:] “I also beheld the Four Winds which bear up the earth and the firmament of heaven. ” The idea in truth has rather an Assyrian than Egyptian cast, for in Assyrian works Athor (Mylitta) often appears pouring out from her extended arms the Waters of Life; and again the Persian female Ized Arduisher is by interpretation “the giver of living water. ”

The image of a figure with two streams of water pouring out his or her left and right sides connects to the Babylonian god

Ea or Enki, who is also shown this way, and to the prophet Idris, who is said to live at the crossing of two rivers. It also indicates the throne of God, from under which the rivers of Paradise are said to emerge. King continues on the subject of Abraxas, noting on p. 236 that Abraxas ’ torso really belongs to a Mithraic soldier:

An armed man, the Mithraic soldier, one of the figures regularly set up in the mystic Cave of the Solar god, often decorates a talisman, holding a spear tipped with the head of a cock, a mark of honour granted by the Persian kings to distinguished valour (as by Artaxerxes to the Carian who slew Cyrus the Younger); or else grasping a serpent in each hand.

As we saw earlier with the triple “sonships ” of Hippolytus ’ account, Basilides ’ system is a cosmos created by angels, one of them being the Jewish God of the Old Testament. These blundering world-creating angels are constantly at war with one another, while Christ is thought to be a shape-shifting, phantom spirit sent to save those who have knowledge of the Unknown Father, or the higher god, from this universal crisis. This is the same teaching we find with Simon Magus. In his Apophasis Megale of Simon Magus (as paraphrased by Hippolytus in Refutation of All Heresies), there are six roots (forming three pairs) on his version of the “Tree of Fire ”: Mind (Nous) and Forethought (Epinoia); Voice (Foni) and Name (Onoma); along with Reasoning (Logismos) and Desire (Enthymesis). Similarly, according to Irenaeus, Basilides taught that there were six emanations, also in three pairs: Father (Pater) and Mind (Nous); Word (Logos) and Prudence (Fronesis); then Power (Dynamis) and Wisdom (Sophia).

It seems to us that Simon could very well be the “father of all heresies, ” and that Gnosticism as a whole came largely from his ideas, which ultimately spring from the earlier tradition of John the Baptist. As pointed out by Neil Godfrey at Vridar.org, Basilides was apparently responsible for instituting the festival of the Epiphany of Jesus and of his Baptism on January 6. He gets this from St. Clement of Alexandria ’s comment from the Stromata (XXI, 45) which says:

And the followers of Basilides hold the day of his baptism as a festival, spending the night before in readings. And they say that it was the fifteenth year of Tiberius Caesar, the fifteenth day of the month of Tubi; and some that it was the eleventh of the same month.

Although Neil Godfrey isn ’t by any means the first one to point this out, Basilides taught the strange doctrine of Jesus ’ substitution on the cross —the same idea found in the Acts of John , and similar to what is told in The Koran (that someone/something that looked like Jesus was crucified in his stead). Writes Godfrey:

Basilides taught that Jesus somehow was confused with Simon of Cyrene and it was this Simon who was crucified in his place. Jesus, being supernaturally related to God or Mind was able to change his appearance at will, and so escaped crucifixion and was taken, laughing at how he had deceived mere mortals, to heaven. Thus the Pauline theme of the mocked Archontes/Rulers was maintained, but in the process the crucifixion was denied —a denial we see repeated in the Acts of John and in the Koran of Islam.

In Tracy R. Twyman ’s book The Judas Goat: The Substitution Theory of the Crucifixion , she discusses various texts that support the idea that the crucifixion was a hoax, an idea suggested by the authors of Holy Blood, Holy Grail . She starts off by comparing a passage from The Second Treatise of the Great Seth and a passage from The Koran . The latter source tells us, “They did not slay him, neither crucified him, only a likeness of that was shown to them. ” Likewise, in The Second Treatise of the Great Seth , Jesus says:

I did not succumb to them as they had planned… . And I did not die in reality but in appearance, lest I be put to shame by them… . For my death which they think happened [happened] to them in their error and blindness, since they nailed their man unto their death… . It was another, their father, who drank the gall and the vinegar; it was not I. They struck me with the reed; it was another, Simon, who bore the cross on his shoulder. It was another upon whom they placed the crown of thorns… . And I was laughing at their ignorance.

For Basilides, it was Simon of Cyrene, not Jesus, who was crucified. In A Separate God , Simone Petrement remarks on this subject:

Simon of Cyrene is the man who carries the cross; this allowed a religious thinker who loved symbols to take it as a symbol of the part of Jesus that carried (that is, suffered) the cross. Moreover, Ph. Carrington has shown that this idea could have been suggested by a literal interpretation of Mark ’s Gospel (15:1-15). As Jesus ’ name is not expressly mentioned by Mark after that of Simon of Cyrene, the pronominal forms (aton , atuo , autou) in what follows might be interpreted as referring to Simon. Finally, the idea that the cross was a trap that ridiculed the executioners, together with the reference to a psalm that is considered prophetic (Psalms 2:4), might have led someone to say that at the moment of crucifixion Christ “laughed. ” But, for Basilides, Jesus truly suffered.

Indeed, the Laughing Jesus is not only present in Seth , but also in The Gospel of Judas . It is also a characteristic associated with Docetism, since if Jesus was never incarnated in the flesh, the crucifixion must have been illusory. This is what the Docetists were getting at: the images aren ’t of his true nature, because he is not limited by the material world, but he manifests in ways familiar to us so that he can be comprehended. In The Gospel of Judas , we see Jesus laugh quite a few times, especially at the folly and stupidity of his disciples, because they blindly worship a lesser god. There we read:

One day he was with his disciples in Judea, and he found them gathered together and seated in pious observance. When he [approached] his disciples, gathered together and seated and offering a prayer of thanksgiving over the bread, [he] laughed. The disciples said to [him], “Master, why are you laughing at [our] prayer of thanksgiving? We have done what is right. ” He answered and said to them, “I am not laughing at you. You are not doing this because of your own will but because it is through this that your god [will be] praised. ”

Jesus, as being representative of the “immortal generation ” (the heavenly Aeons), laughs at the foolish piousness of his disciples since they worship the inferior creator, Jehovah who is rendered as Ialdabaoth in this text. Oddly though, Ialdabaoth isn ’t depicted as a megalomaniacal foolish angel like he is in other

Gnostic texts. He also is not said to have been involved in creation, nor is he shown to rebel against the divine order. Creation is a job relegated to Saklas, who is a different Archon altogether in The Gospel of Judas . In this text, the Archons are intentionally created by the luminary Eleleth (whose name sounds a lot like “Lilith ”) to bring order to chaos. They don't actually rebel until they create humanity, and it isn't Ialdabaoth who does that, but Saklas. In The Apocryphon of John , Saklas is another name for Ialdabaoth, which means “blind fool. ” This isn ’t the case in The Gospel of Judas , however. There, we read:

[Eleleth] said, “Let twelve angels come into being [to] rule over chaos and the [underworld]. ” And look, from the cloud there appeared an [angel] whose face flashed with fire and whose appearance was defiled with blood. His name was Nebro, which means “rebel ”; others call him Yaldabaoth. Another angel, Saklas, also came from the cloud.

Nebro is here used as the alternate name for Ialdabaoth (spelled Yaldabaoth in this text). Saklas is clearly presented as a different Archon altogether. Yaldabaoth and Saklas create inferior Archons to rule over the lower universe and the underworld. However, it ’s only Saklas who creates the earth and humanity. Ialdabaoth seems to have a very miniscule role in The Gospel of Judas ’ creation narrative, where it says.

Then Saklas said to his angels, “Let us create a human being after the likeness and after the image. ” They fashioned Adam and his wife Eve, who is called, in the cloud, Zoe. For by this name all the generations seek the man, and each of them calls the woman by these names.

The text quotes Jesus as saying that there will be those who will sacrifice to Saklas in his name at the End Times. So again, Saklas is given prominence over Ialdabaoth. Which begs the question: Is The Gospel of Judas ’ Yaldabaoth actually evil? Nebro is obviously a demonic entity. But again, the Archons are an intentional creation in this text. They are meant to bring order to the lower world. However, after Yaldabaoth creates the other Archons to reign over the rest of the lower universe, Saklas creates humanity without Yaldabaoth. Could it be that this is the author ’s way of saying that angels and demons both worked to bring order out of chaos during creation, even to the depths of the underworld? The Gospel of Judas may be a text written by someone who was influenced by Sethianism, but not actually Sethian. Or it could have been a non-Sethian text that was eventually adopted by Sethians and redacted with Sethian features, as other scholars such as John Turner have argued.

Let us note that just as there are multiple men named James in the New Testament (James the brother of John and James the brother of Jesus), and multiple Judases (Judas Iscariot, Judas Thaddeus, and Judas Thomas Didymus, all of whom Tracy R. Twyman suspects are based on the same person), there are multiple Simons as well (including Simon of Cyrene, Simon Peter, Simon the Zealot and Simon Magus, all of whom we theorize are based on the latter Simon). The claim that Simon of Cyrene helped Jesus carry his cross is most likely the result of misinterpreted teachings by Simon Magus (who, as we mentioned earlier, may even be the inspiration for the character of Paul as well). In Galatians 2:20, Paul states “I am crucified with Christ, ” perhaps a hint at this idea.

Returning to Tracy Twyman ’s theories about the substitution of Jesus on the cross, in The Judas Goat , she goes into the subject of the Judaic rituals of the Passover and Yom Kippur, connecting them not only to the sacrifice of Jesus (naturally), but also Azazel and Baphomet. She brings up what Sir James Frazer wrote in The Golden Bough about the archetype of the sacrificial king, of which the story of the crucifixion of the messiah Jesus is an example. Into this she introduces the idea of a twin king sacrifice (mentioned by Frazer as being a common theme in antiquity). Basically, the concept is that there are two “kings ” who are somehow “twins, ” or at least they metaphorically mirror one another, but one is a dark character, while the other one represents the universal light. The “white ” king has his life sacrificed for the redemption of creation, while the “black ” king takes the blame for the killing and sacrifices his soul. A perfect example would be the sacrifice of Abel, for which Cain took the blame. In the case of Judas Iscariot, he took the blame for the sacrifice of Jesus.

Twyman makes the case that he is probably the same as Judas Thomas (a.k.a. “Thomas Didymus, ” a.k.a. “Judas Thaddeus ”). Since both “Thomas ” and “Didymus ” are words meaning “twin, ” there have been heretics who believed that he was literally Jesus ’ twin (although, if true, it would be quite an oversight for the Gospels not to overtly mention it). But we do know for sure that Judas Thaddeus is a biological brother of Jesus, as the Gospels identify him thusly. We also know that Judas Thomas Didymus and Judas Thaddeus are widely thought to be the same, and are even depicted with the same features in Christian iconography. The Gospel of Barnabus , a medieval forgery influenced by Islam, said that Jesus used magic to make Judas Iscariot appear in his likeness and allowed him to be crucified in his stead.

What Twyman suggests is that this story is an echo of a heretical belief that may have once been held by certain people, in which Thomas, and all of the Judes and Judases, were thought to be the same person: Jesus ’ twin. She suggests that this other character, whether literally his twin, or just metaphorically a second Christ (a black messiah), may have died on the cross, while the real Jesus took his identity and moved on to India, where he was known as Saint Thomas. Eventually, he may have revealed his true identity to some of the Indians, for there are local stories about both Thomas and Jesus (the latter known there as “Saint Isa ”) visiting the region.

Reflecting this possibility, what is most intriguing is Jesus ’ bizarrely intimate relationship with Judas Iscariot, which, Twyman points out, is illustrated in the Gospels. She writes:

The fact that Jesus predicts Judas ’ betrayal, and that Judas does not seem surprised at the accusation, is telling. So too is the fact that Jesus makes no attempt to stop him from doing this, but instead tells him to hurry up and get it over with… . Later that night, when Judas arrives with the Roman guards to arrest him, Jesus is fully aware of what is about to befall him. He allows Judas to come up and identify him to the Romans by kissing him on the cheek, saying “Hail Rabbi. ” Jesus plays his part accordingly, replying, “Judas, betrayest thou the son of Man with a kiss? ” More than that, Jesus is shown as actually rushing out with his disciples to meet Judas and the Roman guards. In Matthew , he wakes his sleeping apostles just before Judas' arrival and says, “Rise, let us be going: behold, he is at hand that doth betray me. ” Thus, many scholars believe that the entire “betrayal ” scenario was concocted, rehearsed, and enacted in collusion between Jesus and Judas.

But it may not have been all an act on Judas ’ part, for as Twyman reveals, Jesus seems to have deliberately infected Judas with a demonic spirit using black magic. In John 13:26-27, Jesus hands Judas a morsel of food, declaring to the other apostles that the person he is giving it to is destined to betray him. As soon as Judas swallows it, “Satan entered into him. ” Then Jesus commands the now- possessed Judas: “What you are going to do, do quickly. ” This is a kind of negative communion. Instead of the Holy Spirit, an evil spirit is introduced into the body, and henceforth this spirit assumes authority there.

Or it may indeed have been the Holy Spirit, for as we have mentioned, not everyone has always thought of the Holy Spirit as being something “nice. ” (The Mandaeans certainly don ’t.) Hammer-Purgstall theorized that it was, to the Gnostics, the same thing as Sophia, and therefore, for the Templars, connected to the female aspect of Baphomet. Also, Judas Thomas and Judas Thaddeus (again, most likely the same person) are both shown in Christian iconography with a flame burning upon the brow, in between the eyes. This is said to represent the Holy Spirit that descended upon him and inspired him with glossolalia (speaking in tongues) during the miracle of the Pentecost. Since Eliphas Levi ’s Baphomet (as well as the goat icon of the Aniza tribe of Arabs, discussed later on) is shown with a flaming torch on his brow in the same spot, in between his horns, we can only assume that this represents the Holy Spirit as well.

Returning to the subject of demonic possession, let us recall that Basilides ’ son Isidore claimed that every human being is surrounded by a multitude of spirits at all times, and these spirits influence the decisions of each person by manipulating their thought patterns at a subliminal level. There is no strict dichotomy of possessed and unpossessed. Rather, each individual is influenced by these attachments to greater and lesser degrees. Clement of Alexandria wrote thusly in Stromata (II.20):

Accordingly, Basilides ’ son himself, Isidorus, in his book, About the Soul , ...

while agreeing in the dogma, as if condemning himself, writes in these words: “For if I persuade any one that the soul is undivided, and that the passions of the wicked are occasioned by the violence of the appendages, the worthless among men will have no slight pretense for saying, ‘I was compelled, I was carried away, I did it against my will, I acted unwillingly; ’ though he himself led the desire of evil things, and did not fight against the assaults of the appendages. But we must, by acquiring superiority in the rational part, show ourselves masters of the inferior creation in us. ”

This sounds a lot like the “body thetans ” of Scientology. The Greek Magical Papyri contains a spell for strength that involves Abraxas. While this is admittedly speculative, we can see that this magical spell may have been used to cast out these spiritual attachments from the user (a self-exorcism?), allowing him to become a god-like being:

“Everyone fears Your Great Might. Grant me the Good Things: The Strength of AKRYSKYLOS, the Speech of EUO ’NOS, the Eyes of Solomon, the Voice of ABRASAX, the Grace of ADO ’NIOS, the God. Come to me, Kypris, every day! The Hidden Name bestowed to You: THOATHOE ’THATHO-

OYTHAETHO ’USTHOAITHITHE ’THOINTHO ’; grant me Victory, Repute, Beauty toward all Men and all Women! ” [PGM XCII.1-16]

Perhaps in this spell, the initiate would actually become Abraxas and, in essence, control his or her fate in the process. In other words, from a theurgical perspective, the theurgist becomes what is invoked. The invocation would essentially dissolve the “egoic self ” of the magician and such a person would become divinized by the indwelling spirit. Stephen Skinner writes in Techniques of Graeco-Egyptian Magic that “theurgy ” and “goetia ” are two different approaches to working magic:

The Greeks made a clear distinction between goetia … the magic of the goes , … and that of theurgia … . It is difficult to be sure of what was exactly meant by the ancient Greeks when they used the term [goetia], as it was associated with rites for the dead. Goetia … and goes … were later used in the sense they acquired in the Latin grimoires of “dealing with spirits, ” rather than in the sense … of “dealing with the dead. ”

Theurgia is a quite separate category, and is a descendant, via Porphyry and Iamblichus of Chalcis, of the ancient Mysteries. This usage has persisted through to 13th century (and later) grimoires. It has been suggested that theurgia , meaning “divine work, ” was a term that might even have been invented by the group of Neoplatonically-inclined magicians, including luminaries like Iamblichus, probably based in Alexandria around the 2nd century CE. The theurgists were concerned with purifying and raising the consciousness of individual practitioners to the point where they could have direct communion with the gods.

The goes , … the practitioner of goetia , … on the other hand, attempts to bring daimones/demons onto the physical plane and to manifest them, or their effects. The relationship of the practitioners of theurgia to practitioners of the goetia is that both attempt to invoke/evoke a spiritual creature (be it god, daimon, angel or demon). The teletai … priest does it for the benefit of the client ’s immortal soul while the goes does it to benefit the client ’s material desires.

In Plaster Perspectives on “Magical Gems ”: Rethinking the Meaning of “Magic ” in Cornell ’s Dactyliotheca, Caitlin E. Barrett takes a more historical perspective on magic:

Originally derived from magos (a word referring to Persian priests), the terms mageia and magia could describe a wide range of practices, including the use of potions and drugs, the casting of binding spells, the practice of necromancy, the control of natural phenomena, and more. One of the things these seemingly diverse actions had in common was their stigmatization: for the most part, mageia and magia had negative connotations. In the Roman empire, many types of magic were illegal and punishable with severe penalties, such as death or exile. Even when not illegal, actions classifiable as mageia or magia typically incurred social disapproval—despite the fact that many such activities, such as the casting of binding spells, appear to have been extremely common in practice.

Not surprisingly, this is exactly how Irenaeus describes the Gnostic followers of Basilides in Against Heresies (1:24.5-6):

These men, moreover, practise magic; and use images, incantations, invocations, and every other kind of curious art. Coining also certain names as if they were those of the angels, they proclaim some of these as belonging to the first, and others to the second heaven; and then they strive to set forth the names, principles, angels, and powers of the three hundred and sixty-five imagined heavens. They also affirm that the barbarous name in which the Saviour ascended and descended, is Caulacau. He, then, who has learned [these things], and known all the angels and their causes, is rendered invisible and incomprehensible to the angels and all the powers, even as Caulacau also was.

For these Gnostics, “Caulacau ” was, as Ireneaus states, actually a secret barbarous name for Jesus Christ. At Jesus8880.com, Daniel Gleason writes about isopsephia (the ancient Greek practice of gematria in which hidden meaning is found based on the numerical values of Greek letters):

Basilides was absolutely famous for combining mathematics with religion. Orthodox Christians viewed the practice of isopsephia as a kind of “number magic ” and the graphing of diagrams (images) as “another kind of curious art. ” There are three isopsehia riddles hidden in Irenaeus ’ account: The barbarous name “Caulacau ” is a pun on Isaiah 28:9-13 which reads … “To whom would God impart knowledge (gnosis)? To whom would he convey the message? … [F]or them the Word of the Lord shall be: command upon command, line upon line, here a little there a little. ” The Hebrew pronunciation for the words “command ” and “line ” is SAU-LASAU and CAU-LACAU! Amazingly, it appears no one before me has bothered to compute the isopsephia value of the Greek spelling for the name Cau-la- cau (Kaeu-lae-kaeu). The answer is “888, ” the same number as Jesus! The “coined name ” Caulacau is thus a clever Gnostic riddle that equates the name Jesus with gnosis (knowledge)!

The father of Neo-Platonism, named Plotinus, also similarly described the Gnostics as “magicians ” and “sorcerers ” for using the barbarous names for the Ineffable in his polemic in the Ennead 2.9, titled “Against the Gnostics: Against Those That Affirm the Creator of the Cosmos and the Cosmos Itself to Be Evil ”:

In the sacred formulas they inscribe, purporting to address the Supernal

Beings —not merely the Soul but even the Transcendents — they are simply uttering spells and appeasements and evocations in the idea that these Powers will obey a call and be led about by a word from any of us who is in some degree trained to use the appropriate forms in the appropriate way — certain melodies, certain sounds, specially directed breathings, sibilant cries, and all else to which is ascribed magic potency upon the Supreme. Perhaps they would repudiate any such intention: still they must explain how these things act upon the unembodied: they do not see that the power they attribute to their own words is so much taken away from the majesty of the divine.

Plotinus resented the Gnostics ' demonization of Plato 's Demiurge, the creator of the material cosmos. Plotinus believed the Gnostics had corrupted the original teachings of Plato to suit their world-views. In fact, Plotinus goes as far as to mock the Gnostic creation story of the fall of Sophia and the aborted Demiurge as surpassing "sheer folly. " Plotinus also took issue with the Gnostics ' neglect of the pursuit of virtue, maintaining themselves as beyond reproach of the laws of the world. His view is of course influenced by the rumors of their supposed hedonistic and libertine tendencies. He wrote:

For they manufacture these doctrines as though they were not in contact with the ancient thought of the Greeks; for the Greeks knew, and spoke clearly without pomposity, of ascents from the cave, coming closer and closer by gradual stages to a truer vision.

This was a problem for Plotinus, who thought these Platonizing Sethian Gnostics were mucking-up philosophy with their static dualism, world-hatred, and defamation of the creator. Plotinus caricatured the Sethians as rubes for practicing magic. Needless to say, many Neoplatonists such as him didn 't like Gnostics very much (despite the obvious similarities between the two groups). Yet the Sethian Gnostics weren 't a unified movement, but rather a diverse set of small cult communities —the Borborites, Archontics, Ophites, etc.

Neither Plotinus nor Irenaeus were lying about the Gnostics ’ ritual magic tendencies, since their texts indicate this interest. These Gnostic magicians more than likely invoked the name of Abraxas among other barbarous, secret names of God. On the Origin of the World contains a compendium of demon names that is attributed to King Solomon, so it is possible that some Gnostics practiced early Solomonic magic. The text explains that when Sabaoth was redeemed, Ialdabaoth, “the prime parent of chaos ” immediately became jealous of his son ’s stature and created Death (i.e. Samael), taking the place of Sabaoth in the sixth heaven while creating lesser demons:

Then Death, being androgynous, mingled with his (own) nature and begot seven androgynous offspring. These are the names of the male ones: Jealousy, Wrath, Tears, Sighing, Suffering, Lamentation, Bitter Weeping.

And these are the names of the female ones: Wrath, Pain, Lust, Sighing, Curse, Bitterness, Quarrelsomeness. They had intercourse with one another, and each one begot seven, so that they amount to forty-nine androgynous demons. Their names and their effects you will find in the Book of Solomon .

“Their effects ” probably meant the abilities they could be compelled to use if summoned, like in The Goetia . The “Book of Solomon ” referred to here could very well be the same as, or an earlier version of, The Testament of Solomon .

Another example of spells and incantations that were employed by Gnostics is provided by Karen King in What is Gnosticism ?, where she talks about the demonic correspondences to human body parts listed so thoroughly in the long recension of The Apocryphon of John (highlighting the inherent corruption of the body), which was intended for use in rituals to heal the sick or injured. On the Origin of the World also perpetuates the idea that demons are associated with the passions of the flesh. It says:

This ignorance, my child, is the first torment; the second is grief; the third is incontinence; the fourth, lust; the fifth, injustice; the sixth, greed; the seventh, deceit; the eighth, envy; the ninth, treachery; the tenth, anger; the eleventh, recklessness; the twelfth, malice. These are twelve in number, but under them are many more besides, my child, and they use the prison of the body to torture the inward person with the sufferings of sense. Yet they withdraw (if not all at once) from one to whom God has shown mercy, and this is the basis of rebirth, the means and method.

We also see similar ideas being promoted by Zosimos in The Final Quittance , where he encourages his disciple Theosebeia to be initiated in the mysteries of Poimandres (Hermes) and to baptize herself in the Hermetic bowl of Mind. Here is the relevant passage, as quoted by GRS Mead in Thrice-Greatest Hermes , Vol. 3:

But be not thou, O lady, [thus] distracted, as, too, I bade thee in the actualizing [rites], and do not turn thyself about this way and that in seeking after God; but in thy house be still, and God shall come to thee, He who is everywhere and not in some wee spot as are daimonian things. And having stilled thyself in body, still thou thyself in passions too —desire, [and] pleasure, rage [and] grief, and the twelve fates of Death. And thus set straight and upright, call thou unto thyself Divinity; and truly shall He come, He who is everywhere and [yet] nowhere. And [then], without invoking them, perform the sacred rites unto the daimones, —not such as offer things to them and soothe and nourish them, but such as turn them from thee and destroy their power, which Mambres taught to Solomon, King of Jerusalem, and all that Solomon himself wrote down from his own wisdom.

And if thou shalt effectively perform these rites, thou shalt obtain the physical conditions of pure birth. And so continue till thou perfect thy soul completely. And when thou knowest surely that thou art perfected in thyself, then spurn … from thee the natural things of matter, and make for harbour in Poemandres ’ arms, and having dowsed thyself within His Cup, return again unto thy own [true] race.

As we saw earlier in the previous chapter, Epiphanius conflated the myth of the lewd Sophia or “Prunikos ” with that of Barbelo of Sethian Gnosticism (which is the female hypostatized version of the highest divine realm outside of the Father). There she sets out to collect and “reabsorb ” the living sparks of power that were stolen from her by her retarded son, Ialdabaoth and his legion of Archons. She appeared to the Archons in a beautiful form, seduced them, and took their sperm, which contained the power originally belonging to her. (Recall that the she-demon Lilith was also believed to steal sperm from human males as they slept.) Epiphanius repeats this in further detail in Panarion (1:21, 2, 2:5) by connecting the Barbelo myth with the story of Simon Magus and his consort Helena:

For these angels went to war over the power from on high — they call her Prunicus, but she is called Barbero or Barbelo by other sects —because she displayed her beauty [and] drove them wild, and was sent for this purpose, to despoil the archons who had made this world. She has suffered no harm, but she brought them to the point of slaughtering each other from the lust for her that she aroused in them. And detaining her so that she should not go back up, they all had relations with her in each of her womanly and female bodies —for she kept migrating from female bodies into various bodies of human beings, cattle and the rest —so that, by the deeds they were doing in killing and being killed, they would cause their own diminution through the shedding of blood. Then, by gathering the power again, she would be able to ascend to heaven once more… .

But others honor one “Prunicus ” and like these, when they consummate their own passions with this kind of disgusting behavior, they say in mythological language of this interpretation of their disgusting behavior, “We are gathering the power of Prunicus from our bodies, and through their emissions. ” That is, [they suppose they are gathering] the power of semen and menses… . For if they say, “Prunicus, ” this is just a belch of lustfulness and incontinence. Anything called “prunicus ” suggests a thing named for copulation, and the enterprise of seduction.

Despite the strong erotic imagery used in Gnostic myth, many Gnostic texts, such as The Pistis Sophia (147:387), explicitly condemn the practices of ritually consuming sperm, menstrual blood, and fetal embryos in the strongest terms. In that book, a certain question put to Jesus by Thomas concerning such matters relates directly to the story in Genesis 25 of Jacob and Esau (the latter selling his “birthright ” to the former for red lentil porridge). We read:

Thomas said: “We have heard that there are some on the earth who take the male seed and the female monthly blood, and make it into a lentil porridge and eat it, saying: ‘We have faith in Esau and Jacob. ’ Is this then seemly or not? ”

Jesus was wroth with the world in that hour and said unto Thomas: “Amen, I say: This sin is more heinous than all sins and iniquities. Such men will straightway be taken into the outer darkness and not be cast back anew into the sphere, but they shall perish, be destroyed in the outer darkness in a region where there is neither pity nor light, but howling and grinding of teeth. And all the souls which shall be brought into the outer darkness, will not be cast back anew, but will be destroyed and dissolved. ”

The passage above certainly reflects a time in late antiquity when Gnostics were being accused of such activities. Here Jesus says that there will be no mercy for people who do this, and that they will not enter the bridal chamber with Sophia and the Savior, but will inherit the “outer darkness ” instead. The second book of the Gnostic Jeu , Chapter 43, also condemns this practice. However, groups like the Barbelites felt that by these practices, “light ” contained in their sexual emissions could be released back to the Supreme God, and therefore bypass the reproductive system that added more souls to bodies under the authority of the wrathful Jehovah.

Another writer, Roger Pearse, in his article “Summing up the ancient accounts of the Borborites-Phibionites, ” points out that spreading rumors of ritual orgies being practiced by one ’s religious enemies isn ’t exactly a new practice:

The testimony of Epiphanius has often been impugned, and for obvious reasons. For his description of a communion ritual which involves fornication and eating babies is uncomfortably like the accusation made against the Christians, and rebutted by Athenagoras (c.31-36) and Tertullian (Apol . 7). Origen tells us that Jews accused Christians of immorality and eating babies (Contra Celsum 6, 27). Mandaean heretics also accused Christians of ritual horrors (Right Ginza IX = Lidzbarski 227, 8 ff.)

In turn similar accusations are made against Montanists by Epiphanius (Pan . 48.14.6) and Cyril of Jerusalem (Cat. 16, 18), although queried by Jerome (Ep. 41, 4.1) and in Praedestinatus (chap. 26). Augustine accuses the Manichaeans of the same in De haeresibus 46. Even Tertullian, as a Montanist, accuses some Catholics of immoral agapes (De ieiunio 17)

It seems possible that the aborted baby-eating story really does reflect something real, something tried once and found revolting and not done again, and told to the young Epiphanius (and quite possibly misunderstood by him). Life was cheap. Those involved in ancient magic might do horrible things, and at the low end of society, there might not be a great distance between a gnostic, a sorcerer, or a wandering sophist-cum-conman. We are entirely familiar today with those who try to push the boundaries, to gain notoriety. But then again … maybe it was just a cheap rumour, circulating at the time, and included willy-nilly by Epiphanius.

At this time … we cannot tell. In the end, his statement cannot be confirmed or refuted. Perhaps we should simply leave it at that.

It is probable that a few of these cults embraced these practices, and were lumped together with Gnostics by their enemies. The Valentinian Christians, especially Marcus the Magician, were accused of seducing women from their congregation by Irenaeus, but there is no mention of the spermatic mass in his report. In Against Heresies , Irenaeus claimed Marcus the Magician to be a “precursor of the Antichrist, ” (“Satan ” being his “true father ”), and a “follower ” of the “fallen and mighty angel Azazel ” who had been initiated by the “Magi. ” Irenaeus said of him that “he is regarded by his senseless and cracked-brain followers as working miracles by these means. ” As you can tell, Irenaeus didn ’t particularly like Marcus. One member of the Catholic clergy, Justin Martyr (c. 110 –160) who lived during the height of the heretics, regarded the rumors against them with skepticism, writing in 1 Apology 26 to the Roman Emperor Antoninus Pius:

Whether they perpetuate those fabulous and shameful deeds —the upsetting of the lamp, and promiscuous intercourse, and eating human flesh —we know not.

(As previously noted, this “upsetting of the lamp ” may be the same practice represented in one of the alleged “Templar ” images discovered by Hammer-Purgstall, which depicts a woman using a vase of water to extinguish the candles on a menorah.)

So we find that Justin himself was skeptical of the rumors being spread against the Christians. In Celsus ’ refutation of Christianity, he claims the “Christians ” (who were really the Ophites) were a secret society that practiced sorcery, sexual immorality and cannibalism. Writers like Justin Martyr and Tertullian were simply trying to deflect these rumors, while condemning the Romans for their own perversions.

Returning to the subject of Abraxas, in The Seven Sermons of the Dead , Carl Jung refers to the figure as an “emergence ” of form from the hidden depth of the Godhead. He says that it embodies opposing powers that are fused together into a sort of yin/yang relationship:

Abraxas is the god whom it is difficult to know. His power is the very greatest, because man does not perceive it at all. Man sees the supreme good of the sun, and also the endless evil of the devil, but Abraxas, he does not see, for he is undefinable life itself, which is the mother of good and evil alike… . Abraxas is the sun and also the eternally gaping abyss of emptiness, of the diminisher and dissembler, the devil. The power of Abraxas is twofold. You can not see it, because in your eyes the opposition of this power seems to cancel it out. That which is spoken by God-the-Sun is life; that which is spoken by the Devil is death. Abraxas, however, speaks the venerable and also accursed word, which is life and death at once. Abraxas generates truth and falsehood, good and evil, light and darkness with the same word and in the same deed. Therefore Abraxas is truly the terrible one. He is magnificent even as the lion at the very moment when he strikes his prey down. His beauty is like the beauty of a spring morn.

Readers are often in awe at the sheer uniqueness of this text when compared with other more typical Gnostic writings. For example, whereas Gnostic tradition describes the “Pleroma ” as the fullness of Light and the Aeons, this text calls it a void in which nothing and everything cancel each other out. In Jung ’s view, existence (creatura) happens only outside of the Pleroma. The greatest of all the existent beings is “Abraxas, ” who is described by Jung as the Pleroma manifest as God. The most interesting aspect of this doctrine is that Abraxas is the soul in which “God ” and “Devil ” intersect. Whereas most Gnostic traditions say that salvation means returning to the Pleroma, this text says instead that each person has their own god that corresponds to one of the stars in the heavens, and that it is through them that people will receive their salvation. (This is reminiscent of Aleister Crowley ’s proclamation in the channeled Book of the Law , written 12 years earlier, that “Every man and every woman is a star. ”) There seems to be a warning in the text to avoid Abraxas and seek the personal god instead.

According to H. G. Baynes ’ introduction to the 1916 edition, Carl Jung actually attributed the Sermons to several different historical figures:

In the original journal account of the revelation (Black Book 6) Jung himself is the voice speaking the Seven Sermons to the Dead . In the version transcribed into the Red Book manuscript, Jung gives Philemon as the voice speaking the Sermons. Interestingly, a few pages later, on the last page of the Red Book manuscript, Philemon is identified with the historical Gnostic prophet Simon Magus. When Jung subsequently transcribed the Sermons for printing as an independent text, the Sermons were attributed pseudepigraphically to yet another historical second century Gnostic teacher, Basilides of Alexandria. Thus Jung, Philemon, Simon Magus, and Basilides are all finally conflated together in the voice of the Gnostic prophet who speaks the Septem Sermones ad Mortuos .

As we have said, in the Sermons , Abraxas is said to be the supreme existent deity, containing within itself all good and evil, as well as everything and nothing. The “Pleroma ” is said to be a form of nothing because the everything and the nothing cancel each other out. Here is a quote from Sermon I :

Harken: I begin with nothingness. Nothingness is the same as fullness. In infinity full is no better than empty. Nothingness is both empty and full. As well might ye say anything else of nothingness, as for instance, white is it, or black, or again, it is not, or it is. A thing that is infinite and eternal hath no qualities, since it hath all qualities.

This nothingness or fullness we name the PLEROMA. Therein both thinking and being cease, since the eternal and infinite possess no qualities. In it no being is, for he then would be distinct from the pleroma, and would possess qualities which would distinguish him as something distinct from the pleroma.

In the pleroma there is nothing and everything. It is quite fruitless to think about the pleroma, for this would mean self-dissolution.

Abraxas in this sense was just one of the many symbols Jung would use to represent the ancient doctrine of Coniunctio Oppositorum (the Conjunction of Opposites). Jung ’s Gnostic vision of 1916, with its bipolar Abraxas, written under the persona of Basilides, has virtually no connection to the actual teachings of the historical Basilides. Jung claimed that Abraxas was the embodiment of the Monad, whereas the ancient heretics viewed Abraxas as a lower aeon or even an Archon. Abraxas, like Baphomet, becomes a “syzygy ” of an alchemical pair conjoined, combining good and evil, darkness and light, Christ and Antichrist, God and the Devil. The symbolism involved is similar to that of the Tree of Knowledge of Good and Evil in Genesis . Abraxas could also be seen as a synthesis of Michael the Archangel and the Great Dragon of Revelation 12:9. (“And the great dragon was cast out, that old serpent, called the Devil, and Satan, which deceiveth the whole world… . ”)

So you can see that there is considerable discrepancy between the Western occult view, which seeks a union of opposites as the ultimate goal, and Gnostic systems that seek to separate light from darkness through purification. This issue is muddied even further by Carl Jung, who associates Gnosticism with his doctrine of Coniunctio Oppositorum . There weren ’t very many “Gnostic ” texts available during Jung ’s time, so perhaps that ’s why he projects so many of his own views on to the concept of Gnosticism.

When viewed through a dualist lens, the intermingling of good and evil is in actuality the fall from Eden, the tragedy that gave rise to human suffering and all the world ’s horrors. The classical Gnostics viewed spirit as the original unity, with matter being a shallow imitation of this higher reality. In this estimation, the light is seen as the only eternal principle, while the world of matter is simply a passing shadow, a temporary setback or foul-up in the scheme of infinity that will eventually be rectified. A more radical interpretation of dualism, found in the Manichean Gnostic religion (and in the Persian religion of Zoroastrianism that preceded it), has light and darkness existing as co-eternal yet independent principles, each with their own domain, in a constant duel.

This dichotomy is for the most part rejected by modern Western occultists due to its association with the mainstream Judeo-Christian tradition, which they consider deficient. But the fact remains that many Gnostics sects, and those later influenced by them (such as the Cathars), considered themselves foremost to be Christians, and recognized the difference between sin and righteousness. To embrace the classical Gnostic tradition means to embrace their dualist perspective. It is simply impossible to separate such perspectives from Gnosticism with disdain, as many modern occultists attempt to do when incorporating Gnosticism into their own self-made, heterodox world-views. In Liber Tzaddi vel Hamus Hermeticus sub figura XC , Aleister Crowley explains a concept very similar to that of Carl Jung ’s Coniunctio Oppositorum, stating:

Many have arisen, being wise. They have said ‘Seek out the glittering Image in the place ever golden, and unite yourselves with it. ’ Many have arisen, being foolish. They have said, ‘Stoop down into the darkly splendid world and be wedded to that Blind Creature of the Slime. ’ I who am beyond Wisdom and Folly, arise and say unto you: achieve both weddings! Unite yourselves with both! Beware, beware, I say lest you seek after the one and lose the other! My adepts stand upright; their head above the heavens, their feet below the hells. But since one is naturally attracted to the Angel, another to the Demon, let the first strengthen the lower link, the last attach more firmly to the higher. Thus shall equilibrium become perfect. I will aid my disciples; as fast as they acquire this balanced power and joy so faster will I push them.

Baphomet, like Abraxas, is a perfect hieroglyph to represent this sentiment, and the conjunction of opposites that he embodies (not only the union of good and evil, but the androgynous balance of the genders as well) is believed by ceremonial magicians to be an altered state of consciousness that allows one to tap into innate superhuman abilities. But if you know anybody into the occult, chances are high that you know somebody who, despite what they may say openly, tends to gravitate towards the darker side of things, delighting in control over others. In Magic: Book 4 , Crowley writes gleefully about using this transcendental power to make slaves of the angels and demons of the universe, encouraging his students to:

Master everything, but give generously to your servants, once they have unconditionally submitted.

In Transcendental Magic , Eliphas Levi wrote about the use of the power of “the Devil ” in black magic, calling it “the Great Magical Agent, ” similar to the term “Universal Agent ” that he used to describe Baphomet in the previously-quoted section from Magic: A History of Its Rites, Rituals and Mysteries . But in this passage, he warns that calling up Satan could bring negative results:

IN BLACK MAGIC, THE DEVIL is THE GREAT MAGICAL AGENT EMPLOYED FOR EVIL PURPOSES BY A PERVERSE WILL. The old serpent of the legend is nothing else than the BLACK MAGIC, universal agent, the eternal fire of terrestrial life, the soul of the earth, and the living fount of hell. We have said that the astral light is the receptacle of forms, and these when evoked by reason are produced harmoniously, but when evoked by madness they appear disorderly and monstrous; so originated the nightmares of St. Anthony and the phantoms of the Sabbath. Do, therefore, the evocations of goetia and demonomania possess a practical result? Yes, certainly one which cannot be contested, one more terrible than could be recounted by legends! When any one invokes the devil with intentional ceremonies, the devil comes, and is seen. To escape dying from horror at the sight, to escape catalepsy or idiocy, one must be already mad.

Recall that in the confessions of the Templars, several knights said that they were profoundly affected by seeing the terrible visage of the Baphomet head. But as terrifying as it can be, Eliphas Levi nonetheless lauds the power that can be utilized with the Universal Agent, ” writing in Transcendental Magic that:

… having equilibrium for its supreme law, while its direction is concerned immediately with the Great Arcanum of Transcendental Magic… .This agent … is precisely that which the adepts of the Middle Ages denominated the First Matter of the Great Work. The Gnostics represented it as the fiery body of the Holy Spirit; it was the object of adoration in the Secret Rites of the Sabbath and the Temple, under the hieroglyphic figure of Baphomet or the Androgyne of Mendes.

Then later on he adds:

The symbolic head of the goat of Mendes is occasionally given to this figure, and it is then the Baphomet of the Templars and the Word of the Gnostics.

Elsewhere in this same book Levi describes the agent as “a horse having nature analogous to a chameleon, ever reflecting the armor of his rider. ” So the Universal Agent is whatever the magician makes of it, subject to the same strengths and weaknesses that he possesses. This goes along with another description Levi gave of it as a “universal plastic mediator, ” the word “plastic ” meaning, literally, “capable of shaping or molding. ” In this case, the Universal Agent conforms to the mold projected by the will of the magician.

Yet the analogy of horse and rider, when used in relation to the subject of demonic possession, is usually employed the other way around: the person is the horse, and the demon is riding him. (This is actually the terminology used by practitioners of Voudon.) But the role of a magician is of one who controls the spirits, rather than letting them control him, as Solomon is said to have done with the power of his magic ring. In that case, the magician becomes the rider, and the demon is the horse. This same concept may have given rise to the terms “riding the Dragon ” (used in Bram Stoker ’s novel Dracula to describe the mastering of occult power) and “riding the Goat ” (a Masonic term to be discussed more later). We must wonder then what was meant by one of the seals frequently used by the Knights Templar, featuring two knights riding one horse. Also consider that Azazel, in The Zohar , is called the “rider on the serpent ” because he acts as the intermediary to connect Lilith and Samael sexually.

It appears that this perceived ability to control the spirits of the ether with the Universal Agent is a matter of tapping into, as we have said, powers both infernal and divine, and thus, necessarily, powers associated both with the Devil and God in the Bible. When we examine the research of Stuart Nettleton in The Alchemy Key: Unraveling the Single Tangible Secret In All Mysteries we find, again, more evidence that Baphomet may have been seen as the key to both, or as Nettleton terms it, the “intercessor between Jehovah and the Messiah. ” He even compares the role played by Baphomet to that usually taken by the Virgin Mary in Christian theology! Using the Atbash cipher with Hebrew, he discovered the following:

The Atbash Cipher produces BphOM from Jehovah (YHWH). Using the Cipher once more, Baphomet (BPhOMTh) leads to Yahushua (YHWShO), which means The Messiah… . Baphomet is therefore the partner of Jehovah and route to the Messiah. Thus, Baphomet figuratively gives birth to the Messiah from Jehovah. Baphomet therefore fulfills the age-old role of the Mother Goddess in the old sacrificial king rituals. She is Wisdom or Sophia, who brings forth the son of perfection. Thus, the repeated use of the Atbash Cipher through Baphomet, gives the same answer as the straightforward method, Sophia. Baphomet is therefore equivalent to the Shema or understanding that unites the one with God. This is the Shekhinah or the Virgin with Child.

So in this sense Baphomet is not only Sophia, but the Demiurge she gave birth to as well. This connects Baphomet again with Abraxas, who also seems to be an avatar of the Demiurge. This might explain why Aleister Crowley referred to Baphomet as the “Lion and the Serpent, ” since Ialdabaoth was represented by the Gnostics as a lion with a serpent ’s tail. But can these two, diametrically- opposed figures be combined? What has the God of the Bible to do with the goat god? As we ponder this, let us also reflect on the supposedly “erroneous ” translation in St. Jerome ’s Latin Vulgate version of Exodus 34:29-30, in which the “face ” of Moses becomes “horned ” after talking to God:

And when Moses came down from the Mount Sinai, he held the two tables of the testimony, and he knew not that his face was horned from the conversation of the Lord. And Aaron and the children of Israel seeing the face of Moses horned, were afraid to come near.

Actually, though, it was not a mistranslation at all, and Jerome even left commentary explaining it. The word he translated as “horn ” is keren , which also means “radiant. ” Thus, in the King James translation, it simply says “the skin of his face shone, ” and presumably because of the overbearing brightness, other people “were afraid to come nigh ” until “he put a vail on his face. ” But at that time, horns were considered a crown of divine glory, as they were featured on the heads of so many of the gods of the ancient world. Jerome (who said he had consulted rabbinical scholars specifically about this word) was trying to imply both meanings simultaneously (both horns and radiant light). This is why Moses has been depicted in classic works of art with rays of light projecting from his head like horns, as in Dore ’s drawing, and on the “Moses Fountain ” in Bern, Switzerland. Michelangelo famously sculpted Moses with regular horns, which made him look like a satyr. According to Louis Ginzberg ’s Legends of the Jews , there is a story of Moses visiting Hell and Paradise while on the mountaintop with God, where he was guided by an “angel with the horns of glory. ” Interestingly, Moses was able to enter Hell without being burned because he had been cauterized with a baptism of divine fire that protected him. As the horned angel told him:

There is a fire that not only burns but also consumes, and that fire will protect thee against hell fire, so that thou canst step upon it, and yet thou wilt not be seared.

So is this the meaning of the “baptism of fire ” that John the Baptist said the one who came after him would bring? Is it a fire that “consumes ” you, but somehow protects you from hellfire? Tobias Churton reports that Mandaeans believe John ’s body could not be burned by fire. Analyzing Saint Paul ’s interpretation of the baptism of fire, he writes that Paul felt that:

> … The Holy Spirit [received through the] baptism of fire … sustains the soul through the fire of judgment… . [It was] both destroyer of chaff and quickener of righteous spirit: a kind of winnowing.

We have mentioned previously the prophecies found in Judeo-Christian scripture promising that the world will be destroyed by not just one, but two coming cataclysms, one of fire and one of water. Fulcanelli suggests that each disaster will affect one of the hemispheres of the globe. Several writers have purported that John ’s baptism of water was meant to be a sort of prophylactic to protect the recipient against drowning in the coming deluge, while the baptism of fire would protect against the coming conflagration. As we read in Orpheus the Fisher by Robert Eisler:

The Messianic baptism of fire, foretold by John, is nothing else than the Last Judgment of humanity in “the Day that cometh burning like an oven ” [The Book of Malachi 4:1]. As his baptism in water is not simply identical with the final deluge, which is to purify the world, but a symbolic and, for the repentant ones, an apotropaic [warding off evil influences] and protective anticipation of it, even so does he expect that the “Mightier One ” coming after him will purge the righteous remnant of Israel, “like a refiner, ” in a baptism of fire, so that then they shall be proof as gold against the flame, which is to exterminate the sinners.

He then quotes from Malachi 3:1-3, in which, as we read from the King James translation, God tells us through his prophet:

Behold, I will send my messenger, and he shall prepare the way before me… . For he is like a refiner ’s fire… . And he shall sit as a refiner and purifier of silver: and he shall purify the sons of Levi, and purge them as gold and silver, that they may offer unto the Lord an offering in righteousness.

Now is this special fire that protects from hellfire connected to Baphomet, Abraxas, and the Universal Agent? According to Levi (Transcendental Magic), the answer is yes. There is also yet another mysterious alchemical name for it too. He calls it:

AZOTH, universal magnesia, the great magical agent, the astral light, the light of life, fertilized by animic force, by intellectual energy, which they compare to sulphur on account of its affinities with divine fire.

So it seems that, if this isn ’t exactly the divine fire (the Holy Spirit), it is the closest thing that a magician can get his hands on, and serves a similar purpose for him. You may recall a scene at the end of the horror film The Ninth Gate , when the villain, a Satanic magician, lights himself on fire, believing that because of the power he got from the Devil, the flames will not burn him (a trick which works for a few minutes and then fails him). Perhaps he thought he had doused himself in a protective coating of Azoth.

This substance is described by Levi as being omnipresent, in everything, filling all space between the magician and the intended object. In alchemy it is called the “quintessence, ” the “Philosophic Mercurial, and even “Sophia Mercurius. ” It is the “panacea ” or “universal medicine ” that cures everything, as it heals the separation between creation and the creator. Julius Evola, in The Hermetic Tradition , also describes the Philosophical Mercury (quoting the Filum Ariadnae) as:

“… a chimera that lives only in the imagination. It is on the rule of Fire that everything depends. ” And we need hardly belabor the fact that this is not vulgar, physical fire.

The subject of Azoth was written about very thoroughly in the book Liber

Azoth by the alchemist Paracelsus, who was also a physician, astronomer, botanist, and all-around Renaissance man. Legend has it that he made his own Azoth and kept it stored in the pommel of his sword. Apparently he wanted to always have a good dose of the stuff handy in case he got injured or sick. The name Azoth represents totality because it starts with "A ", which is the first letter in most alphabets, and end with "z ", "o, " and "th, " which are the final letters of the Latin, Greek, and Hebrew alphabets. In The Emerald Tablet: Alchemy for Personal Transformation , Dennis William Hauck explains that:

The word is meant to embrace the full meaning of [the alchemical operation], which is both the chaotic First matter at the beginning of the Work and the perfected Stone at its conclusion.

At the same time, it is also thought to be related to the Arabic al-za 'buq, meaning "the mercury. " Also, we should note, the Hebrew word for a he-goat is "Az, " which brings up obvious connections to Azazel and Baphomet.

The famous German alchemist Basil Valentine first wrote about this subject in the 1659 book Azoth of the Philosophers . In it there is a famous illustration of Azoth as a chimera creature. It is a sort of platter on which all of the elements of the universe are arranged in harmony, with a bearded, slightly leonine face in the middle, human arms coming out of the sides, and human legs on the bottom. On top are the wings usually found on a caduceus (they appear to be attached to a pole jutting out from the crown of the head). Between the legs is the white cubic Philosopher 's Stone, labeled "Corpus " ("the Body "). So Azoth, like Abraxas and Baphomet, can be thought of as a living being that contains the magical power of the universe, as it contains everything that exists (and perhaps, like Abraxas, even nonexistence itself).

So here we are yet again on the subject of the unity of dual, seemingly opposite currents. In the article "Baphomet and the Azoth " by Soror KTK at pyramidlodge.org, the author connects Azoth with the twin snake legs of Abraxas and with the caduceus:

The Great Magical Agent is a “double-current of light ” which Levi best likes to represent as a serpent: the dual serpent of the caduceus, the serpent of Genesis , the brazen serpent of Moses, the serpent twined around the Tau (which he sees as a symbol of the generating lingam), the Gnostic Hyle, the twin serpents forming the legs of Abraxas, and the Oroboros serpent, which he relates to prudence and Saturn.

In the Hermetic Nag Hammadi Codex On the Ogdoad and Ennead , commonly known as Discourse on the Eighth and Ninth , it mentions that the origin of holy names like Zoxathazo (found in Nag Hammadi Codex VI) —which sound very similar to Zothaxathoz (found in Greek Magical Papyrus XIII), and presumably the countless similar names in The Books of Jeu —may have their roots in permutations of the Greek words zoe (life) and thanatos (death). If these words in any way inspired the creation of the word Azoth, it would make since, as they all seem to contain a synthesis of two opposing forces, just like Baphomet and Abraxas. We are reminded, again, of William Blake ’s classic poem The Marriage of Heaven and Hell , which describes the same kind of fusion of contradictory symbols. There we find the following lines (emphasis added):

Prisons are built with stones of Law, Brothels with bricks of Religion. The pride of the peacock is the glory of God. The lust of the goat is the bounty of God. The wrath of the lion is the wisdom of God . The nakedness of woman is the work of God. Excess of sorrow laughs. Excess of joy weeps.

Time and again we have been told by the authors of occult books that a magician, if he is to master this deadly power, must fully transform his consciousness or purify his soul into the “One Thing, ” the ultimate goal of the alchemical operation described in the Emerald Tablet of Hermes. Albert Pike explains it in Morals and Dogma :

The Great Work is, above all things, the creation of man by himself; that is to say, the full and entire conquest which he effects of his faculties and his future. It is, above all, the perfect emancipation of his will, which assures him the universal empire of Azoth, and the domain of magnetism, that is, complete power over the universal magical agent.

In his books Liber Null and Psychonaut , Peter Carroll has advice for anyone wishing to work with Baphomet to perform ritual magic. Carroll is one of the main proponents of the practice of “chaos magick, ” which is built on the idea that the subconscious mind is the primary generator of the reality that each individual experiences. Although this reality is subjective, the understanding is that this is still somehow connected to external reality, and that via the principles of “sympathetic magic, ” the chaotic elements of the universe will align to conform to the pattern of symbols expressed in a ritual, thus influencing objective reality according to the magician ’s will. This model is deeply influenced by The Greek Magical Papyri , as well as The Pyramid Texts and The Egyptian Book of the Dead .

Before performing such rituals, Carroll advocates reaching a state of “Gnosis ” through the means of yoga, tantric sex, psychoactive substances, chanting, drumming, dancing, and lucid dreaming. The trick, supposedly, is to concentrate on an abstract idea of one ’s expressed desire while using the altered state of consciousness to bring forth the powers of creation that allegedly slumber in the subconscious mind, resulting, hopefully, in the manifestation of what is desired. Chaos magick embraces the same moral philosophy expressed by Assassin chief Hassan-i-Sabbah (as we mentioned earlier): “Nothing is true, everything is permitted. ” Since reality is pliable, in this view, you can make of it what you will.

One of the techniques suggested by Carroll is “sigil magick, ” developed by the British occultist and artist Austin Osman Spare in the early twentieth century.

By the goat and ritual orgy motifs in some of his art, it seems that Spare also tapped into the Baphometic current, which makes sense considering that he was heavily influenced by his contemporary and fellow countryman, Aleister Crowley (who literally called himself Baphomet). Sigil magick requires no elaborate tools or regalia, just a pen and paper. It quite simply consists of making hieroglyphs out of the letters used to form words that express the purpose of the spell being cast, after all vowels and redundant letters have been removed. The resulting symbol is then meditated upon to imprint the subconscious mind with the desire and to bring it into manifestation.

Pertinent to our inquiry, Peter Carroll suggests that a would-be chaos magician should visualize himself as Baphomet while chanting the following “aeonic litany ”:

In the first aeon, I was the Great Spirit

In the second aeon, Men knew me as the Horned God, Pangenitor Panphage

In the third aeon, I was the Dark one, the Devil

In the fourth aeon, Men know me not, for I am the Hidden One

In this new aeon, I appear before you as Baphomet, The God before all gods who shall endure to the end of the Earth.

This is very similar to the spell from The Greek Magical Papyri mentioned earlier, where the magician attempts to personally take on the chimeric qualities of Abraxas himself. However, some would say that the magician is not taking in something from outside of himself, but rather tapping into qualities that lay hidden within. These inner, normally suppressed personalities may be thought of as the “hidden, ” or “chthonic ” shadow selves which may be channeled for creative purposes. However, magical texts frequently warn that bringing them forth could also be the undoing of one ’s life, resulting in both figurative and literal death. For Carl Jung, the power of Abraxas was connected to the bestial nature of humanity, and this beast, being composed of totally opposite essences, can tear us apart from the inside out if awakened but not controlled. Is this what the title character of Johann Wolfgang von Goethe ’s Faust was saying when, after invoking the Devil, he complained: “Two souls dwell, alas! In my breast ”?

This is what modern Western occultism has to say on the subject. But is this truly related to the original concept of Baphomet that was supposedly whispered about in the secret rituals of the Knights Templar? Well, possibly, for it does seem that they knew about Abraxas, a figure that as we have seen is inherently related not only to Gnosticism but also to ritual magic. As it turns out, tokens and seals featuring the image of Abraxas and the words “Secretum Templi ” (“Secret of the Temple ”) have been found and connected to the Templars.

One was, according to Oddvar Olsen in The Templar Papers (2006), found by a man in Britain with a metal detector, and is now in the possession of the British Museum (where it is not, unfortunately, on display). Another pair of them was found among Templar property and are in the French National Archives in Paris. They appear, from the pictures we have seen, to go together. They are for sealing documents, and were to be pressed together with a piece of paper or parchment in between, to make an impression. In Gnostic Philosophy, Tobias Churton cites Sylvia Beamon 's 2011 book The Royston 's Cave: Used by Saints or Sinners? , where it says that this seal was used by one of the Temple 's grand masters, who at the time would have been Guillaume de Chartres. He writes:

It is striking that the seal depicted in Beamon 's book belonged to the grand master of the Templars and was used in a French charter dated October 1214.

However, the French researcher Michel Lamy, in his 1997 book Les Templiers, Ces Grands Seigneurs aux Blanes Manteaux (The Templars, the Great Lords of the White Mantles) talks about a document signed with this seal in that same year by “the Templar Preceptor of France. ” This makes us wonder if it is in fact the same document he is talking about, and if the title of the order 's French Preceptor has been conflated by these other authors with the actual grand master. At any rate, Lamy states that the document he is talking about deals with the division of a certain forest between the Templars and the King of France. As Lamy comments, “One cannot say that this is a particularly a hermetic text. ” He then goes on to suggest that the word secretum found on the seal meant simply that it was used on particularly important documents. However, this does not bar the possibility that the image was adopted by the Templars because to them it represented the real “secret ” of their “temple ” —the Temple of Solomon, or the Al-Aqsa Mosque that was built on top of the Temple Mount. This makes us wonder, then, if they meant to imply that Gnosis, or the transcendental power of Abraxas, was their secret. According to Tobias Churton, several other authors have already speculated about this, and connected it to Baphomet:

There have been suggestions that the figure represents Baphomet or “Baphometides, ” the baptism of wisdom; or, alternatively, Bios, Phos, Metis —Life, Light, Wisdom. The speculative possibilities are legion because we simply do not know why the grand master of the Templars should have employed such a figure.

It is not only people in modern times who have connected Baphomet and Abraxas. Long before the Templar Abraxas tokens were found anywhere, Charles William King, in his 1887 book The Gnostics and Their Remains , quoted the late eighteenth-century writer Rudolf Erich Raspe (famous for his adaptations of the tales of “Baron Munchausen ”) on the subject (emphasis added):

The Gnosis of Basilides was an occult science which, according to his tenets, should be known only and communicated to one in thousands, and to two in ten thousands, and that if the Knights Templars were guilty of any offence at the time of their extermination, it was that of having adopted the doctrines of the Gnostics, and consequently of having renounced the established doctrine of the Church on the human nature of Christ, and on the Trinity: in the place of which they, with the Gnostics, professed one Supreme Being, Father and Creator of all the Powers which, emanating from him, have created and do govern this world. At their reception or initiation into the highest degree of the Order they received … the Baptism or Tincture of Wisdom; they were presented with a sign or symbol of their baptism, which was the Pentagon of Pythagoras; and they worshipped a kind of image or idol; that like the Abraxas … was the figure of a Bearded Old Man, or rather the representation of the only Supreme Being that they admitted and professed .

We are not familiar with the sight of a “bearded ” Abraxas. However, King explained that Raspe was referring to a particular representation of the figure found on a “gem ” that showed, as Raspe described it:

Abraxas, the Sun, or God-Father, or Demiurgus according to the Gnostics and necromancers. This head is crowned, the beard long, the hands crossed upon the breast: for the rest, he is formed as a Term, or a mummy. In the field are eight stars, probably an allusion to the eight Powers, or heavens, that are subordinate to them, according to Epiphanius. In the field are two Hebrew letters… .

The two Hebrew letters are “He ” and “Chet, ” the equivalent of “H ” and “Ch, ” respectively. The meaning of this is unknown. Regardless of this, and in spite of the fact that we have not yet seen the image described by Raspe, it must be admitted that the description reminds us of the allegedly bearded and mummified head supposedly worshipped by the Templars as an idol of Baphomet. If similar images exist elsewhere, and if they are as old as the Templars or older, they may have inspired the Templars to use Abraxas as an emblem of Baphomet, their deepest secret.

Charles William King didn ’t think much of the theories of Joseph von Hammer-Purgstall, declaring that any “sober archeologist ” would conclude that many of the “Templar artifacts ” presented in Mysterium Baphometis Revelatum , specifically several of the vases, are:

… nothing more than a portion of the paraphernalia of those Rosicrucian or alchemical quacks, who fattened upon the credulity of that arch- virtuoso, Rudolf II., ever since whose reign these “fonts ” have been treasured up in the Imperial Cabinet.

Rudolf II was the Hapsburg Holy Roman Emperor and King of Bohemia in the late sixteenth and early seventeenth century whose political failures, leading to the disastrous Thirty Years ’ War, are often blamed by historians on his preoccupation with the occult. Clearly, King thought that Hammer-Purgstall ’s artifacts may have been items that were collected by the emperor because of their seemingly esoteric nature, but could have had nothing to do with the Templars. At present it is impossible to say, as even after years of thorough investigation we have been unable to track down most of the original objects. However, unlike every other modern researcher on the subject, we did manage to find some of them, and this at least affords us the possibility of analyzing them, as we will discuss in the next chapter.

Chapter 9: Riding the Goat Current

Light and Darkness, life and death, right and left, are brothers of one another. They are inseparable. Because of this neither are the good good, nor evil evil, nor is life life, nor death death. For this reason each one will dissolve into its earliest origin. But those who are exalted above the world are indissoluble, eternal.

— The Gospel of Philip , 53

Since commencing our investigation of these matters, we have managed to bring to light much more regarding the origin of some of the images featured in Hammer-Purgstall ’s book. Most of the artifacts seem impossible to find now. They do not appear to be listed as what Hammer-Purgstall called them in any museum. The pictures that purportedly came from the walls of churches cannot be verified, as in most cases the churches (located in what are now Austria, Hungary, the Czech Republic, Germany and France) no longer exist. Even the townships they were in have changed names. However, one of the items, a coffer featuring the most striking image of “Mete ” (as he calls her) pulling down the Sun and Moon with chains, is in fact be in the British Museum now. As we mentioned previously, Hammer-Purgstall talks about but does not include the images from this object in his essay. But later, Thomas Wright did show the pictures in Worship of the Generative Powers , and said that this coffer came from the private collection of Louis, Duc de Blacas. Research into this confirmed that this collection had been sold some years ago to the British Museum, where Tracy R. Twyman found it in August of 2015, labeled as a limestone casket that has been:

… sculptured with crude figure of Cybele lifting up chains; sun and moon in top corners; pentagram and seven-pointed star with skull in lower corners; Arabic inscription round edges; sides carved with scene of human and animal sacrifices.

At the time of this writing, on the museum ’s website, only two sides of the coffer are shown. It is very hard to see what ’s going on in the images. We had to pay the museum to re-photograph the item, so that we could see all of the sides of the coffer clearly. Those pictures are featured in this book. They will also be included in the first-ever English translation of his Mysterium Baphometis Revelatum , which Tracy R. Twyman has commissioned, and was just completed at the time of this writing. This book, with new commentary by Twyman, will be available within a few months of the publication of the book which you are currently reading.

It seems a bit damaged, but on one side of the coffer, we see a bull being held by the neck while a group of people sit around a flaming bowl. On another side, we see some similar themes to other images in Hammer-Purgstall 's book: a man wielding an ax (as well as a shovel) over a small child who is riding a crocodile. (Axes and crocodiles are featured in several of the other pictures.) This child is holding the right hand of a taller figure. To that person 's left, a smaller child is kneeling and holding his other hand. To the right of all of this we see a winged angel holding a serpent behind his back. In his left hand he holds the animal 's head, and in his right hand, the tail is coiled up into a circle.

On a third side of the coffer, there definitely seems to be an orgy depicted. Everyone shown there is naked and appears to be male. On the left edge, there is a man with his back to us. He is spreading the legs of someone in front of him, of whom only the legs can be seen. To the right of this, there is a large cauldron with what looks like a crocodile bring dragged into it. Bending over the cauldron from the right are two men who seem to be forcing the creature into the bowl. One of them is pouring something over it from a vase. Both of the men restraining the crocodile are bent over so that their bare buttocks are sticking up to the right, and from that side, another man is reaching with his right hand to fondle them. To the right of all of this, there is a short brick altar with a man sitting on it, and two others molesting him, one of whom appears to be a child, and who seems to have his backside pressed against the man behind him — the one who is touching the buttocks of the men leaning over the cauldron. Everyone in this picture seems to be smiling. On the left edge, next to the man with a pair of legs spread in front of him, there is what looks like a very large bird talon reaching up from out of nowhere.

On the fourth side of the coffer, we found the origin for a line drawing featured in Worship of the Generative Powers , which Wright had said was from the same coffer as the image of Mete pulling the chains, but which wasn 't shown in the Purgstall-Hammer book. On the left it shows a statue of a horned demon with breasts and male genitals —clearly Baphomet. There are no legs, but just a column below the genitals, like the classical Greek herm statues described in an earlier chapter. A man is kneeling beside this statue, kissing its buttocks (the osculum inflame of the Templars) and grabbing its testicles. A woman in a long dress stands over the kneeling figure on the right, pouring something onto him with a vase. To her right, a man holds another vase lazily in his right hand while a man to his left fondles him with his penis and testes visible. All of these things are shown in the drawing in Wright ’s book.

However, that ’s only half the image. To the right of this scene, there is more. We see a man riding what looks very much to be a goat. The creature has his front right hoof resting on the back of a man kneeling in front of him, who is helping to support a round tray full of vases that is being held by another man standing to the right. The man riding the goat is removing an item from the tray. To the right of everything, there is a winged and crowned creature with bird-like legs, including large talons for feet similar to the one sticking up from the ground on the left edge of the second side of the coffer, described above. The crown and facial features somewhat resemble those of Mete on the lid of the coffer.

We also found, in the Duc de Blacas collection, another coffer in near-perfect condition (except for the missing lid) which for some reason is labeled “fake. ” This item has not been featured, as far as we know, in any book or website ever, yet it is clearly part of the same group of items as the Mete coffer. The images found thereon are described in the following paragraphs.

On one side, a group of people are involved in very strange activity. To the left, we see a person stirring a cup in one hand with a large stick in the other. In front of him, another person kneels and fondles him. To their right, another man is pointing a stick to his right, over the head of another man who seems to be having sex with a hooved creature, the details of which are hard to make out beyond the bent hind legs. Whilst he mounts the animal, he is simultaneously stirring a bowl that sits on the ground with a large pole. The bowl has an object sticking out of it that may be a small child standing, and the animal ’s front paws or arms are on his head. To the right of this, another man is kneeling over the bowl, and reaching up over his head to the right to grasp what looks like an alchemical vessel by the neck, holding it over the flames of a brazier that sits on the ground to his right. To the right of the brazier, another man holds out his left hand and grasps the vessel by the neck as well. Over the brazier and the two men holding it, there is a banner tacked to the wall with a message in Arabic. The look of this banner, and the entire scene as well, makes it clear that this piece, “fake ” or not, was made by the same artist that made the coffer with the orgy scenes featured in Hammer-Purgstall ’s book. The poorly-written “Arabic ” letters on the banner are of the same style.

On side two of the “fake ” coffer that we discovered, we see someone being baptized, perhaps forcibly. He is standing waste-deep in a cauldron, bent forward, with his head buried in another man ’s hands, while a third man, standing on top of a bricked platform, pours something on his head from a vase above, just like in the previously described image of the crocodile being dragged into the cauldron. In the upper left, a disapproving owl (symbol of the wisdom goddesses Lilith, Athena and Minerva) scowls at the viewer. The man holding the other man ’s head is also looking at the viewer, as if we have walked in on a secret ceremony.

On the third side, a bull is on an altar being either worshipped or sacrificed. One of the participants clutches a stick like in the previous scenes, and holds out a garland as if to place it on the neck of the bull. Another kneels in front of it with a vase that looks like it might contain wine. One of them holds up a tau sign identical to those seen in several pictures featured by Hammer-Purgstall. Floating in the air next to the bull we see an equilateral cross. At the bottom of altar sits a billows for fanning flames, although no fire is featured in this scene. As to whether the bull is being worshipped or sacrificed, it seems that Thomas Wright thought the latter, for he described it thus and wrote that Hammer- Purgstall thought it was part of an Ophite Gnostic ceremony, adding:

The offering of a calf figures prominently among the Nossarii, or Nessarenes, the Druses, and other sects in the East.

However, Hammer-Purgstall himself thought the Templars were involved in calf worship, and that this was directly related to their rituals to Baphomet. At least, that ’s what he wrote in his introduction to Ancient Alphabets and Hieroglyphic Characters Explained by Ibn Wahshiyya, published twelve years before Mysterium Baphometis Revelatum and containing the beetle-like “Hermetic ” hieroglyph of Baphomet, or, rather, “Bahumed. ” There Hammer- Purgstall declares

It is written Bahumid , and translated into Arabic by the word calf .

It is superfluous to recall here to the memory of the reader the great antiquity and mysterious sense of the idolatrous veneration in which this calf has been continually held. It is superfluous to repeat any thing that has been said on the worship of Apis in Egypt, renewed by the Israelites in the worship of the calf, and preserved in the mysterious rites of the Druses. Let us remember only a circumstance which shows wonderfully the concordance and relation of the name of Bahumid and its translation.

Bahumed or Bahumet is related in the History of the Templars to have been one of their secret and mysterious formulas, with which they addressed the idol of a calf in their secret assemblies. Different etymological explanations and descriptions of this word have been brought forward, but none surely so satisfactory as this, which proves that the Templars had some acquaintance with the hieroglyphics [presumably, the “Hermetic ” hieroglyphs that are the subject of the book], probably acquired in Syria.

Notably, in the actual text by Ibn Wahshiyya, he does that the hieroglyph can be identified with the name “Kharuf, ” which he does translate as “calf, ” but seems to indicate that this is another name for the concept symbolized by the hieroglyph, “The Secret of Secrets, ” in addition to “Bahumed. ” He does not seem to be saying that “calf ” is in any way a translation of the word “Bahumed. ” This detail, connecting Baphomet and calf worship, helps us imagine what must have been going Hammer-Purgstall ’s mind when he saw this casket, considering that he ’d already gone on record proclaiming that the Templars practiced this particular form of idolatry.

Returning to the box in question, we find, on the remaining side, a man slumped backwards as if dead has been placed on a flaming brick altar, on top of some logs, while two men lift up their hands in worship towards an unseen god. The lid of the coffer is apparently missing. All of the people featured in all of the pictures on both coffers seem short and malformed, like demons or gargoyles.

The Louis, Duc de Blacas collection also contains a great many Gnostic talismans featuring the figures of Abraxas, Bes and Ialdabaoth. The pictures are similar, and in some cases seemingly identical to those found on some of the coins featured in Hammer-Purgstall ’s book. We did not find any other coffers of a similar nature, nor any of Hammer-Purgstall ’s “bowls ” or other artifacts, nor did we find anything else in the de Blacas collection labeled “fake. ”

Although the second, “fake ” coffer does not appear to be discussed in detail anywhere in known literature, it must be the second coffer mentioned by Peter Partner when he viciously derided Joseph von Hammer-Purgstall ’s work in his 1987 book The Murdered Magicians: The Templars and Their Myth . Partner sees Hammer-Purgstall ’s theories as an outgrowth of the paranoia, rampant during his time, about Adam Weishaupt ’s Bavarian Illuminati, a real secret society that had operated through Masonic lodges in Europe to foster republican revolutions against the crowns. Partner basically accuses Hammer-Purgstall, and all of his informants for the research of Mysterium Baphometis Revelatum , of being part of their own vast right-wing conspiracy to discredit the French revolution by connecting it, via the Illuminati, then Freemasonry, and then Templarism, to heresy, Satanism, and debauchery. Partner wrote of Hammer- Purgstall ’s physical evidence, the “Templar artifacts, ” that:

A few of the archeological exhibits may have been forgeries from the occultist workshops; there is an especially suspicious pair of so-called “Templar caskets, ” found after the publication of Hammer ’s first article, which were supposed to have been medieval artefacts of Templar provenance. The Gnostic “orgies ” depicted on these supposedly medieval caskets are uncannily like the late classical objects which had a few years earlier been published in the original “Baphomet ” thesis. The “medieval ” caskets had come into the possession of the Duc de Blacas. Since Blacas was a leading figure in the reactionary French government, and a close personal friend of the renegade Freemason Joseph de Maistre, it is not impossible that they were forged on his behalf. Whether they were forged or not, Hammer failed to prove that they had anything to do with the Templars.

Partner derides Hammer-Purgstall ’s school of Orientalism, and basically the entire field of comparative mythology, as well as the anthropology of religion, as the obsessions of older less rational generations, tying it to “Romanticism ”:

Like so many early modern students of religious origins, he sought to establish a pattern of primitive pagan religion which had survived Christianity in various deviant ways… . The Romantic movement was passionately addicted to such theories of primitive religion.

He then wonders:

How was it that a writer enrolled in the service of rampant conservatism, whose duty it was to demonstrate that advanced radical thought was subverting the foundations of Christian civilization, ended by seeming to show that Christianity had always existed alongside another, more primitive and perhaps more powerful religion?

His evidence that Hammer-Purgstall was “enrolled in the service of rampant conservatism ” seems to be that he worked as a diplomat for the government of Austria, and that some of the artifacts he showed in his book were owned by the Duc de Blacas, a so-called “reactionary ” (as would describe any politically-active nobleman at this time who did not want to lose his land and titles). Partner wrote:

Hammer was not employed by Metternich, the greatest conservative minister in western Europe, for nothing. The whole drift of Hammer ’s argument is in the sense of that used by the ubiquitous Abbe Barruel. Everything connects, from the Gnostics of the early Church, to the Albigensians in the west, the Assassins in the east, thence to the Templars, thence to the Freemasons, thence to the revolutionary anarchists. In 1818, the political order of European conservatism was making its greatest effort to master the threat of radical ideology and radical sedition. The center of that effort was in Vienna, where Hammer was employed by the Austrian Chancery.

You are free to decide what you think about Partner ’s reasoning skills, which he seems to think are superior to Hammer-Purgstall ’s, perhaps due to his being born into a world that has benefited from the influence of “advanced radical thought ” (from the anti-royalist revolutionaries, apparently). Partner also claimed that “the medieval French word for Muhammad was ‘Baphomet, ’ as any competent scholar in Old French could have told [Hammer-Purgstall]. ” This is not borne out by the evidence of our investigation (benefitting from being born into our own advanced information age), for as we explained in Chapter Two, the French word for Mohammed was actually just “Mahomet ” (although some claimed that Baphomet could have somehow been a corruption of this). One would think that the French occult scholar Eliphas Levi, who contributed so much to the lore of Baphomet, would have been perfectly aware of this if it were true, as would his entire contemporary reading audience.

In the mid-nineteenth century, a few years after the publication of Hammer-Purgstall ’s work on the Templars, Pope Pius IX issued an “Allocution Against the Freemasons, ” which said a lot about the Templars as well (and which we have quoted from a bit already). Strangely the place where it is easiest to find an English translation of at least a large segment of this document is in Albert Pike ’s Morals and Dogma , where he quoted from it at length. We will now give you that entire section verbatim, as each word of it is precious:

A power that ruled without antagonism and without concurrence, and consequently without control, proved fatal to the Sacerdotal Royalties; while the Republics, on the other hand, had perished by the conflict of liberties and franchises, which, in the absence of all duty hierarchically sanctioned and enforced, had soon become mere tyrannies, rivals one of the other. To find a stable medium between these two abysses, the idea of the Christian Hierophants was to create a society devoted to abnegation by solemn vows, protected by severe regulations; which should be recruited by initiation, and which, sole depositary of the great religious and social secrets, should make Kings and Pontiffs, without exposing it to the corruptions of Power. In that was the secret of that kingdom of Jesus Christ, which, without being of this world, would govern all its grandeurs.

This idea presided at the foundation of the great religious orders, so often at war with the secular authorities, ecclesiastical or civil. Its realization was also the dream of the dissident sects of Gnostics or Illuminati who pretended to connect their faith with the primitive tradition of the Christianity of Saint John. It at length became a menace for the Church and Society, when a rich and dissolute Order, initiated in the mysterious doctrines of the Kabalah, seemed disposed to turn against legitimate authority the conservative principle of Hierarchy, and threatened the entire world with an immense revolution.

The Templars, whose history is so imperfectly known, were those terrible conspirators. In 1118, nine Knights Crusaders in the East, among whom were Geoffroi de Saint-Omer and Hugues de Payens, consecrated themselves to religion, and took an oath between the hands of the Patriarch of Constantinople, a See always secretly or openly hostile to that of Rome from the time of Photius. The avowed object of the Templars was to protect the Christians who came to visit the Holy Places: their secret object was the re-building of the Temple of Solomon on the model prophesied by Ezekiel.

This re-building, formally predicted by the Judaizing Mystics of the earlier ages, had become the secret dream of the Patriarchs of the Orient. The Temple of Solomon, re-built and consecrated to the Catholic worship would become, in effect, the Metropolis of the Universe; the East would prevail over the West, and the Patriarchs of Constantinople would possess themselves of the Papal power.

The Templars, or Poor Fellow-Soldiery of the Holy House of the Temple intended to be re-built, took as their models, in the Bible, the Warrior- Masons of Zorobabel, who worked, holding the sword in one hand and the trowel in the other. Therefore it was that the Sword and the Trowel were the insignia of the Templars, who subsequently, as will be seen, concealed themselves under the name of Brethren Masons.

The trowel of the Templars is quadruple, and the triangular plates of it are arranged in the form of a cross, making the Kabalistic pantacle known by the name of the Cross of the East. The Knight of the East, and the Knight of the East and West, have in their titles secret allusions to the Templars of whom they were at first the successors.

The secret thought of Hugues de Payens, in founding his Order, was not exactly to serve the ambition of the Patriarchs of Constantinople. There existed at that period in the East a Sect of Johannite Christians, who claimed to be the only true Initiates into the real mysteries of the religion of the Saviour. They pretended to know the real history of YESUS the ANOINTED, and, adopting in part the Jewish traditions and the tales of the Talmud, they held that the facts recounted in the Evangels are but allegories, the key of which Saint John gives, in saying that the world might be filled with the books that could be written upon the words and deeds of Jesus Christ; words which, they thought, would be only a ridiculous exaggeration, if he were not speaking of an allegory and a legend, that might be varied and prolonged to infinity.

The Johannites ascribed to Saint John the foundation of their Secret Church, and the Grand Pontiffs of the Sect assumed the title of Christos, Anointed, or Consecrated, and claimed to have succeeded one another from Saint John by an uninterrupted succession of pontifical powers. He who, at the period of the foundation of the Order of the Temple, claimed these imaginary prerogatives, was named THEOCLET; he knew HUGUES DE PAYENS, he initiated him into the Mysteries and hopes of his pretended church, he seduced him by the notions of Sovereign Priesthood and Supreme royalty, and finally designated him as his successor.

Thus the Order of Knights of the Temple was at its very origin devoted to the cause of opposition to the tiara of Rome and the crowns of Kings, and the Apostolate of Kabalistic Gnosticism was vested in its chiefs. For Saint John himself was the Father of the Gnostics, and the current translation of his polemic against the heretical of his Sect and the pagans who denied that Christ was the Word, is throughout a misrepresentation, or misunderstanding at least, of the whole Spirit of that Evangel.

The tendencies and tenets of the Order were enveloped in profound mystery, and it externally professed the most perfect orthodoxy. The Chiefs alone knew the aim of the Order: the Subalterns followed them without distrust.

To acquire influence and wealth, then to intrigue, and at need to fight, to establish the Johannite or Gnostic and Kabalistic dogma, were the object and means proposed to the initiated Brethren. The Papacy and the rival monarchies, they said to them, are sold and bought in these days, become corrupt, and to-morrow, perhaps, will destroy each other. All that will become the heritage of the Temple: the World will soon come to us for its Sovereigns and Pontiffs. We shall constitute the equilibrium of the Universe, and be rulers over the Masters of the World.

The Templars, like all other Secret Orders and Associations, had two doctrines, one concealed and reserved for the Masters, which was Johannism; the other public, which was the Roman Catholic. Thus they deceived the adversaries whom they sought to supplant. Hence Free- Masonry, vulgarly imagined to have begun with the Dionysian Architects or the German Stone-workers, adopted Saint John the Evangelist as one of its patrons, associating with him, in order not to arouse the suspicions of Rome, Saint John the Baptist, and thus covertly proclaiming itself the child of the Kabalah and Essenism together.

The better to succeed and win partisans, the Templars sympathized with regrets for dethroned creeds and encouraged the hopes of new worships, promising to all liberty of conscience and a new orthodoxy that should be the synthesis of all the persecuted creeds.

The seeds of decay were sown in the Order of the Temple at its origin. Hypocrisy is a mortal disease. It had conceived a great work which it was incapable of executing, because it knew neither humility nor personal abnegation, because Rome was then invincible, and because the later Chiefs of the Order did not comprehend its mission. Moreover, the Templars were in general uneducated, and capable only of wielding the sword, with no qualifications for governing, and at need enchaining, that queen of the world called Opinion.

Hughes de Payens himself had not that keen and far-sighted intellect nor that grandeur of purpose which afterward distinguished the military founder of another soldiery that became formidable to kings. The Templars were unintelligent and therefore unsuccessful Jesuits.

Their watchword was, to become wealthy, in order to buy the world. They became so, and in 1312 they possessed in Europe alone more than nine thousand seignories. Riches were the shoal on which they were wrecked. They became insolent, and unwisely showed their contempt for the religious and social institutions which they aimed to overthrow. Their ambition was fatal to them. Their projects were divined and prevented. Pope Clement V and King Philip le Bel gave the signal to Europe, and the Templars, taken as it were in an immense net, were arrested, disarmed, and cast into prison. Never was a Coup d 'Etat accomplished with a more formidable concert of action. The whole world was struck with stupor, and eagerly waited for the strange revelations of a process that was to echo through so many ages.

It was impossible to unfold to the people the conspiracy of the Templars against the Thrones and the Tiara. It was impossible to expose to them the doctrines of the Chiefs of the Order. The Templars were gravely accused of spitting upon Christ and denying God at their receptions, of gross obscenities, conversations with female devils, and the worship of a monstrous idol.

The end of the drama is well known, and how Jacques de Molai and his fellows perished in the flames. But before his execution, the Chief of the doomed Order organized and instituted what afterward came to be called the Occult, Hermetic, or Scottish Masonry. In the gloom of his prison, the Grand Master created four Metropolitan Lodges, at Naples for the East, at Edinburg for the West, at Stockholm for the North, and at Paris for the South.

The Pope and the King soon after perished in a strange and sudden manner. Squin de Florian, the chief denouncer of the Order, died assassinated. In breaking the sword of the Templars, they made of it a poniard; and their proscribed trowels thence-forward built only tombs

The Successors of the Ancient Adepts Rose-Croix, abandoning by degrees the austere and hierarchial Science of their Ancestors in initiation, became a Mystic Sect, united with many of the Templars, the dogmas of the two intermingling, and believed themselves to be the sole depositaries of the secrets of the Gospel of St. John, seeing in its recitals an allegorical series of rites proper to complete the initiation.

The Initiates, in fact, thought in the eighteenth century that their time had arrived, some to found a new Hierarchy, others to overturn all authority, and to press down all the summits of the Social Order under the level of Equality.

So here we have the Pope (Pius IX, otherwise known to history for proclaiming his own “infallibility ” and that of his predecessor pontiffs) accusing the Templars of a long-standing conspiracy against the Church and the crown heads of Europe to take over the world, and of wanting to rebuild the Temple in Jerusalem. He also claimed that they were involved in Johannism, Cabalism, Gnosticism, Essenism, and Rosicrucianism. He said that the Freemasons were heirs not only to the same traditions, but the same revolutionary goals. However, after his Allocution was published, the Pope was accused of hypocrisy by several Masons in print, who claimed that he himself was known to be a member of the Lodge!

Today, the latest word from the Church about Freemasonry goes back to a statement made by Joseph Ratzinger (the future Pope Benedict XVI) in 1983, approved by John Paul II, that said: “The faithful who enroll in Masonic associations are in a state of grave sin and may not receive Holy Communion… . [M]embership in them remains forbidden. ” This statement had to be made because the revised Canon Law which was issued that year had made the penalty for joining, which is excommunication, implicit instead of explicit, and many people took that as a green light signal. Today this penalty is never enforced, but we can assume that the official stance towards the lodge is still one of disapproval (despite the fact that the Vatican ’s own bank was at one time heavily infiltrated by a Roman Catholic Masonic lodge, called Propaganda Due , that doubled as an organized crime syndicate).

But the real change in attitude from the Church is towards Templarism. In 2007, during Benedict XVI ’s reign, a book called Processus Contra Templarios was published by the Vatican in a limited edition of 799 copies selling for $9000 each. It purported to reveal the “truth ” about a document they had dubbed the “Chinon Parchment. ” It had been purportedly discovered six years earlier in the Vatican Secret Archives by a paleographist who worked there named Barbara Frale, “misfiled, ” allegedly, for 700 years. The book release was timed to coincide with the 700th anniversary of the arrest of the Templars by the French police on October 13, 1307, and gained a great deal of attention from the international press.

What grabbed the headlines was the extraordinary claim that the document proved that Pope Clement V had held his own trial of the Templar leadership after King Philip IV ’s, the results of which had “exhonerated ” knights and proved that they were “innocent ” after all. These were the terms used in newspaper articles that were published. They were also the words used by Barbara Frale herself when she published a more accessible book on the subject several years later, called The Templars: The Secret History Revealed . This would certainly seem newsworthy: both the discovery of the document, and the revision of history that its existence would apparently require.

The only thing is that once you read what Frale writes about what ’s actually in the document, you find that it proves nothing of the sort. If fact, trying to follow Frale ’s version of the story of the end of the Templars, it quickly becomes very confusing, mostly because of the meaning she attaches to certain elements of it. She has her own spin on things, but frequently asserts these opinions as though they are facts. It was these assertions that journalists repeated unquestioningly. For instance, here is an utterly misleading description of the document ’s content from BBC News, using Frale ’s own words:

However, according to Prof Frale, study of the document shows that the knights were not heretics as had been believed for 700 years.

In fact she says “the Pope was obliged to ask for pardons from the knights … the document we have found absolves them. ”

Actually, according to the Parchment, they did confess to what most Christians today would consider blasphemy, including denying Christ and spitting on the cross, as the BBC article states:

In the hearings before Clement V, the knights reportedly admitted spitting on the cross, denying Jesus and kissing the lower back of the man proposing them during initiation ceremonies.

This mention of the “kiss on the lower back ” (which was also applied to the navel and mouth, according to the document) is as close as the BBC comes to addressing one of the most shocking things that one of the knights, Hughes de Perraud, confessed to Clement ’s cardinals: that the brotherhood had a doctrine condoning —even insisting upon —homosexuality. As the show relates, the knights were obliged to swear off all contact with women the moment they joined the order (dumping their wives and children, in many instances). So, as one of the knights told the cardinals questioning him, they were instructed that if they couldn ’t control their desires, they should turn to each other for relief, and not refuse one another ’s advances. As Frale wrote in her book:

[T]he preceptor exhorted the new Templar not to have sexual relations with women, inviting him, should he absolutely not be able to live chastely, to unite with his brothers and not refuse them should they request sexual favors from him. The novice often reacted angrily, but there were no consequences because the ritual sequence did not provide for any concrete application of this “precept of homosexuality. ”

As far as the absolution the BBC refers to in their article, this was the absolution of sin after confession, which of course the cardinals had the right to issue. It in no way negated the fact that the sin had taken place. But why did the BBC ’s writers have the wrong idea here? Even the Catholic News Agency presented the news with this spin when Frale ’s book came out in 2007, using the word “exonerated ”:

The investigation took place in Rome between 1307 and 1312. According to the document, Pope Clement V exonerated the Templars on the charge of heresy, but found them guilty of other infractions. He also ordered the Knights Templar to disband.

The BBC article had also used the word “exonerated, ” and went even further:

The official who found the paper says it exonerates the knights entirely. The last sentence refers to Ms. Frale. One can certainly see upon inspecting her book where the authors of the news articles got their ideas. In the first chapter, she declares that her discovery has finally set the record straight on the Templar issue, even using the word “innocent ”:

[The Chinon Parchment] reveals that the grand master and other high- ranking Templars were found innocent of the charges of heresy, were absolved for less serious offenses by the apostolic authority, and were fully integrated into the Catholic community. Historians believed that the Templars were innocent of the charges brought against them by Philip IV, but many outside academia still suspected the Templars of having been heretics and occultists. The Chinon Parchment is the definitive and incontrovertible proof of the Templars ’ innocence and should finally put this question to rest.

Apparently, only the uneducated ever had any doubt in the first place! Now this word “innocence, ” which has now been repeated by so many other writers on the subject without any qualifications, could only conceivably be used in regards to the very narrow definition of heresy given by Ms. Frale. After describing the juicy details of the secret Templar initiation ceremony, as the knights confessed it to Clement ’s cardinals, she says:

Although it was an unworthy tradition that the Templars had further embellished with other vulgar and violent practices, under no circumstances could it be confused with heresy, an offense that implied a strict and long-term adherence to subversive doctrines.

So the Templars were not heretics, she thinks, because their bizarre practices were not part of a religious lifestyle to the individual knights, who, perhaps at least initially, had no idea why they were being asked to do these things. She tells the story of the circumstances that led up to the papal inquiry. Prior to sending the cardinals to question the knights, and prior to Philip ’s arrest of them, in March 1307 Pope Clement personally interviewed a couple of them. First he called in grand master Jacques de Molay himself “and immediately demanded an explanation for the infamous rumors of the idol said to be secretly venerated in the Temple… . ” This the grand master denied, and insisted that the matter be investigated to clear the Order ’s reputation. She writes:

> The grand master of the Templars, indignant at the rumors the sovereign had been spreading, expressly requested the pope to open an inquest into the state of the Temple so as to demonstrate that the slanderous accusations were unfounded… .

“Slander ” of course would mean that they were the targets of willful lies. But is that what we ’re talking about here? When the Pope then interviewed Hughes de Perraud, he “confirmed to the pope that the Templars practiced a ritual that required new members to spit on the cross during their induction ceremony. ”

After the knights were arrested by Philip, Clement sent the cardinals to question the leaders mentioned, and that is when they all, including De Molay, confirmed many of the accusations, as we have discussed. That is also when all of the details about the initiation ceremony finally came out. Frale ’s description of events is full of contradictions. For instance, she writes:

The written statutes of the Temple, which date back to the second half of the thirteenth century, contain the complete text of the initiation ceremony.

But she then admits that the controversial final elements of the ceremony were not written in the Rule, and “can be constructed only from the testimony given at the trial. ” So the statutes didn ’t in fact give the complete ceremony, as she ’d said earlier. According to her, after the knight had sworn his oath to the Order and donned his mantle, he was taken to an ante room, where he was suddenly told to spit on the cross to prove his obedience. Frale gives the details of the ceremony, which she put together from all of the similar elements found in each of the confessions:

A systematic analysis of all the testimony revealed that at this point most of the brothers resigned themselves to doing what had been commanded, perhaps attempting to spit in the direction of the cross without actually hitting it, while others adamantly refused… . Sometimes a candidate ’s firmness was respected, and he was asked nothing more, but more often his brothers threatened him with prison or death, beating him brutally with their bare fists or holding a sword to his throat. Then the preceptor gave him the kiss of monastic brotherhood —on the mouth. Often this kiss, common to all religious orders, was followed by two more kisses on the belly and the posterior, which was usually covered by the tunic, but at times there were officiators who exposed their bottoms and, according to some witnesses, even obscenely proposed kisses on the penis. Most postulants obeyed without arguing when the request was moderately humiliating, such as a kiss on the behind, and refused in more extreme cases. While the preceptors demanded that a postulant at least deny Christ or spit on the cross, they usually overlooked a refusal of kisses, and unwilling candidates were not forced to comply.

Now a couple of questions about this clearly need to be asked. For one thing, does spitting on the cross and denying faith in Jesus constitute blasphemy for a Christian knight? Well, Ms. Frale manages to describe the spiritual consequences of this without actually using that term:

Although it was clear that they were not heretics, it was equally clear that under church doctrine they were guilty, albeit of a much lesser offence. According to canon law, anyone who commits an act of rejection of the faith, even if he does so without conviction, removes himself from the Catholic community, effectively excommunicating himself. The excommunicant can be absolved of his guilt but cannot be acquitted.

At this point in the story, the knights had been excommunicated, but this decision got reverse later, according to the Chinon Parchment, for reasons we will discuss shortly.

The second question that comes to mind after learning the details of the Parchment is this: why was more of an issue not made about the institutionalized homosexuality in the Order? According to Frale, Pope Clement wanted to assign the knights penance, grant them absolution (forgiveness), reverse their excommunication, and then combine the Order with the Knights Hospitaller so that he could launch a new Crusade. How could he even think of doing this in medieval Catholic Europe with a bunch of guys who had all been kissing each others ’ butts and penises at the very least, and who had sworn not to refuse each others ’ sexual advances? The Parchment even details the initiation of an eleven- year-old relative of the king of England, who was purportedly subject to the same treatment (and pathetically begged for his uncle to save him when they told him to spit on the cross). Frale seems to think that almost no homosexual activity occurred beyond the homoerotic initiation rite and oath. She writes:

The surviving trial testimony consists of approximately one thousand depositions with only six attesting to homosexual relations, all of which were described as long-term relationships that almost always had a dimension of affection… .

As for the sexual humiliation and forced alienation from God that each knight experienced during initiation, Frale says that these feelings were alleviated afterwards because the neophytes were encouraged to confess their “sins ” immediately afterwards. This is in fact how all those “slanderous ” rumors got started, she says – you know, the slanderous rumors that accurately stated exactly what the Templars were doing? As she put it:

At the end of the ceremony, the “victim ” of all these impositions was invited to report to the chaplain of the order to confess the sins he had just committed and ask for forgiveness. The priests of the Temple comforted these penitents by telling them that they had not committed grave offenses and that if they demonstrated remorse and shame, they would be absolved. Often, however, the brothers confessed to priests outside the Temple, generally Franciscans or Dominicans, who, naturally, were dumbfounded and amplified the brothers ' moral disquiet by telling them that they had committed mortal sins, sometimes encouraging them to leave the order. These indiscretions of these honest priests, who were totally ignorant of the real function of the secret ceremony within the Temple, undoubtedly contributed to the gossip circulating in the secular world about the "dark side " of the order.

So what on Earth was the supposed reason for doing any of this stuff in the first place, if they were not heretics or even "occultists, " as she put it? Ms. Frale trips all over herself to argue that it was just a test of the postulant 's mettle.

Bernard of Clairvaux … insisted on inserting into the text of the Rule a clause exhorting the leaders of the order not to accept new vocations too hurriedly, but rather to subject candidates to a test to ascertain their character and commitment. The exact nature of the test is unclear. Bernard elegantly alluded to Saint Paul 's advice to "put them to the test to see if they come from God… . "

The written Rule offers no details as to how the preceptor might discourage postulants who were less than totally convincing… .

In her imagination, without specific instruction it was only logical that over time tests would be devised that involved blaspheming Jesus and making people kiss their private parts. But she simultaneously makes two contradictory claims about the purpose of this:

1) To see if a candidate would have the courage not to renounce Christ if the Saracens tried to force him to.

2) To see if a candidate would be obedient to his superiors no matter what. So which were they looking for: loyalty to the Order, or loyalty to Christ and Christian morality? Apparently, nobody flunked the test no matter how they reacted. Frale 's opinion on the matter is confusing (especially when she claims that it has somehow been established by the evidence of the Parchment whilst still admitting that it ’s purely theoretical on her part). Regarding the need for strict obedience within the Order, she states:

A cardinal point of the Templars ’ ethical code was absolute obedience to one ’s immediate superiors… .

As for the idea that they were testing their recruits to see how they ’d stand up to the religious persuasion tactics of the Muslim enemy, here is what she bases it on. She says:

Perhaps they [did these things] because it immediately confronted the new Templar with the violence that he would be subjected to if he were captured by the Saracens.

We know that the Saracens used to beat and torture capture Christians, forcing them to deny Christ and spit on the cross before ultimately compelling them to convert to Islam. ”

The ritual took place according to a fixed script based on the actual experiences of Templar escapees from Muslim prisons, and dated back to the earliest days of the order … Over time, extraneous elements were added, such as the kiss on the buttocks, a true example of hazing aimed at humiliating the recruit in front of the veterans, and the verbal exhortation to homosexuality, which probably started as a parody of the precept that required Templars to give their whole selves to the order and to their brethren. These vulgar and derisive practices were typical of the often crude behavior found among military corps, and probably arose when the order ’s traditional discipline began to deteriorate.

This does not seem to fit with the existing legend of the brave Templar knight. How is it that men who were charged never to retreat on the battlefield when fighting Muslims for God would crumple under a bit of peer pressure when asked by their superiors to renounce Christ? Also, how does committing the blasphemy beforehand, without torture, help to prevent you from doing so again later under torture from the enemy? If renouncing Christ is a big deal with real spiritual ramifications, and they were being trained to avoid having to do that, why would they go ahead and commit the blasphemy during the training?

At any rate, this is what the Templars confessed to, twice, both to the king of France ’s inquisitors, and to the Pope ’s. So while they may have had their reasons (if you follow and believe Frale ’s twisted apologist logic), and while they may have been absolved (as any murderer or rapist who confessed to a priest would be), they were certainly not innocent, either by contemporary standards, or today ’s.

But it does seem that when Frale says “exhonerated, ” she means reconciled with the Church. She seems to place all the importance on the Templars ’ charter and the fact that it put them under the sole authority of the Pope. She completely rejects the notion that the king of France should have anything to say about the activities of the knights who were stationed in his country. She constantly describes Clement as having the best of intentions. She says he wanted to use his power to protect them, but was constantly thwarted by the king of France trying to “illegally ” (her word) claim jurisdiction over them.

The battle for political supremacy between the French crown and the Papacy had been going on for several years. The election of Clement, historians say, had been orchestrated by Philip IV in the first place, as he felt that Clement could be a useful puppet. He then insisted that Clement move the seat of St. Peter from Rome to Avignon, France, where it remained until 1378. Prior to this, there had been a feud between Philip and Clement ’s predecessor, Pope Boniface VIII.

It is interesting that, according to a National Geographic documentary that featured Frale, one of the ways in which Philip kept Clement in line was by threatening to publicly accuse Clement of heresy as well. Furthermore, as she states in her book, Philip even wanted to exhume the bones of Pope Boniface VIII and put him on trial as “a heretic, a blasphemer, an atheist, and a practitioner of witchcraft. ” She describes how the bishops in France wanted to separate from the papacy because they believed it “to have reached a state of decadence as to be incapable of performing its traditional role. ” Then she complains about how a bishop in Troyes named Guichard was burned at the stake for witchcraft at this time, “despite having been acquitted by the pope. ”

Frale describes the bizarre ending to this series of events. In December of 1307, Jacques de Molay recanted his confession to Philip IV ’s inquisitors, claiming he ’d lied because he was under torture, and publicly displaying his wounds before an audience he was granted at Notre Dame cathedral. The Pope ’s panels of bishops decided that the knights should be absolved, but that the leaders who were already in prison must remain there for the rest of their lives to pay for what they had done. The way Frale puts it, the papacy saw this as a compromise, bargained down from the death penalty that Philip wanted (although Philip had not actually negotiated with them at all). The Church leaders thought this would enable them to wrap up the matter quickly so they could get about the business of launching another war in the Middle East:

Upon the return of the three cardinals to Poitiers, the pope drafted a second version of his bull faciens misericordiam . It reiterated the main points expressed in the first release, but added that the leaders of the Temple had been absolved and were now protected by judicial immunity and that no one, except the Roman pontiff, could so much as interrogate them.

But as it turned out, De Molay and his sidekick, Geoffrey de Charny, did not care for this solution. They then recanted their confessions again, this time presumably including the ones they gave to the Church authorities who, according to Frale, had not tortured them. Instead, as Frale put it, they proclaimed “the Temple ’s absolute innocence of all the charges brought against them… . ” Again, it is hard to see how any of this behavior could be classified as particularly noble, considering that even Frale acknowledged that the Templars were, on many of the counts, “guilty, ” which normally is thought of as the opposite of “innocent, ” a term she also used to describe the knights.

At any rate, Frale still seems to think that the Church ’s authority here, which had failed on all counts, should have continued to reign supreme over the situation. She describes what happened next as a violation of the rights of the Church, as Philip took matters into his own hand and acted decisively:

In 1310 [Philip IV] ordered 54 Templars who had been found innocent burned at the stake, in total violation of papal authority. Even the theologians of Sorbonne opposed this decision, declaring it completely illegal, but their opinion was ignored.

In the south of France, where the powers of the Inquisition were strongest, there were records of convictions for violations associated with witchcraft, such as the witch ’s Sabbath and group orgies, which even went beyond the accusations of Philip the Fair in his indictment.

These Frale calls “the most baseless charges, which drew from the most abominable fantasies of the popular imagination. ” Then, she says, Philip thwarted Clement ’s authority once again:

Although the leaders of the Temple were still detained illegally by Philip IV, the pope granted them judicial immunity. Templar grand master Jacques de Molay tried multiple times to obtain an audience with the pope, but royal agents prevented that meetings from ever taking place. Nor were the Templars allowed to be in contact with their grand master… .

Finally, Philip had De Molay and De Charny both executed, burnt at the stake. Predictably, Frale sees these deaths as nothing short of noble martyrdom. She writes:

Accounts of the execution attested to the great heroism demonstrated by the two leaders. Jacques de Molay asked his executioners to untie the knots around his wrists, raised his eyes to the cathedral of Notre Dame, and prayed to the Virgin Mary… With his prayer, the grand master bore glorious witness to the demise of the Temple and proclaimed its innocence and fidelity to the Christian faith.

So clearly, the Templars have in no way been exculpated. They seem to have been quite guilty of the elements of blasphemy (at least according to the common definition) and committing homosexual acts. Many people have been executed for less. The idea that this was not done as part of a larger heretical doctrine is unproven and groundless. Contrary to the sweeping claims of Barbara Frale (who in 2009 also claimed to have found the name of Jesus written on the Shroud of Turin), the question of why they did these things, and the extent to which they did, as well what other crimes they may have committed, is as unanswered today as before the Chinon Parchment was discovered in 2001. As for the question of the Baphomet idol, Frale offers one sentence, proposing what seems a very odd idea:

The last point raised in the indictment against the Templars concerned the secret veneration of an idol in the shape of a bearded head. There is clear evidence of the existence of an unusual image of Christ in the religious life of the order, as well as a mysterious cult devoted to the Sacred Blood.

So is she suggesting that the Baphomet head was a representation of Jesus. It seems so. As strange as this may seem, the same idea was the subject of the 1998 book The Head of God: The Lost Treasure of the Templars by Keith Laidler. However, instead of claiming that it was a mere representation of Christ, he theorized that actual man ’s head had been removed and preseved by them. He proposed that it is now buried underneath Rosslyn Chapel in Scotland. Perhaps he gave Frale the spark of insight that led to her concocting the only “innocent ” explanation she could come up with for why the knights would be prostrating themselves before a mummified head that the confessors described as “terrifying. ” But we need not go that far. The skulls and mummified remains of many saints, including John the Baptist and Mary Magdalene, are regularly venerated by Christians the world over, and all of them look rather creepy. As we mentioned, the Templars were involved in the relic trade. It could have been any one of these that the Templars used in their ceremonies, or something else altogether.

As for Barbara Frale herself, who ’s worked at the Vatican Secret Archives since 2001, she comes across as a Church spokeswoman apologizing for what happened to the knights, and offering up excuses for why the Pope failed to protect them from Philip. While Philip ’s control of Clement has long been known, to us it seems that an attempt is being made by her to rehabilitate the reputations of both the Church and the Temple. We can only speculate on whether this is personal interest on her part, or something that her employers have asked her to do, but the Church certainly doesn ’t seem to have corrected the record at all on these issues in the intervening fourteen years since she allegedly discovered the Chinon Parchment in 2001.

We should also note that, long before the Templars were openly accused and arrested by Philip IV, several papal pronouncements had stated explicitly that the Templars were guilty of the same sort of things they were eventually prosecuted for. Prince Michael of Albany, in his 2006 book The Knights Templar of the Middle East (co-authored with Walid Amine Salhab), recounts some of these:

Innocent II (1198-1216), writing to the grand visitor of the order, said, “The crimes of your brothers pain us deeply by the scandal that they provoke within the Church. The knights Templar practice the doctrines of Satan. ” Gregory IX (1227-1241) mentions the fact that he knew that the Templars practiced the act of homosexuality and occult sexual magic under a secret new rule established by Roncelin de Fos (later master of Tortosa and Syria) in 1240. This new rule was written in a Templar book known as “the book of baptismal (sic) by fire. ”

This final item is of great interest to us. We found mention of The Book of the Baptism by Fire in a few other places, but not many (although we were not able to corroborate that it was ever mentioned by Gregory IX, who as we said previously, also condemned the Cathars for worshipping the anuses of black cats). Oddvar Olsen writes about it in The Templar Papers , also from 2006:

In 1877, a German Masonic specialist named Merzdorf claimed to have found, among other Masonic manuscripts, two Latin “Rules ” of the Templars (purported to date from the 13th century). One was the Rule for the “chosen brothers, ” and the other for the “consoled brothers. ” The first Rule describes the church as the “Synagogue of Anti-Christ, ” and stipulates an elect reception ceremony (involving various ritual kisses —one on the male member —and including readings from opening verses of the Koran). The latter Rule implies strongly that the Templars shared the doctrines of the Cathars, including that of the “consolamentumm, ” or mystical baptism. Still authenticity of these has yet to be determined.

… I have recently been referred to a text called The Book of the Baptism of Fire (The credence of this text needs to be ascertained, so I will just briefly mention it here.) The text was apparently transcribed by the Grand Master in England (Robert Sandford), in 1240 AD. It lists the different articles of The Order of the Weather . Some of the articles refer to both the “chosen ” and “consoled ” brothers. There is also mention of Baphomet and “the Secret Science of the great philosophy: Abrax and the Talisman. ”

So according to Prince Michael, The Book of the Baptism of Fire (which he calls the “baptismal ”) actually contained these secret rules, while Olsen claims that they are separate documents that nonetheless seem to confirm one another. Yet another author, Timothy Hogan, in his 2012 book Entering the Chain of Union , tells the story differently still (drawing on a French website edited by one Jean-Pierre Schmit):

There is a series of documents first published in 1877 by Theodore Merzdorff, which were said to come from the Masonic Grand Lodge of Hamburg. These Latin documents were the official Rule of the Knights Templar followed by three other documents said to be secret statutes of the Order. They were said to be copies of the original documents that existed in the Vatican, which were copied in the 1780s-1790s by the Danish scientist Frederic Munter. The documents were translated into German, and from there into French in 1957 by Rene Gilles.

Hogan adds an extra “f ” to the end of Merzdorf ’s first name and tells us that before they were stumbled upon at a German Mason ’s lodge, they were stumbled upon in Latin in the Vatican archives and translated into German. That ’s a whole lot of stumbling upon something that is of such great historical importance, and presumably excuses the Church ’s treatment of the Templars. But yet again —whoopsy! —those Vatican file clerks just can ’t do anything right! Masonic lodges, as you will find later in this chapter, are just the natural place for such things to show up later for historians to find them. Hogan goes on to describe in more detail what some of the documents were:

The third document dated July 1240 opens with “Here begins the ‘liber consolamenti ’ or secret statutes, written by Master Roncelinus for the Consoled Brothers of the militia of the Temple. ” These statutes, composed of twenty articles are signed by Master Roncelinus and another dignitary of the Templar Order, brother Robert of Samford, Procurator of the Knights Templar in England… . The last piece dated August 1240 starts with “Here begins the list of secret signs that master Roncelinus has assembled in eighteen articles and addressed to the same Robert of Samford. ”

Yet another version of the story, told by Mark Amaru Pinkham in his article for Atlantis Rising Magazine , entitled “The Templars ’ Biggest Secret & the Vatican, ” calls the text Baptism of Fire of the Brothers-Consulate , and says that it was discovered in 1780 at the Vatican Library by “a Danish Bishop ” (not, as Hogan had claimed, “Danish scientist Frederic Munter ”). Also, like the others but unlike Oddvar Olsen, Pinkham purports that this document is one and the same as that which, he says, is “often referred to by Templar historians as the ‘Secret Rule of the Templars. ’ ” According to him, the document contains quite a few amazing admissions not mentioned by the other writers on the subject:

Said to have been written in 1240 AD. by a French Templar Master named Roncelinus, it appears to give a green light to all the heretical offenses that the Knights were accused of in the 14th century. Permission to indulge in all manner of Templar heresy can be found in this document, including defilement of the Cross, denial of Christ as the Savior, sexual liaison, and the worship of the idolic head known as Baphomet. There is even a passage within the document that gives the Knights permission to initiate other gnostics into their order, including Cathars, Bogomils, and even Assassins. If the Baptism of Fire of the Brothers-Consulate was indeed in circulation beginning in 1240 AD. it would have been an easy task for a Church or Royal spy to procure a copy for their employers.

The references made by the above-quoted sources to the “Consoled Brothers, ” “Brothers Consulate, ” and “consolamenti ” are taken by Oddvar Olsen to imply that the Templars practiced the consolamentum of the Cathars, which he describes as a “mystical baptism. ” Benjamin Walker tells us more about this mysterious ritual in Gnosticism: Its Influence and History :

The central Cathar rite was the consolamentum , a kind of adult baptism of the spirit, which was administered only once. It was reserved as a rule for those who had attained the level of the Perfect, but it could be given to any Cathar prepared to make an irrevocable renunciation of the flesh and consecrate his or her life to God. The rite was preceded by a fast and imparted by the laying on of hands and placing on the head the gospel of St John. If anyone sinned after being “consoled, ” he was expelled from the Cathar communion.

So strict were the requirements that many Cathars only underwent the rite at the point of death, so as to avoid any further chance of sinning. Because it was generally held that death through illness or old age only proved that Satan was still in control of the body, some Cathars hastened the end by what was called the endura , a ritual suicide or killing. It was thought best to be purified by the consolamentum and then face the endura , for then salvation was certain. The methods of endura included fasting to death or taking poison, or being smothered by one or more of the Perfect who held a pillow over the mouth of the endurist, or strangled him.

So this is the ritual that the “Consoled Brothers ” of the so-called Book of the Baptism by Fire were named after? We presently cannot be sure. A copy of the book in which the alleged document was published, compiled by Theodor Merzdorf (who spelled his first name without an “e ” on the end, a detail that none of the authors quoted above got right), has been obtained by our research staff and is now being analyzed. It has an extremely long title in German. But it seems to us that Prince Michael was probably able to read the text, or at least knew someone who could, because it appears that some of the “inside information ” in his book about the Templars must have come from this.

One thing we do know, though, is that this Roncelin/Roncelinus fellow has been associated with the Cathars, and blamed for introducing blasphemous rituals to Templar tradition, in many books before. The Temple and the Lodge by Michael Baigent and Richard Leigh (1989) tells us:

Between 1248 and 1250, the Master of Provence was one Roncelin de Fos. Then, between 1251 and 1253, Roncelin was Master of England. By 1260, he was again Master of Provence, and presided in that capacity until 1278. It is thus quite possible that Roncelin brought aspects of heretical Cathare thought from their native soil in France to England. This suggestion is supported by the testimony before the Inquisition of Geoffroy de Gonneville, Preceptor of Aquitaine and Poitou. According to Geoffroy, unnamed individuals allege that all evil and perverse rules and innovations in the Temple had been introduced by a certain Brother Roncelin, formerly a Master of the Order. The Brother Roncelin in question is bound to have been Roncelin de Fos.

At this point, we would like to delve much more deeply into the claims made in Prince Michael ’s book regarding the Templars. But first it is necessary to say a few words about Prince Michael himself. Tracy R. Twyman first became aware of this man in 1999, after reading about him in a book by Laurence Gardner entitled Bloodline of the Holy Grail , and subsequently reading Prince Michael ’s book The Forgotten Monarchy of Scotland . She then interviewed him for a magazine she published at the time called Dagobert ’s Revenge .

Prince Michael claims to be the rightful heir to the throne of Scotland, saying that his own “Royal House of Stewart ” is the same as the British royal dynasty the “House of Stuart. ” They provided monarchs for Scotland from 1371 through 1714, and ruled over England as well from 1567 to the same end date. Michael, whose given last name is Lafosse, is an immigrant to Scotland from Belgium, where, he claims, his family has been waiting “in exile ” to return to the throne. His first book was part of his campaign to present himself as a potential head of state should Scotland become independent at some point. Michael further claims that his family is descended from Jesus Christ and Mary Magdalene through the Merovingian dynasty of France. He also says that he is the head of Scottish Templarism, and purports to have inside knowledge about their “real ” history.

The legitimacy of all these assertions has been widely disputed. In past writings, Michael has relied heavily on the “research ” of his friend Laurence Garner, now deceased. Gardner put himself forward as the head of an organization called the “Dragon Court, ” which was supposedly as old as the sixteenth century and dedicated to promoting the interests of the “Dragon lineage. ” What was meant by this, essentially, were the royal bloodlines, found in all cultures throughout history, which purportedly have a more-than-human origin —either through gods or angels that allegedly mated with humans in the distant past. Gardner traced these bloodlines from modern royalty back to the mythical figures they allegedly came from. These genealogies seem to connect everyone of importance in history to everybody else, whether they are good or bad, the Hitlers and the Mother Theresas. So it is of no great contradiction to realize that these genealogies put Jesus himself as a descendant of fallen angels, claiming also that he married a lady of similar extraction (Mary Magdalene) and bred children with her. It is a holy lineage beyond good and evil. This idea is perhaps similar to what was expressed by Charles Peguy in his poetic ode to the House of Lorraine (a French branch of this “Dragon bloodline ”), referencing the double- barred cross that is associated with their family:

The arms of Jesus are the Cross of Lorraine,

Both the blood in the artery and the blood in the vein,

Both the source of grace and the clear fountaine;

The arms of Satan are the Cross of Lorraine,

And the same artery and the same vein,

And the same blood and the troubled fountaine.

Tracy R. Twyman happens to have some inside knowledge of the workings of the Dragon Court. Shortly after publishing her interview with Prince Michael of Albany, she became friends with Nicholas de Vere von Drakenberg, whom she knew until his death in 2012. He claimed to have been the “actual ” head of the “real ” Dragon Court, as well as the real author of several of the books that Laurence Gardner published under his own name. He presented her with the original manuscript, which was quite clearly what Gardner had based his own writings on, in very close parallel. On the copy of Laurence Gardner ’s Genesis of the Grail Kings that she has in her office, De Vere is thanked in the acknowledgements for giving Gardner access to his “household archives ” as a source for his research. In the first edition of this book, his name was listed on the cover as the co-author, which was then mysteriously removed in subsequent editions.

After knowing De Vere well and seeing the evidence, she did become convinced, as she still is, that De Vere was the actual author of two of Gardner ’s books, and the actual progenitor of the “Dragon Court ” that Gardner based his own organization on. She does not believe that it is centuries old. She says it was an informal group of De Vere ’s friends who took their inspiration from him and who took on various “royal titles ” that he handed out to them, supposedly based on their genealogies. She herself received one of these titles, and was even made the Grand Master of the Dragon Court for a few years, as well as the copyright holder for some of De Vere ’s books. All of this happened at his insistence. She never asked for it. She helped him get his own book published in his own name, and then voluntarily relinquished the copyright, the royal title, and the grand mastership.

While Twyman thought that De Vere ’s work on historical and mythological matters had value, she found his claims about himself and his organization to be grandiose and unverifiable. She is also fairly positive that some of the information in his books came from channeling. The family “archives ” that Laurence Gardner said he got his information from were, in fact, like the “Akashic records ” of New Age western pop Buddhism: they existed on the astral plane, accessible only through the mind of Nicholas de Vere.

Ms. Twyman is not sure to what extent Prince Michael knows the truth about where Laurence Gardner got his information from, which Michael has relied on so heavily. He himself claimed to be part of the Dragon Court too (although he doesn ’t mention it in his latest book). Most recently we found him on the membership list of something called IBSSA (the International Bodyguard and Security Services Association). The other members of this group (whose names are listed on the organization ’s website) all seem to fall within the following categories:

(1) Members of one or several “royal houses, ” either legitimate and verifiable, and/or fake-seeming royal houses like the House of Stewart and the Dragon Court were.

(2) Members of both legitimate and/or fake-seeming Masonic groups and modern Templar organizations.

When we say “and/or, ” we mean that some of these people were simultaneously members of real organizations and what seem like scam organizations, holding both real and possibly fake titles. Also common was involvement in very real UN non-governmental organizations of various types. We have verified, by researching the backgrounds of each name listed, that several of them really are royalty, and most are quite high up in Masonry, some in significant leadership positions. Many of them can be found in pictures on the ISBBA ’s website dressed in royal or Templar regalia. They are shown pictured in investiture ceremonies receiving honors. The website also contains information on martial arts classes that the ISBBA is purportedly holding, as well as international security reports on matters like terrorism and organized crime.

We have no idea why this organization exists, if in fact it does. It may just be a website meant for people like us to find, giving the impression of an Illuminati nexus of royals and Masons who happen to be connected to international intelligence (as the name of the organization implies). Michael reported in his first book being surveilled and interviewed by MI5 after launching his campaign for the Scottish throne. So he has been trying to suggest for some time that is a spook at war behind the scenes with other spooks.

We are not sure exactly what we are suggesting here, but these details have to be important, for in his latest book, The Knights Templar of the Middle East , Michael claims that he based his research on some Masonic documents that he accidentally stumbled upon in a Masonic lodge that he belongs to. As he tells it:

I came across what is referred to as “The Charles Morrisson Collection ” (about 2000 works), housed at the library of Scottish Grand Lodge in Edinburgh, Scotland. The collection ’s oldest script dates back to 1615, extending into the 19th century. Some of these scripts were handwritten in Old French, some of which had been published privately, all of which had been forgotten and never consulted.

Think about the fact that so much of what we think the accusations were against the Templars, linked to more modern accusations against Freemasons, comes from the papal “Allocution Against the Freemasons ” of Pius IX, who was himself accused of being an initiated Freemason by other Freemasons, allegedly speaking out in their own order ’s defense. Consider the fact that the most complete text of this Allocution easily available to the general reader is to be found in the Masonic textbook Morals and Dogma by Albert Pike, where it is merely quoted and commented upon, supposedly to demonstrate the adversity of suspicion that Masons have had to face because of the Church throughout the years. The information we have about what the Templars and Masons have been accused of comes from … Masons themselves!

Consider the fact that the aforementioned Book of the Sun of Suns and Moon of Moons , which purportedly mentions “Bafumed, ” and described it as the transformative power of the universe was supposed to have been discovered by Freemason Giles F. Yates in the library of a Masonic lodge. The documents published by Theodore Merzdorf, claiming to contain the Templars ’ secret rule in a privately-published Templar text (The Book of the Baptism of Fire), was supposedly found in the Masonic Grand Lodge of Hamburg by Merzdorf after being discovered by Danish scientist Frederic Munter in the Vatican archives. In a similar story, the Chinon Parchment was supposedly accidentally discovered in the Vatican library.

Likewise the Dossiers Secrets , kept on file at the Bibliotheque Nationale and supposedly published for the Swiss Masonic “Grand Loge Alpina, ” are the documents that lured three British journalists into investigating the French Masonic secret society called the “Priory of Sion, ” promoting a questionable claimant to the (now nonexistent) French throne. This culminated in the 1980s bestseller Holy Blood, Holy Grail and later the Da Vinci Code storyline of the secret bloodline of Christ. Once again, the “rumors ” were floated by the Masonic secret society itself, via documents deposited in a library. Other documents related to the group ’s “history ” that were presented to the authors for evidence appeared to have been faked with the forged signatures of notaries and forged bank receipts in a ruse that involved several people known to work for British intelligence services.

Nicholas de Vere told Tracy R. Twyman personally that the way to falsely establish the historicity of newly-invented “facts ” is to deposit documents with false publication dates in libraries and wait for someone to discover them. He said it as though it was something he had done before. Although De Vere did have a falling out with Laurence Gardner and Prince Michael early on, it seems likely that other friends of the “prince ” have been involved in the same kinds of shenanigans and know the same tricks of the trade.

The narrative being promoted by Prince Michael in his latest book —that Templars were more influenced by secret traditions of Islam than Judeo- Christianity, with more than a hint that this tradition is truly superior to either Christianity or Judaism —seems to be one that several Masonic scholars (that is, scholars on the subject of Freemasonry who were themselves also Freemasons) have been promoting for some time. This goes along with the idea, supported by occult writers like Richard Burton, Idries Shah, Robert Graves, and Baron von Sebottendorf—all probably Masonic initiates at one point in their lives—that Freemasonry comes directly from the mystical Islamic stream of Sufism. First, let ’s go over what Prince Michael has to say.

One of the first things the reader notices is that Prince Michael ’s book is rather shockingly critical of Christianity, as well as “the American-created state of Israel ” and “the banking world … within the hands of a Jewish hierarchy. ” He writes:

The simple truth is that the creation of Christianity, an uphill struggle that took over six hundred years, was no more than a fantasy gone wrong. Moreover, it was concocted by a bunch of rather sick but ambitious individuals who not only lied through their teeth, but also sent millions of people to their death with the sole purpose of dying, so they thought, in the name of “The Lord. ” The history of Christianity is bloody, savage, and cruel.

Of course, as for the 27,000 Islamic terrorist attacks carried out globally since 2001 alone, Prince Michael ’s only applicable comment in this book is to say that, because of the hijinks of Israel and the Jewish bankers, “Islam is bound to fight back for the very survival of its own religious tenets. ”

But let us remember that Prince Michael has spent his whole adult life preparing his ill-omened campaign to become the new king of Scotland. He could even imagine that his reformed royal house will somehow take over England as well, as his alleged ancestors did before him. So perhaps he, like Prince Charles of the House of Windsor, is looking at the demographic projections regarding immigration into the UK from Islamic countries, versus the even higher rate of emigration of the native population fleeing to the continent and the US, as well as the birth rates of those immigrants versus that of the native population. Maybe he sees that, were this to happen, he would be reigning over a population largely predisposed to the Muslim religion. Charles, whose family links to the descendants of Mohammed were announced by Burke ’s Peerage years ago, has gone as far as to proclaim that he began learning Arabic in 2013, “in order to undertake a deeper study of the Koran , ” and in that same year was quoted as saying:

The Islamic world is the custodian of one of the greatest treasures of accumulated wisdom and spiritual knowledge available to humanity.

Prince Michael ’s book goes on to make a claim that should be easily verifiable or discredited, except for the fact that the holy sites in both Jerusalem and Mecca are all totally inaccessible to archeologists or other independent researchers. He says that Jerusalem is not the site of Solomon ’s Temple, but rather that Mecca is instead, and that the Templars knew this. First, he asserts, they discovered, by conducting secret digs beneath the Mosque of Omar and the Dome of the Rock in Jerusalem, that there was no foundation of Solomon ’s Temple to be found there. They found the remains of the second temple, built by Herod, but not Solomon ’s. He writes:

What became also obvious to the Templars is that the original Jerusalem of Solomon, the pre-Babylonian invasion Jerusalem, was not that which the crusaders were occupying in Palestine and from which these various crusader kings were ruling from.

Prince Michael then tells us, again on inside information, that some Templars went on a secret mission to Mecca to see the real temple foundations for themselves. He says that the caliph of Egypt loaned them a fleet of ships based in the Red Sea, which they used to travel to the holy city “disguised as faithful Muslims. ” The Prince purports that there are rumors believed “in some quarters ” (Masonic ones, we presume) that the knights:

> … had a free entrance within the city of Makkah. Strangely enough, the history of Makkah also claims that they had free access to the “Sons of the Old Woman ” (also referred to as the “Sons of the Widow ”), the priests in charge of the Makkah temple.

This last reference, of course, is significant to Freemasons because “Sons of the Widow ” is an epithet that members of that fraternity use for themselves.

Prince Michael then goes on to make the case that Mecca was the original Jerusalem, and the Kaaba the true Temple of Solomon, pointing out Hebrew- sounding place-names in western Arabia, “from the port of Jiddah to that of Jizzan, ” which match up to the names of Israelite cities mentioned in the Old Testament. He questions the validity of the geographical designations that have been made ascribing biblical histories to places in modern Israel and Palestine, rightly mentioning the academic controversy that each of these identifications has provoked. Opining that “Very little in Palestine proves it to be the promised land of Moses, even less that of the kingdom of Solomon, ” and stating that most of the controversial designations were made as recently as the nineteenth century “by Christian so-called scholars, ” Prince Michael then posits that what we think of now as the ancient city of Jerusalem was in fact a settlement of Babylonians practicing Judaism who were sent there when the Persians took over Babylon. As he put it:

> The question that the Templars had to ask themselves was: did the Jews, following their Babylonian exile, go back to the right area of origin or did they simply choose a new area to settle? The simple truth is that none of those Jews who “came back ” to Jerusalem after 539 or 519 BC (scholars are still arguing the exact date when the Jews left Babylon) had been born in their place of origin. All of them, including Zerrubabel (sic) (whose name actually means “born in Babel ”), were born in Babylon. In all probability, Zerrubabel (sic) and his people were told by the Persian king Cyrus or Cambyses where to settle.

So why would the Templars have received special permission to visit Mecca, the sacred center of their battlefield enemies? Also, why would it have occurred to them to look there in the first place? Well according to Prince Michael, many of the founding Templars came from families that had intermarried with Arabic Muslim aristocracy, particularly Grand Master Hughes de Payens (whose last name, by the way, means “of the Pagans ”). Prince Michael says that his grandfather was Abd ar-Rahman an-Nasir, son of Muhammad al- Mansur, the emir of Cordoba in Muslim Spain, a descendant of Mohammed through the Idrisid dynasty of North Africa. He claims that the Islamic side of the family was involved in Sufism. The same claim is made by Idries Shah in his book The Sufis , where he said that de Payens ' father Theobaldo was surnamed "the Moor " (the word for Arabs living in medieval Muslim Spain) and that this was the meaning behind the three severed Moors heads on the family coat of arms. Shah said that they were really "heads of wisdom, " or Baphomet heads. On this last subject, Shah wrote:

Probably relying upon contemporary Eastern sources, Western scholars have recently supposed that "Bafomet " has no connection with Mohammed, but could well be a corruption of the Arabic abufihamat (pronounced in Moorish Spanish something like bufihimat). The word means "father of understanding. " In Arabic, "father " is taken to mean "source, chief seat of, " and so on. In Sufi terminology, ras el-fahmat (head of knowledge) means the mentation of man after undergoing refinement of the transmuted consciousness.

It will be noted that the word "knowledge, understanding " used here is derived from the Arabic FHM root. FHM, in turn, is used to stand for both FHM and derivatives, meaning "knowledge; " and FHM and derivatives, standing for "black, coalman " and so on.

Not only does Shah insist that the word Baphomet came from Sufi Arabs, but also that the image of Baphomet as a goat-man has similar origins, along with the body of tradition observed by European witches who held sabbaths for the goat god. Specifically he credits the "Aniza Bedouin clan " with having "brought the witches to the West. " In particular, he names as responsible the Sufi poet Abu el-Atahiyya, about whom Shah quotes an unnamed source describing him as the "father of Arabic sacred poetry. " This poet had a mystical cult of followers that Shah says migrated to Spain after his death in the ninth century, bringing with them symbols and rituals that would be absorbed by practitioners of Western witchcraft. If Shah is to be believed, Eliphas Levi 's depiction of Baphomet with a torch burning between his horns originates with the poet ’s followers. As he wrote:

His circle of disciples, the Wise Ones, commemorated him in a number of ways after his death. To signify his tribe, they adopted the goat, cognate with the tribal name (Anz, Aniza). A torch between goat horns (“the devil ” in Spain, as it later became) symbolized for them the light of illumination from the intellect (head) of the “goat, ” the Aniza teacher. His wasm (tribal brand) was very much like a broad arrow, also called an eagle ’s foot. An alternative name for the Aniza is a kind of bird. This sign, known to witches as the goosefoot, became the mark for their places of meeting.

… After Atahiyya ’s death before the middle of the ninth century, tradition has it that a group of his school migrated to Spain, which had been under Arab rule for over a century at that time.

Shah, who clearly presents himself as a Sufi just like the ones he writes about, tended to put forward information with no attribution, claiming to have inside knowledge as a Sufi initiate. He traced quite a few peculiar terms associated with European witchcraft to Arabic words used by Sufis, including “athame ” (the ritual knife used in witches), “coven, ” and “sabbath ” (or “sabbat, ” as it ’s often spelled, which he connects to “az-zabat, ” meaning “the forceful [occasion] ”). He purported that quite a few non-Islamic religious and esoteric traditions actually stem from the influence of Sufism, including Jewish cabalism, the Holy Grail myth, chivalry, the cult of the Virgin Mary, the Catholic use of rosaries, the Hindu chakra system, yogic exercises, and the Yezidi religion of Kurdish Iraq. (The latter sect does, in fact, claim their own lineage from eleventh- century Sufi Master Sheik Adi.) While Shah didn ’t suggest that the Kaaba in Mecca is the real Temple of Solomon, he did say that it was not the Solomonic temple that the Templars were really dedicated to:

That the Templars were thinking in terms of the Sufi, and not the Solomonic, Temple in Jerusalem, and its building, is strongly suggested by one important fact. “Temple ” churches which they erected, such as one in London, were modeled upon the Temple as found by the Crusades, not upon any earlier building. This Temple was none other than the octagonal Dome of the Rock, built in the seventh century on a Sufi mathematical design, and restored in 913. The Sufi legend of the building of the Temple accords with the alleged Masonic version.

This, and no earlier one, is the Temple whose servants were the Knights Templar, accused of Saracenic leanings.

… The architectural measurements chosen for this Temple, as for the Kaaba building at Mecca, were numerical equivalents of certain Arabic roots conveying holy messages, every part of the building being related to every other part in definite proportion.

Prince Michael concurs with the idea that Templar buildings were modeled after the Dome of the Rock, and that this was the origin of the “secrets of sacred geometry ” that later became central to Masonic teachings, stating that:

The architectural concept of the Dome of the Rock would be later borrowed by the Christian church in its endeavor to establish the gothic style of architecture in Europe. For this is what the Dome of the Rock was, (sic) the precursor of the gothic arch.

Now while Shah did not come out and say anything concrete about the original Solomon ’s Temple and where it was located, he did make an intriguing statement that hints at something similar to what Prince Michael is claiming: What possible connection, it is sometimes asked, could there be between the Mecca temple of the Moslems and the Temple of Solomon and its building? There could be a very close connection indeed. First let it be noted that charges against ancient Sufis included the terrible allegation that a mime of the Mecca pilgrimage ceremonies could be carried out anywhere with equal validity to the actual pilgrimage.

This introduces the idea that post-diaspora Jews could have built a temple in Jerusalem to mimic their real temple in Mecca, as Prince Michael asserts they did. He also suggests a connection between the “black stone ” of the Kaaba (a meteorite said to have fallen from heaven) and the “stone of the wise ” (i.e., “Philosopher ’s Stone ”) of the alchemists:

It should not be forgotten that the Kaaba (literally, the Cube) is the foursquare temple of Mecca. The “black stone ” of Mecca is set in an outer corner of the Kaaba. It is thus correctly described as the Kaaba (Cube) stone, easily rendered as the Cubic Stone. It is also called harajel aswad (black stone). “Black, ” as we have noted, is rendered as “coal, ” and the “stone of black ” can be rendered as harajel fehm , “stone of wisdom, ” or even, in translation, “stone of the wise. ” Second only to this place for all Moslems is the sanctified spot known as the Temple of Solomon in Palestine.

Sufi tradition has it that [there] were a number of men who assembled in the Mecca temple and devoted themselves to its service. On the fall of Jerusalem to the Arabs, the first act of the Moslems was to repair to the site of the Solomonic Temple to acquire it for Islam. That the Sufi tradition was continued in respect of the Dome of the Rock is evidenced by the fact that its later interior decorations contain Sufi symbolic designs. Templar churches and other indications show the influence of the Saracen version of the Solomonic Temple.

There are several interesting connections between the (alleged) temple(s) in Jerusalem and the Kaaba in Mecca that we have noted ourselves. One is that Mohammed is alleged to have flown from the Kaaba to Jerusalem and back in a single night. Actually, The Koran says that he was taken “for a Journey by night from the Sacred Mosque to the farthest Mosque, ” but these have always been taken to be the Kaaba and the Temple Mount in Jerusalem, respectively. He also visited Heaven, as Enoch and Hermes are said to have done. While he was there he met Jesus and John the Baptist.

Supposedly it all started when he laid his head on the black stone of the Kaaba (analogous to the biblical story of Jacob falling asleep with his head on a stone), and was visited by the archangel Gabriel (the angel of wisdom and communication, similar to Hermes in that regard). He was given a ride on a winged horse with the face of a human female whose name was “Barak ”

(“Lightning ”). Amazingly, before the trip began, Mohammed was baptized with the holy water of wisdom, including his internal organs. A hadith (tradition) attributed to Malik bin Sa`sa`ah (as reported in the first footnote on Sura 53 of the Hilali and Khan translation of The Koran) says that Mohammed told him:

While I was at the House in a state midway between sleep and wakefulness, (an angel recognized me) as the man lying between two men. A golden tray full of wisdom and belief was brought to me and my body was cut open from the throat to the lower part of the abdomen and then my abdomen was washed with Zam-zam water and (my heart was) filled with wisdom and belief (emphasis added).

Zam-zam water is that coming from the sacred well near the Kaaba, which supposedly miraculously sprang from the ground when the Arab progenitor Ishmael and his mother Hagar were dying of thirst in the desert after being ditched there by Abraham. It is used by Muslims today in much the same way that holy water is used by Catholics. The whole incident is called “Isra, ” which sounds an awful lot like “Israel, ” but is actually translated “Night Journey, ” from the root “sera, ” meaning “to travel by night. ” Although it is described as happening to him while he was in a state “midway between sleep and wakefulness, ” most Muslims take it to have been a literal, physical, and miraculous journey.

However, to us it sounds identical to the term “go forth by night, ” which is used in the European witchcraft tradition to refer to the process of astral- projecting in one ’s sleep as a method of attending the Witches ’ Sabbath on a high mountain peak. After projecting their souls into the ether, it was said that the witches would ride flying goats or broomsticks to the secret meeting place for the ceremony. The Devil or “Black Man ” was sometimes said to arrive at the Sabbath by the same method. Just like with Mohammed ’s

Night Journey, while it sounds like it ’s all just a dream, it was taken by the witches themselves to be real. The Church took it to be so real that confessing to it was punishable by death. Modern witches sometimes have a more nuanced understanding. As Nigel Jackson wrote in Masks of Misrule :

The true Sabbat is simultaneously a state of Dreaming-Consciousness and an extradimensional locus where the convocation of the living and the dead occurs and the Great Return which leads to a new becoming is achieved.

… The oneiric nature of the Witch-Cult is evidenced at some of the earliest trials in Toulouse in 1335, where the witch Catherine Delort affirmed that she went to the Sabbat in her sleep. The Dream-Sabbat is the supreme rite of the Witches… . The Sabbat is a dream … of such potency that the profane world seems pallid and unreal in comparison.

This journey to the Sabbath on the back of a goat evinces the stories of Masonic initiations involving a goat ride, discussed previously. One can find postcards from the nineteenth and early twentieth century decorated with images of caricatured men dressed in Masonic regalia mounted upon a caprine animal and captioned with the term “Riding the Goat. ” As we mentioned, the rumor among suspicious “cowans ” (non-Masons) was that this was part of the Masonic initiation ceremony. But as the previously-quoted passage from Albert Mackey ’s Masonic encyclopedia proves, the fraternity officially denies that this is anything but a joke inspired by the accusations from their critics that they worship the Devil.

The 2012 book Ritual America , edited by Adam Parfrey and Craig Heimbichner, features numerous pictures taken from Masonic supply companies offering mechanical goats for sale to be ridden during ceremonies (along with devil costumes and other diabolical paraphernalia). However, they quote Christopher Hodapp ’s Freemasons for Dummies (written by a Mason, of course), which puts a damper on the idea that these goats were ever used for any “real ” ceremonies. He says that the toy goats were only used:

> … in other fraternal organizations and “fun ” degrees… . Such items only served to perpetuate the myth that Masons and other fraternities required a goat-ride ritual for their initiations. Freemasonry never has.
> Rest assured: There is no lodge goat. The degrees of Freemasonry are serious business to Freemasons, and there is no horseplay (or goatplay).

On the opposite side of the spectrum of belief, Turkish television, in the late 90s, aired footage supposedly taken of the “secret 33rd degree ritual ” of Scottish Rite Masonry (which is purportedly “honorary ” and has no actual ritual, according to Masonic publications). The rite shown on TV, taken with a “hidden camera, ” allegedly showed a goat being “sacrificed to Satan, ” although the image quality is so poor that nobody could have guessed that from watching it. Nonetheless, the video had quite an impact on the Turkish public, where Masonic conspiracy theories are quite widely believed. In fact, throughout the Muslim world it is frequently taught in school textbooks that the Ottoman Empire was taken down by infiltration from atheistic anti-establishment Freemasons in the Turkish government through the “Young Turks ” reform movement, largely populated by Masons.

The claim that mechanical goats have only been used in auxiliary “fun ” lodges is probably a reference to the antics of groups like the “Royal Order of Jesters, ” a quasi-Masonic offshoot organization open only to members of the Masonic “Shrine, ” which itself is only open to those who have already reached the thirty-second degree of the Scottish Rite. The ROJ is dedicated to the concept of “Mirth, ” and their official emblems for lodge functions are usually pornographic. Their mascot is the Billiken, a charm doll that looks like a little troll smiling evilly. It is called “the God of Things as They Ought to be, ” and the dolls, which began being sold around the turn of the century in an un-Masonic context, were said to bring good luck. The ROJ Billiken is often shown displaying his anus (marked with a red dot) and inviting the onlooker to kiss it. This is a clear reference to the osculum inflame of the Gnostics, Templars, and witches.

The Royal Order of Jesters is registered as a tax-exempt charitable organization and promoted as a place for men who are already Masons to have fun putting on comedy plays and the like. In reality, the ROJ seems to exist solely as a place for members to have group sex with prostitutes, which is what happens at most of their meetings. In relation to this, some of the Jesters were prosecuted for the trafficking of underage sex slaves after an FBI sting in Buffalo, New York. The existence of an inner hierarchy of the Jesters called the “Secret Order of Brothers in Blood ” hints at possibly even darker practices. The obscene kiss of the Jesters is not unique to them among Masonic organizations, but is also practiced by their parent order, the Shrine, yet in a much more interesting context.

The Ancient Arabic Order of the Noble Mystic Shrine (an acronym for an anagram of “A MASON ”) was started in 1870 in Manhattan by Walter M. Fleming and William J. Florence. Mr. Florence claimed that the idea came to him when attending a party in Marseilles, France that was thrown by an Arab diplomat, which ended with the guests being initiated into a secret society of some sort. This inspired him to create a Masonic appendage organization dedicated to “fun ” and “fellowship. ” Originally membership was confined only to Masons who have reached the 32nd degree of the Scottish Rite (Prince of the Sublime Royal Secret), or the Knights Templar degree of the York Rite. (In 2000 this was changed so that you only have to be a third degree Master Mason in the Blue Lodge, and in Arkansas you don ’t have to be a Mason at all.) The first “Temple ” (as the lodges of this group are called) was named “Mecca. ”

There is no doubt that the “Shrine ” which the order is named after is the Kaaba in Mecca. The initiation rite involves pretending that you are there. At the start of it, the “Oriental Guide ” opens the Bible to the first chapter of Job , and The Koran to the 38th Sura, with The Koran placed in front of the Bible. Strangely, some of the opening lines indicate the idea that “Allah ” and “God ” are not the same thing, as the “Illustrious Potentate ” prays the following:

In the name of God, our Father, and by the existence of Allah, the creed of Mohammed, and the legendary sanctity of the Temple of Mecca, I now proclaim this Temple regularly opened for business and ceremony… .

Elsewhere in the ritual, Allah is referred to as “their God ” — that is, “of the Arabs. ” But then the Illustrious Potentate declares his faith in that very religion, proclaiming:

Who is he who hath professed to have conversed in person with the Supreme and maketh himself mightiest of the mighty? Mohammed, the Prophet of the Arab ’s creed.

A few minutes later, the High Priest pronounces:

There are Moslems among us; there are others who swerve from propriety: but who so seeketh Islam earnestly seeks true direction… .

Later, the candidate must declare:

And upon this sacred book, by the sincerity of a Moslem ’s oath, I here register this irrevocable vow, in wilful violation whereof may I incur the fearful penalty of having my eyeballs pierced to the center with a three- edged blade, my feet flayed and I be forced to walk the hot sands upon the sterile shores of the Red Sea until the flaming sun shall strike me with livid plague; and may Allah, the God of Arab, Moslem and Mohammed, and the God of our fathers, support me to the entire fulfilment of the same. Amen, Amen, Amen.

He is then put through the “Moslem test, ” which is a series of hazing rites of physical abuse, on his “journey ” to the “shrine ” where the black stone is. Just as at the real Kaaba, the sacred black stone is situated in the corner, the one in the Shriner rite is placed in the southeast corner of their “temple. ” One of these hazing rites is called the “Grand Salaam, ” and involves being hit on the buttocks with an exploding paddle. He is also made to urinate on the “Devil ’s Pass, ” which seems analogous to what Muslims do during the “Hajj ” (the pilgrimage to the Kaaba). Later it is explained that this is literally just an excuse to get him to whip out his penis for others to see, as a test of his manhood. He is told:

Since this is a male organization, it is one way we have of making sure we are not admitting any impersonators into our ranks. Thus, you had to display your male organ to give a few drops.

As if this were a real concern, part of the ritual involves a character (male, a brother) dressed up as a female who is found to be “spying ” on the fraternity, and who is stabbed in the heart as punishment (with a bag of wine under his armpit punctured to represent the blood). They pretend to cut a wound into her breast into the shape of a Muslim crescent. The “blood ” is collected in a bowl and held aloft. Then the Illustrious Potentate tells them all:

Let us in this maiden ’s blood, seal the alliance of our bond of secrecy and silence, and let this day ’s bloody work in the deepest recesses of every Noble ’s heart be buried.

… It now becomes our duty to deposit the result of our vigilance in the tomb, isolated from the eyes of a meddling world; a fit abiding place for the remains of the unfaithful… .

Another character, the “spy ” woman ’s male accomplice, is “beheaded, ” and a plastic head is placed on display on a chair next to a skeleton, a coffin, a noose, and a coffin. Then the members are given a lecture stating that their order was started by Mohammed himself, with the exact same raison d ’etre as the Knights Templar: to protect pilgrims en route to the holy shrine. He says:

My friends or Nobles of the Mystic Shrine, the order with which you have become united was founded by Mohammed and has as its background the trackless desert of Arabia and the fearless, devoted, and barbaric Arab.

Arabic history and tradition tell us that after the fall and separation of Adam and Eve, they were united near the place now known as “Mecca. ”

Adam prayed for a Shrine where he might worship. In due time, a Tabernacle of Clouds was given to him.

After the death of Adam, the Tabernacle was withdrawn, and his son, Seth, erected a Temple of Stone in that place; later Ishmael, with his father Abraham, rebuilt on this sacred spot of the Tabernacle of Clouds, the Kaaba or the Sacred Temple of National Worship.

Each year the true followers of the faith would make a pilgrimage to Mecca to worship at the national shrine.

Because of the presence of a lawless element in the city of Mecca, many of these pilgrims were robbed, beaten, and even murdered. Therefore, in the year of AD 647, Mohammed organized a group of fearless men as an inquisition or vigilance committee, whose main objects were to protect the weak, dispense justice, and punish the criminals.

The order was firmly established in 1698, and since then has become one of the most highly-favoured secret organizations in the world.

Because of the ruthless manner which the group used to accomplish its aims, its leaders had to be careful in their selection of new members. Therefore, severe tests and strong obligations were required of each candidate.

You have just passed through those tests and are now a Noble of the Mystic Shrine.

In these rites, the Shriners pretend to have much respect for Islam, the Kaaba, and Mohammed. In fact, the candidate is essentially converting to Islam here. The supposed beauty and truth of The Koran is praised with words like this:

The Koran is the unique history of our founder Mohammed. The work is absolutely unique in its origin and in its preservation, upon the authenticity of which no one has ever been able to cast a serious doubt. The Koran is the actual text as dictated by Mohammed himself, day by day and month by month, during his lifetime. It is the reflection of this master-mind, sometimes inartistic and self-contradictory, more often inspiring and lyrical, and always filled with great ideas which stand out as a whole.

It doesn ’t seem like the person who wrote this has actually read The Koran , which does not contain any history per se and is not meant to be taken as such. But for some reason, they certainly want to promote it. Yet, there is clearly an air of the unholy, the prurient, and the base in the ritual. In addition to the public urination requirement, there is what we might call the abundant “ass- play. ” The candidate is made to wash the “hind parts ” of one of his fellows (with what is pretended to be holy Zam-zam water). He is slapped on the buttocks numerous times with various objects, including during the aforementioned “Grand Salaam, ” which happens when the candidate is instructed to place his “hind parts in the faces of the Nobles sitting behind ” him. He is later forced to eat something that he is told is “dung. ” Finally, when he reaches the black stone in the corner of the temple, which they call the “Black Stone of Casper ” (presumably named after one of the three Oriental Wise Men that attended the birth of Jesus), he is told to kiss it (which is what Muslim pilgrims do to their own black stone), only to then be humiliated for doing so! The holy Black Stone is then compared to a butt. The candidate is told, condescendingly:

Ishmael and his father, Abraham, built the National Shrine near the place where ... an angel presented them with a dazzling White Stone, which they inserted in the wall of the Temple, and each year the worshipers would journey to Mecca to kiss this Stone. Today so many have kissed the Stone that it has become black, and is known as the Kaaba Stone or Black Stone of Casper. Our ritual stipulates that you, in token of your sincerity, seal your obligations by kissing the Black Stone of Casper.

No doubt many times you have stated that you would not “kiss ” anybody ’s “hind parts ” to gain a favor. Well, it seems that you wanted to be a Shriner so bad that you were willing to kiss “the Black Stone of Casper. ” Shame on you.

This is all very interesting. The humiliating admonition at the end reminds us of the description of the Templar initiation in the Chinon Parchment, where it says that, after being made to kiss his brother ’s behind, the new initiate would be encouraged to confess his “sin. ” Later in the “Shrine Lecture, ” the candidate is told that in Mecca the Black Stone is “according to Arab tradition, in the center of the world and immediately beneath the throne of the Almighty. ” In Eliphas Levi ’s depiction of Baphomet, the goat-man is shown seated on a dark cubic stone, with a lunar crescent (an Islamic symbol) on either side of him. Are the Shrine rituals a clue that some Masons see the Kaaba as the “seat ” of the goat god, to be “kissed ” ritually as the butt of the goat was kissed anciently by Templars and witches?

That, perhaps, will never be known. But does the existence of the Shriners strengthen Prince Michael ’s argument that the Templars found the Solomon temple at the Kaaba site, and that secrets pertaining to this are hidden within the rites of Freemasonry? It certainly seems that way to us. Although the Shrine is, admittedly, not the oldest of Masonic orders, it is now one of the highest ranked, at least in America. It does seem significant that this order is essentially the pinnacle of Freemasonry, open (until recently) only to their most elite. After going through all of the Masonic rituals dedicated to the Temple of Solomon, and immediately after receiving the honors of the Knights Templar, one then then has the opportunity to “graduate ” next to an order dedicated to Islam and its foremost temple! But they are also making fun of it, like the old “Feast of Fools ” where people would mock the Passion Play in medieval times, and which constituted a Black Mass of sorts. It also reminds us of the mocking of Islamic holy symbols and rituals that purportedly took place within the Order of Assassins, as we mentioned earlier.

Also interesting is a description given in the Shrine Lecture about how Mecca (at the time the lecture was first written) was sort of hidden in the surrounding landscape. It says:

Mecca unfolds in the wilderness of the Arabian desert, halfway between Yemen and Syria, in a land wasted by winds and secular rains, a valley enclosed between two sharp and arid chains of rock mountains, making its position so secluded that not until the pilgrims are looking down into its streets do they know that they have arrived at the sacred city.

The description brings to mind the idea of the Templar treasure hunters intrepidly marching down to Mecca with inside information about what was really there, and an open invitation from the guardians of the sanctuary, as Prince Michael claims it to have happened. Besides, if we were, just for a moment, to entertain the idea that the Masons got the Shrine rites directly from Mohammed himself, would this not then indirectly imply the involvement of the Templars? Weren ’t the Templars (with their seeming involvement with Sufi groups and the Assassins) better positioned to have obtained such secrets from Muslims in a position to know, rather than a

New Yorker from the nineteenth century who attended a party in France with an Arab diplomat?

The real question though, is whether or not there really is a secret connection between the Temple Mount in Jerusalem and the Kaaba in Mecca that the Templars may have known about. There may be at least a vague memory of this latent in the traditions of modern Freemasons and their offshoots. In this regard it is worth contemplating a few salient points.

Firstly, the “Black Stone ” of the Kaaba is, like the Kaaba itself, older than Islam. As the Shriner initiation ritual indicated, there is an Islamic belief that it was brought down from Heaven by an angel, or that it “fell ” from Heaven (which would make sense if, as is assumed, it is a meteorite). The places where it first landed supposedly indicated to Adam and Eve where to build the first altar to God. Its use was interrupted by the Deluge. Later, Abraham and Ishmael supposedly built an altar in the same spot, around the same stone. Here (say Muslims) it was Ishmael, not Isaac, who was almost sacrificed to God by his father, before God changed his mind at the last minute. There are other theories too. Tracy R. Twyman ’s husband, Hareth al-Bustani, once attended a Sufi lecture where he was told that the Black Stone brought the germ of life to Earth from outer space. Others have suggested that the Kaaba is positioned at the center of Pangea, the land mass believed to exist before the continents drifted to where they are today.

Ishmael ’s descendants, the Arabs, turned the area of the Kaaba into a place of pagan worship. Supposedly, there were at one point hundreds of idols within it, each belonging to one of the Arab tribes who sent pilgrims there every year to sacrifice goats to them. (The offerings were placed inside of a dried well within the Kaaba tent.) The number that we have read most often for how many idols were there is 360, which divides nicely into 12, the number of tribes that supposedly descended from Ishmael, and matches up with the number of degrees in the circle around the Kaaba that pilgrims walk in. However, we have also seen the numbers 364 and 365 written in books, which may indicate a connection to either the lunar or solar calendars (respectively). 364 is the number of days in thirteen lunar months, and the number thirteen seems important to the Freemasons, particular the Shriners. Muslims do observe a lunar calendar (though not one of thirteen months), and they do appear to afford some special reverence to the Moon, as the crescent is one of their emblems (and was used by the Templars on their seals also).

Presently the Kaaba stone is broken into several fragments, and much of it appears to be lost. The remaining bits are sealed together in a black epoxy, which is then affixed to the Eastern corner of the tabernacle it sits within. This structure is roughly in the shape of a cube, thus the name “Kaaba, ” which means exactly that. The silver object that holds the black stone in the corner looks a bit vaginal, with the stone and epoxy recessed inside of it, and this is what the pilgrims kiss when they are “circumambulating ” around the Kaaba during the Hajj.

The Temple Mount in Jerusalem is, like the Kaaba, supposedly built upon the “Eben Shetiyah, ” the “Foundation Stone ” of the world. This is believed to have been Ground Zero for creation, from which everything God made radiated outward. This rock is in the center of the platform called the “Temple Mount, ” and it is believed to be the site where Solomon placed the “Holy of Holies, ” the inner chamber of his temple, built in the shape of a perfect cube, where the Ark of the Covenant resided.

This is the rock that the Dome of the Rock, which crowns it, is named after, and it is here that Mohammed supposedly touched down when he came there during the Night Journey. The rock purportedly enjoyed Mohammed ’s company so much that it tried to follow him when he left. As he ascended back up, it floated up also, and they say Gabriel had to press down on it to get it to go back in place. This allegedly caused his hand print, as well as the hooves of al- Burak, to be left in its surface (which some people believe can be seen there to this very day).

The location is thought of as a nexus between Heaven and Earth. Indeed, right next door is something called the “Dome of the Chain, ” which is actually older and was in fact the architectural model for the Dome of the Rock. According to Jerome Murphy-Conner, in his 2008 book The Holy Land: An Oxford Archaeological Guide from Earliest Times to 1700 , Mujadir ad-Din (a fifteenth- century writer in Jerusalem) once wrote:

Among the wonders of the Holy House is the chain, which Solomon, son of David, suspended between Heaven and Earth, to the east of the Rock, where the Dome of the Chain now stands. The chain had one characteristic. If two men approached it to solve a point of litigation, only the honest and upright man could take hold of it; the unjust man saw it move out of his reach.

Some Muslims further believe that this same test will be used to judge their souls at the End Times, and that the Final Judgment will take place right there under the Dome. This chain of course reminds us of the one mentioned in The Iliad that Zeus dangled between Heaven and Earth, and the chains held by “Mete ” on the coffer at the British Museum, which might be used to pull the Sun and Moon down from their heavenly spheres.

In his book on the cabalistic text Sefer Yetzirah (The Book of Creation), Aryeh Kaplan writes about a pair of serpents, one coiled around the other, called the “telis, ” one male and one female. They are clearly Lilith and Samael. He describes them as hanging down from Heaven, and that the universe is suspended from them. Kaplan says that according to cabalistic tradition, they can also be viewed as one hair hanging down from the beard of “Zer Anpin, ” a name for the “Little Face ” of God, visualized as a disembodied head. Yes, like Baphomet (and the Roman god Janus), God has two faces—in his case, one small and one large, and like Baphomet, can be viewed as a head. From each of the hairs of Zer Anpin ’s beard, an entire universe is suspended. This is a head of wisdom, for as Kaplan explains:

The Talmud states that the hanging (or piled) hair relates to the fact that every letter of the Torah contains “piles and piles ” (teli tela ’im) of wisdom. Besides this, the hanging hairs are said to relate to the lines upon which the letters of the Torah are written.

The Torah which is spoken of here is not the ordinary written Torah, but the primeval Torah, which was written “with black fire on white fire. ” According to many Kabbalists, this primeval Torah is itself identified with Zer Anpin.

In this picture, each letter of the Torah is seen as a hair in the beard of Zer Anpin. These are not seen as simple hairs, but as channels, through which God ’s wisdom emanates from His “head. ” The “head ” is the concealed wisdom of God, while the letters are its outwards revelation… .

A few paragraphs later, Kaplan makes a comment which seems to indicate that the place where the hair/serpent hangs down, from which our universe is suspended, is actually Jerusalem:

The scripture calls the “hangings ” of the divine beard Taltalim. The Zohar relates this to the word Talpiot , which, as the Talmud teaches, is the “hill (tell) to which all mouths (piot) turn. ” This “hill ” is the mount upon which the Temple was built, which Jacob called the “gate of heaven ” (Genesis 28:17).

According to tradition, the area of the Temple Mount connects not just Heaven and Earth, but the underworld as well. For Muslims believe that beneath the Foundation Stone is the Well of Souls, a cave where you can hear the cries of ghosts awaiting judgement. A whole punched in the Foundation Stone leads down there. The Talmud also says that the stone covers an opening to the Abyss, where the waters of the Deluge came from, and receded back to. According to The Book of Jubilees , it is even the place where Eden once was. The cube-shaped inner sanctum of Solomon ’s Temple, where only the high priests were allowed, is said here to match up precisely with the location of the Garden, so that when the priests go in there, it is like returning to the forbidden zone of Eden. The inner sanctum of the temple contained the Ark of the Covenant, which served as God ’s “throne ” on Earth, where he would make his appearance during the ceremonies, just as his throne was also present (according to many extra-biblical texts) in Eden.

Mohammed ’s Night Journey, as we mentioned previously, brings to mind the story of Jacob, who, according to Genesis , fell asleep on a certain stone and had a fantastic vision of a ladder leading to Heaven, with angels ascending and descending upon it. Afterwards, he declared the spot where he had slept the “House of God, and a gate to Heaven. ” He built a temple on that very spot, using the rock he had slept on as a cornerstone.

Significantly, the word for “ladder ” used in this instance was “salem, ” which specifically indicates a ziggurat (a stepped pyramid like the kind found in ancient Mesopotamia). Consider the fact that this word is part of the name of the city of Jerusalem, where the temple of Solomon is commonly believed to have been. Consider also that the “Tower of Babel ” was literally, according to the story in Genesis , a stepped ziggurat as tall as Heaven, built for the purpose of storming Heaven. Then consider that the builder of another temple, the foundations of which have been found in Jerusalem (unlike those of Solomon ’s Temple), was named Zerubabel, because he was born in Babylon.

Also amazing is the fact that Jacob ’s pillow stone is believed by Brits to be a treasure of their own monarchy, and they claim that this is the stone which sits beneath the throne where all their kings and queens are coronated. But it came to them via the Stuarts of Scotland (who got it from Ireland, where it was supposedly brought from Egypt). Prince Michael claims in The Forgotten Monarchy of Scotland that the stone beneath the throne is a fake, and that the real one is in his family ’s possession.

However, The Talmud says that Jacob ’s stone is the very same as the Foundation Stone in the Temple Mount, and that this is the same location where Jacob had built his temple earlier. Yet the Bible ’s description of the incident with Jacob (Genesis 28: 10-22) makes it seem to take place somewhere else, in a place then called “Luz, ” which he renamed to Bethel (“House of God ”). Bethel is usually found north of Jerusalem on the maps printed in Bibles.

Now, doesn ’t it strike you as odd that the Christians and Jews have both each identified multiple sites for what seems to be the same honor: the location of their temple that connects Heaven to Earth? Also, doesn ’t it strike you as odd that the Muslims honor both the Temple Mount and the Kaaba, for essentially the same reason? Mohammed even visited both in the same fantastic night, making the connection between the two overt. Also, he originally instructed the converts to his new religion to set their “Qiblah ” (the direction in which Muslims are to pray) to point towards the Temple Mount in Jerusalem, but then later changed it to the direction of Mecca on the instructions of his deity. What does this mean?

Tracy R. Twyman has speculated about this earlier in her book The Merovingian Mythos and the Mystery of Rennes-le-Chateau . On the subject of the various “navels of the world ” that have been observed by different societies in different places throughout history as their premiere holy sites, the alleged centers of the world where supposedly creation began (of which there must be hundreds), she suggested that these locations are usually marked with relic, such as the world ’s “foundation stone ” or a “stone from Heaven, ” that makes them sacred. They are thus considered the “navel of the world ” because that ’s where the sacred “belly button ” is placed. When different locations become identified as such by the same society, this indicates to her that the sacred object has been moved from one place to another during the course of time. Therefore both places are remembered as the “center, ” even though only one (or none at all) may still be the location of the stone.

This would explain why the mere symbol of “the Stone ” itself, and not just any particular location, is enough to unite Hermetic and occult groups throughout the centuries in an unending tradition of the veneration of this concept. In Wolfram von Eschenbach ’s Parzival , the Holy Grail is a “stone that fell from heaven. ” By magic it calls out the “Grail knights ” (clearly Templars, with red crosses on their mantles) that it wants to serve it (as their names appear temporarily on its surface). As we just mentioned, the tent around the Black Stone at Mecca is cubic, and the “Holy of Holies ” of Solomon ’s Temple was cubic. So too was Noah ’s Ark (though few realize this, unless they try to draw out the dimensions dictated to Noah by God). The alchemists, as we stated before, described their Philosopher ’s Stone as cubic. The Anatolian goddess Cybele, worshipped throughout the ancient world, was associated with a stone that was venerated, and many have suggested that her name is connected with the word “cube. ” You will recall that, according to Joseph von Hammer-Purgstall, the feminine aspect of Baphomet, whom he identified as “Mete ” or Sophia, could also be equated to Cybele. The image of “Mete ” on the coffer he found was labeled by the British Museum as featuring Cybele, probably because of the towers on her crown (one of Cybele ’s signature features).

It should come as no surprise then to find those critical of Islam suggesting that the veneration of the black stone of the Kaaba is a continuation of the goddess worship of the ancient world. They even claim that the goddess being worshipped there is Lilith herself. In The Archeology of World Religions by Jack Finegan from 1952, the author suggests that Allah, a version of the Babylonian Enlil, was worshipped as a supreme creator god at the Kaaba, though among other gods, by the pre-Islamic pagan Arabs. His consort in this scheme was the goddess Allat, linguistically connected to Lilith. Allat is actually mentioned in The Koran , Sura 53, where the names of three goddesses popularly worshipped by pagans at the pre-Islamic Kaaba are cursed. But according to eighth-century Muslim historian Ibn Ishaq, based on the narration of Muhammad ibn Ka ’b, tradition has it that these verses originally said something else entirely. But then Mohammed determined that those verses had actually been inspired by Satan, so Allah gave him new ones to replace them. The (now infamous) “Satanic Verses ” supposedly stated:

Have ye thought upon Al-Lat and Al- ‘Uzza, and Manat, the third, the other? These are the exalted [birds], whose intercession is hoped for.

Finegan puts forth that the crescent and star symbol of Islam represents the Al-Lat (as a lunar goddess) and Al-Uzza (connected with the goddess and planet Venus, the Morning Star). He also describes Al-Manat as the deity who metes out justice or fate, making her the equivalent of the Roman goddess Nemesis. Let us point out that “Nemesis ” just happens to be the password of the Masonic Shrine. Also interesting is that, in The Third Book of Enoch , the Watchers (who become the fallen angels) are led by three characters, named, “Azza, ” “Uzza, ” and “Azzael ” (all seemingly based on Azazel), who accuse mankind of sin before God (but are themselves driven from their heavenly abode because of their own transgressions).

It is worthy of note that on the grounds of the Kaaba, there are three pillars (actually changed into flat walls now) that have always been there. Pilgrims traditionally stone them each with pebbles, to represent throwing stones at the Devil. The “Tracing Board ” of the first degree of Freemasonry (an instructional graphic) always shows three pillars, above which are the Sun (on the left), the Moon surrounded by stars (on the right) and the All-Seeing Eye above the one in the center. They are positioned in a right triangle, with a ladder (like a fireman ’s ladder) in the midst, leading up to Heaven. There is a chequered floor on the bottom, indicating either the floor of the Kaaba, or the floor of Solomon ’s Temple (as they have both been depicted with such a floor in artwork).

What if we were to think of both the Kaaba and the Temple Mount as each being a “ladder to Heaven, ” and the stones associated with each as “pillars ” that “hold up the sky? ” This is a concept commonly found in mythology and in Islamic scripture in particular. So the three pillars on the Masonic tracing boards could be expressive of the idea that there is a third pillar somewhere else. More commonly, though, the concept is expressed with only two pillars, such as those of Jachin and Boaz. These are the names given in the Old Testament to the two pillars that allegedly stood outside of the entrance to Solomon ’s Temple. In Masonic lodges they are usually represented with a globe on top of each: one a terrestrial globe (showing the world), the other a celestial globe (showing the stars in the sky). Thus the pillars are shown holding up both the Earth and Heaven, just as the ancients believed that such pillars kept the sky from collapsing on top of us, and kept the world from falling into the Abyss.

In Freemasonry, and in many Western occult traditions, these pillars are taken as representations of two polar opposite but necessary principles of existence, often characterized as either “strength and beauty ” or “wisdom and severity. ” In the classic Rider-Waite tarot deck, one pillar is shown colored black, and the other is white. Then there are the Pillars of Seth, and the Pillars of Hermes, which were both described as having been erected to preserve human knowledge through a global catastrophe. Both of these sets of pillars are also the subject of Masonic legends.

So is it possible that the Templars, and later the Freemasons, revered both the Temple Mount in Jerusalem, and the Kaaba in Mecca, as the twin pillars of the universe, and the locations of two sacred stones, one black, and one (in their system of symbols, at least) white? Could it be that they had a special relationship with the guardians of the Kaaba, as Prince Michael suggests, due to a shared blood lineage, and a shared understanding of the sacred secrets hidden in these places. Is it possible that they revered Baphomet as a representation of the union of these two things —the powers behind both holy shrines? Did they perhaps also honor Mohammed, and Islam, for having rediscovered and united the powers of these two places?

Let us recall that, while the Templars may have been Christian in a certain sense, the upper echelons of the group were certainly more than that as well, as we have amply demonstrated in this book. We know that Jesus, the Virgin Mary, and John the Baptist are all acknowledged as holy people in The Koran , and by Muslims everywhere. Those of us who grew up Christian should also know that in

John 14:16-17 (KJV), Jesus told his apostles before he left them that:

I will pray the Father, and he shall give you another Comforter, that he may abide with you for ever. Even the Spirit of truth; whom the world cannot receive, because it seeth him not, neither knoweth him: but ye know him; for he dwelleth with you, and shall be in you.

The Greek word here, Periclytos , has been variously translated as “comforter ” and “consoler. ” Some Islamic theologians choose to believe that it is the equivalent of the Arabic word for “praised one, ” which is “Ahmad, ” one of Mohammed ’s epithets. In Sura 61:6 of The Koran (Sahih International translation), Mohammed is identified as the one whose coming was promised by Jesus:

And … when Jesus, the son of Mary, said, “O children of Israel, indeed I am the messenger of Allah to you confirming what came before me of the Torah and bringing good tidings of a messenger to come after me, whose name is Ahmad. ” But when he came to them with clear evidences, they said, “This is obvious magic. ”

However, verse 22 of John Chapter 14 (KJV) makes it clear that the Comforter is in fact the Holy Spirit:

The Comforter, which is the Holy Ghost, whom the Father will send in my name, he shall teach you all things, and bring all things to your remembrance, whatsoever I have said unto you.

This would seem to disqualify Mohammed, unless we want to identify the Prophet with the Holy Spirit. Certainly, we previously mentioned evidence that suggests Baphomet may have been identified with the Holy Spirit, as he/she was with Sophia, the Divine Wisdom, which the Church has always equated with the Holy Spirit. So we can connect Mohammed with Allah, Allah with Allat, Allat with Lilith, and Lilith with Sophia, and thus get to the Holy Spirit that way. Also, there is the possibility that the baptism “with fire, and with the Holy Spirit ” that John the Baptist promised the one to come after him would bring was, in the eyes of the Knights Templar, the same as their “Baptism of Wisdom. ” Let us recall that the Templars ’ alleged secret rule, supposedly contained in The Book of The Baptism of Fire , was said to have been written for the “Consoled Brothers, ” and possibly referred to the Cathar rite of Consolamentum .

It is fitting that the bloodline of Abraham ’s disinherited first-born son Ishmael (whose name literally became a term in English for “outcast ”) should produce Mohammed, the “Seal of the Prophets. ” After all, Jesus did predict that in the End Times, “the last shall be the first, and the first shall be the last. ” As we mentioned before, the Judaic tradition is replete with first-born sons that have been disinherited, with God ’s favor. There was Cain, who admittedly, actually did something to deserve this. But then there was Jacob and his older brother Esau (progenitor of the accursed Edomites). Jacob used trickery and subterfuge against their father Isaac as he lay on his deathbed, and impersonated his brother in order to steal his inheritance from him. He did this by covering his arms with goat hair to simulate the fur that Genesis says Esau was covered with, which is an interesting detail in itself. But the Lord still blessed him, and cursed his brother!

Then there was the story of Pharez and Zerah, twin sons of Jacob ’s son Judah. Zerah ’s hand protruded from the womb first, and the midwife tied a scarlet thread around his wrist to indicate that he was the first-born. But then his hand was pulled back inside, and his brother bullied his way out first, becoming the inheritor of the family birthright. It is Pharez who went on to become an ancestor of King David and Jesus Christ.

But shouldn ’t we note that on Yom Kippur, the goat that was sacrificed to Azazel was marked with a red thread tied around its horn? Does that not indicate that Azazel represents the disinherited first-born? It was Azazel who, according to The First Book of Enoch , God decided to blame for all of the crimes that resulted in him bringing the Deluge, even though many others were at fault also. We are talking about the Devil, the Serpent, who felt slighted by his creator ’s preference for his younger creation, Adam, and refused the order to bow down to the new man of “clay ” (according to both The Koran and the Christian Book of Adam and Eve .)

It could be viewed as Adam ’s first wife, Lilith, pushed aside for Eve, or Jehovah ’s first wife, the Matronit, pushed aside for a “mistress, ” as the cabalists described in the previously quoted sections of The Zohar . Or it could be seen as the Father of all looking down resentfully at the Demiurge as he pretends to be the first and only god. You might think of it as the eldest principal of darkness, jealous of the presence of the younger principle of light, which it comprehendeth not. Or you could think of it as the other way around, as many Gnostics did.

The following quote from The Zohar makes it clear that Esau was identified with the “seirim ” (goat-demons), a word associated with both Azazel and Lilith. It is done in the context of explaining why the Israelites would sacrifice a special “portion ” of the regular daily burnt offerings to a spirit called the “End of All Flesh, ” to appease the “accusers, ” saying that these beings get sustenance from the smoke. Here Jehovah has dictated that his priests must sacrifice to these disinherited accuser spirits while invoking the Holy Spirit in order to satiate the demons ’ desire for flesh and quell their anger at having their inheritance taken away from them. From The Zohar (Noah 65a, from Volume 1 of the Soncino Edition):

R. Eleazar, studying one day with his father, R. Simeon, asked him “Did the ‘End of all flesh ’ derive nourishment from the sacrifices which Israel used to offer on the altar? ” His father replied: “all alike derived sustenance from them, both above and below… . Baked meal-offerings and other meal- offerings are the means of invoking the Holy Spirit … and from the smoke that rises up from the oil and the flour all the accusers replenish themselves, so that they are powerless to pursue the indictment which has been delivered into their hands. Thus we see that things have been so arranged in a mystery of faith that the adversary should have his share in the holy things, and that the requisite portion should ascend even to the Limitless.

… In regard, then, to the “End of all flesh, ” just as there is unison above with joy (at the time of the sacrifice), so also below there is joy and appeasement. There is thus satisfaction both above and below, and the Mother of Israel watches lovingly over her children. Consider this. At every New Moon the “End of all flesh ” is given a portion over and above that of the daily offering, so as to divert his attention from Israel, who are thus left entirely to themselves and in full freedom to commune with their King. This extra portion comes from the he-goat (sa ’ir), being the portion of Esau, who is also called sa ’ir, as it is written, “Behold Esau my brother is a hairy (sa-ir) man ” (Genesis 27:2). Esau thus has his portion and Israel their portion… . The whole desire of this “End of all flesh ” is for flesh only, and the tendency of flesh is ever towards him; it is for this reason that he is called “End of all flesh. ” Such power, however, as he does obtain is only over the body and not over the soul. The soul ascends to her place, and the body is given over to its place… . ”

“Accuser ” is one of the common epithets for the Devil, a word that comes from the Greek diabolos (“slanderer ”), just as “Satan ” means “the adversary ” (like one ’s opponent in a court of law). The idea is that he is constantly accusing the sons of Adam of sin, and Jehovah of hypocrisy for loving Adam ’s sons. He is a villain precisely because he is judgmental and tries to hold others to the letter of the law. But we see from the Bible stories we have mentioned so far that Jehovah seems quite willing to twist the law in order to put his favorites in the line of succession of heavenly blessings, which just further enrages the adversary.

In Greek mythology, the adversarial role was played by Momus, a god whose name means “blame ” or “censure. ” He was kicked out of Olympus by the other gods because of his constant sneering criticism of them all. But he was adopted by the Royal Order of Jesters as their mascot, identified with their idol, a trollish good luck charm called a Billiken, because they saw him as the ultimate joker, the lord of “mirth. ” It is interesting to think that this organization may be stockpiling blackmail footage of their members cheating on their wives, violating prostitution laws and committing child rape, with the power to hold their members under the threat of public accusations regarding these things should anyone break the code of silence. Momus is the one to say “We are all equally guilty here, so don ’t throw stones. ”

Returning to the above-quoted passage from The Zohar , another thing to be noted there is the claim that the way to invoke the Holy Spirit is through burnt offerings, just as the Templars may have associated the Holy Spirit with human infant sacrifice through a baptism of fire. The Bible makes it clear that sacrifice of the firstborn is an offering demanded by Jehovah of everybody. Just as he rejected his own firstborn (the Serpent, Chaos, the Night), he has demanded the same of each generation of his “chosen ” families, according to the Bible stories we have mentioned. The pantomime of Abraham pretending to “almost ” sacrifice Isaac, only to substitute a ram for him instead, represents the real scapegoat sacrifice that happened when Abraham sent Ishmael out in the wilderness to die, just like the goat for Azazel on Yom Kippur.

This concept of the sacrifice of the firstborn, and the substitution of it, comes up over and over again throughout the biblical narrative: from the Passover, with its sheep substitute; to the sacrifice of the freedom of the Levites in slavery to priesthood as a substitute for the other tribes of Israelites (and the temple tax as the price to redeem each individual Israelite whose firstborn was not sacrificed); to the sacrifice of Jesus on behalf of everyone worldwide. There is the need to somehow pay that “price, ” charged by God that is for some inexplicable reason connected with sin. This is because “the wages of sin is death, ” and if death (Hades) is identified as the abode of the Devil, we should note that, as in the Yom Kippur ritual, and the aforementioned sacrifices to the End of All Flesh, the Devil is given his “due ” along with the offerings to God.

It is our suspicion that the concept of Gnosis treasured by the Templars, the Freemasons, and many other occultists, is the understanding that both God and the Devil had a hand in creation, and their children —the bloodline of Adam and the bloodline of the Serpent (respectively) —each have equal claim to lordship over creation. All of these groups have left many clues indicating that their real “secret ” is the shared origin, and the equality, of the principles of good and evil, darkness and light, or creation and destruction. This is what alchemists have always claimed is the secret of the Philosopher ’s Stone, the key to mastery over all created matter. This is what Hermeticists have always indicated they believe to be the ultimate enlightenment. All of the radically dualist heresies —the Cathars, the Bogomils, and the Manichaeans —all claimed that there were two distinct, eternal principles of light and darkness, in constant strife with one another and may have applied this to idea of competing bloodlines (symbolized in the New Testament as “the sheep and the goats, ” “the wheat and the tares, ” or “the good tree and bad tree ”).

The principle is clearly illustrated in compound chimera figures like Baphomet and Abraxas. We also see it in the piebald or checkerboard patterns of alternating black and white segments used by the Templars as their battle flag, and used by Freemasons on the floors of their lodges. Chequerboard tile floors can also be found in early images of what the floor of the Kaaba used to look like, as well as several old drawings of the floor of Solomon ’s Temple (perhaps influenced by Masonic traditions).

The secret, latently understood goal of the “Craft ” —of witches and Masons —is to unite the black and white stones —to “double the cube ” (a famous mathematical problem once thought impossible). They want to somehow put it all back together, to gain that ultimate power of the universe that was used for creation ex nihilo . Seizing this power —God ’s power —is like storming Heaven, piercing the seal of the “flaming sword ” which “turns every way ” to protect the Tree of Life. This is the same concept as the Valentinian Gnostic doctrine of a “cross ” that separates the Pleroma (akin to what the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn calls the “Supernal Eden ”) and the Kenoma (the manifest realm of matter). As Tracy R. Twyman posits at the end of her book Clock Shavings , secret societies have long cherished the idea of being able to penetrate this hidden realm, not only to escape the material “prison ” that we are in, but to escape the cycle of death that pervades here, and to take for themselves the immortality of the gods. While different groups embraced different theories about how to do that and what it meant, their mysteries, when decoded, frequently point to this as their main long-term goal.

The Corpus Hermeticum tells us that a soul entering a physical body is being “baptized ” or “immersed ” into the “inferno of matter ” (the lustful pleasures and pains of the flesh) as a form of punishment. In the Ophite diagrams of the universe (as revealed by Celsus and Origin), the archontic realm of matter is surrounded by a circle labeled “Leviathan. ” The Ophites are said to have viewed Leviathan the “soul of all things ” (or alternately the “soul that travels through all things ”). It is the equivalent of the Ouroboros, the snake swallowing its own tail, often used to represent the barrier between the cosmos and eternity, where the beginning meets the end and engenders a new beginning. The image was popularized by Cleopatra the Alchemist, third to fourth-century author of Chrysopeia (Gold-Making), who described the Ouroboros as “the sum of all philosophy. ”

Meanwhile, the angelic realm in the Ophite diagrams (as demonstrated in Jacques Matter ’s 1826 book Histoire Critique du Gnosticisme) is surrounded by a circle labeled “Behemoth. ” This figure, you will remember, is identified as the partner of Leviathan, and just as with Lilith and Samael, it is said that creation will be destroyed if they are ever allowed to mate. The Arabs wrote about this creature as well, calling him “Bahamut. ” The Arabian Nights describes him as a fish with a bull head supporting the universe on his back. Surely this is the same character as “Bahumed, ” taken by both Giles F. Yates and Hammer-Purgstall to be related to “Baphomet, ” and to bovine symbolism (the calf or Karuf in this instance). How strange, then, that the interpretation Hammer-Purgstall later took of the name of the Templar idol (“Baptism of Wisdom ”) seems so widely divergent from this early speculation. But, as we have discovered, the meaning of Baphomet is really multi-faceted, and none of the possible interpretations cancel out the others.

Recall that Eliphas Levi, who probably contributed more to the development of the Baphomet mythos than almost anybody, suggested that the name was a code for the Latin phrase Templi omnium hominum pacis abhas : “abbot (that is, ‘father ’ or ‘priest ’) of the temple of universal peace among men. ” What if the Templars, and later Freemasons, believed that there had once been a temple that all men could turn towards in prayer that would unite all of the world ’s monotheists, and perhaps most everybody else as well, in the common belief that it was indeed the center of the world—the main contact point with the divine? Or, what if they discovered that there never was a physical temple to begin with, but rather a symbolic or etheric one —one that they intended to rebuild? What if they revered Baphomet as the high priest (the pontifex , meaning “bridge builder, ” the origin of the Pope ’s title “pontiff) or intercessor of a metaphorical temple that acts as a bridge or ladder linking Earth to Heaven, like the Tower of Babel was meant to do?

It seems they may have anticipated that penetrating this forbidden zone could result in the destruction of creation as we know it, “pulling down the heavens, ” as the image of Mete discovered by Hammer-Purgstall suggests, collapsing the “pillars ” that hold Heaven up from Earth, which connects to the Masonic allegory of death as a the breaking of a column. Eve, by the way, is represented in the cabalistic rituals of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn as actually holding up these pillars on her shoulders. The pillars are shown as being part of the Tree of Life in the Garden of Eden, and it is explained in the rite that when Adam and Eve fell from grace, these pillars fell also, causing the flaws in existence that we have now.

Now here there is a connection to the planetary powers of the Gnostic Archons, and to the krater bowl of Mind mentioned in The Corpus Hermeticum as being a source of wisdom in which initiates to the mysteries should immerse themselves. The ancients actually spoke of seven cosmocrators which clearly corresponded to the seven so-called (back then) “planets. ” The name seems to mean “cosmic bowls, ” and goes along with the old idea that the “heavens ” were circles within circles (or bowls within bowls, each a planetary orbit). But the descriptions of them make them sound like columns holding up the heavens (Mundi Tenentes or “World Holders, ” as Tertullian called them). This goes along with the imagery found in The Arabian Nights of Bahamut supporting the “seven hills ” (described as seven stages of existence) on his back. The Oxford English Dictionary actually translates the word cosmocrator as “Ruler of the World, ” stating that it was a Gnostic “technical term for Satan ” (just as the Cathars called the same figure “Rex Mundi ”).

An inverted, infernal interpretation of the Hermetic Baptism of Wisdom (such as the Templars are alleged to have practiced) might have aimed at upsetting these bowls, pouring our their contents on us all (thus the immersion) as the levels of reality they were thought to uphold and separate came crashing down, causing the different essences that they contain to intermingle, with deadly consequences for the universe. This may have been the goal of certain Nihilist occultists and Gnostics throughout history who hated God and what he made. Remember the stories claiming that when Lilith and Samael, or Leviathan and Behemoth, reunite sexually into a single being, existence will be destroyed. Others may genuinely think that this is the sacrifice necessary to heal the wound of separation from the divine caused by Adam and Eve ’s fall from Eden.

This could explain the symbolism of the Black Mass and the Witches ’ Sabbath. Everything considered holy in traditional religious rituals is reversed. It ’s about “going backwards, ” back to the beginning before creation, to reverse the error that took place in Eden and return to the perfection of chaos in the pre- existent Pleroma. As Nigel Jackson writes in Masks of Misrule , Sabbath attendees would:

…through the averse formulae of infinite return, deliberately go backwards to that which lies behind all phenomena and consciousness, the ineffable source of all creation… .

It may be also that some folks have sympathy for the Devil, and would like to see his punishment ended. A collapse of the pillars (whatever that means) might lead either (a) to a merciful release for him via the “Second Death, ” or (b) a release from his prison into another realm, as the barriers between the planes of existence might dissolve, bringing everything that is back together into one. In The First Book of Enoch , Azazel actually sends a letter to Enoch begging him to ask God for forgiveness for the Watchers and their giant offspring. This could be the meaning behind Jesus ’ parable of the Prodigal Son. It is the idea of God ’s firstborn, the rebellious one (Satan), returning to his father ’s bosom, even as his younger son, the faithful one (Adam), protests. The central figure in this story has wasted his inheritance, representative of Satan ’s original estate and dispensation, given to him by God. But the moral of that story is that we should rejoice in the ultimate reconciliation between them as the healing of a grave cosmic wound, rather than grumbling about the unfairness of the Lord forgiving and even rewarding the infidelity of the one whom he initially trusted most. In King Jesus , Robert Graves describes a (fictional) image engraved on a clay tablet in the Cave of Treasures in Israel that depicts what that would look like:

> …[H]ere the King has taken Adam into his household; he and his brother Azazel are for a while united in loving comradeship.

Perhaps, then, some people believe that then a temple of total , universal peace, not just among the living but among everything whatsoever, could be built wherein everything could be reconciled to everything else: angels and demons, humans and gods, along with everything above, below, or in between. We have already discussed how this is what the Temple of Solomon is envisioned by Jews as having been, allegedly built on the cornerstone of Jacob ’s “gateway to Heaven, ” and also over the “Well of Souls. ” There are similar traditions about other places. Mircea Eliade wrote in Cosmos and History: The Myth of the Eternal Return :

Every Oriental city was situated at the center of the world. Babylon was a Bab-ilani , a “gate of the gods, ” for it was there that the gods descended to earth… . Such a capital is, in effect, at the center of the universe, close to the miraculous tree, … at the meeting place of the three cosmic zones: heaven, earth, and hell. The Javanese temple of Borobudor is itself an image of the cosmos, and is built like an artificial mountain (as were the ziggurats). Ascending it, the pilgrim approaches the center of the world, and, on the highest terrace, breaks from one place to another, transcending profane, heterogeneous space and entering a “pure region. ” Cities and sacred places are assimilated to the summits of cosmic mountains. This is why Jerusalem and Zion were not submerged by the Deluge. According to Islamic tradition, the highest point on earth is the Kaaba, because “the polestar proves that … it lies over against the center of heaven. ” (Kisai, fol. 15; cited by Wensinck, p.15) [By this he means A.J. Wensinck, The Muslim Creed: Its Genesis and Historical Development , 1932. We do not know who “Kisai ” is.]

… Dur-an-ki, “Bond of Heaven and Earth, ” was the name given to the sanctuaries of Nippur and Larsa, and doubtless to that of Sippara. Babylon had many names, among them “House of the Base of Heaven and Earth, ” “Bond of Heaven and Earth. ” But it is always Babylon that is the scene of the connection between the earth and the lower regions, for the city had been built upon the bab apsi , the “Gate of the Absu ” — apsu designating the waters of chaos before the Creation. We find the same tradition among the Hebrews. The rock of Jerusalem reached deep into the subterranean waters (tehom). The Mishnah says that the Temple is situated exactly above the tehom (Hebrew equivalent of apsu). And just as in Babylon there was the “gate of the apsu, ” the rock of the Temple in Jerusalem contained the “mouth of the tehom . ”

So is this the sort of temple that Baphomet is the archpriest and caretaker of? Consider that, if rendered as an anagram, “Baphomet ” could be thought to contain the words “tehom ” and “bap, ” the latter of which could indicate bab , a Semitic root meaning “gate, ” or the root of the Greek baptismos (“to baptize ”). So then he is at once the abbot of the temple that acts as the gate to Heaven, and to the Abyss, as well as the priest who baptizes initiates in the waters of the Abyss. These waters of chaos are considered the same as the hidden “wisdom, ” and the “Knowledge of Good and Evil. ” The tehom has been compared to the Gnostic Pleroma, where everything originated, also called “Bythos, ” meaning “the deep, ” the exact same thing in Greek that tehom means in Hebrew.

The Apocalypse of Abraham is a pseudepigraphic work assumed to have been composed between 70 –150 AD. It is not accepted as scripture by any group, but the text is suspected of having been adulterated at some point by someone from the Bogomil Gnostic sect. The first English translation appeared in the Mormon magazine Improvement Era in 1898. In it, Abraham travels to the celestial temple in Heaven, and is taught priestcraft there by the angel Yahoel, who acts as that temple ’s abbot. In the process he learns that Azazel was once the high priest there, but got demoted. Therefore, Azazel ’s priestly garments are given over to Abraham, and Abraham ’s soiled garments are given to Azazel to wear instead. As part of this process, all of the sins of Abraham are transferred over to Azazel, just as will later be done at the Temple of Solomon in the scapegoat ritual. Yahoel says to Azazel:

Reproach is on you, Azazel! Since Abraham ’s portion is in heaven, and yours is on earth, since you have chosen it and desired it to be the dwelling place of your impurity. Therefore the Eternal Lord, the Mighty One, has made you a dweller on earth… . For behold, the garment which in heaven was formerly yours has been set aside for him, and the corruption which was on him has gone over to you.

The story ends with the destruction by fire of a temple on Earth: the one filled with idols, curated by Abraham ’s father Terah and his brother Nahor, who both die in the blaze.

In the chapter on the subject that appears in his book Dark Mirrors , Andrei Orlov compares the reflective relationship here between the earthly and heavenly priests and their garments to something stated in The Zohar (I, 217a, as quoted by Orlov) where it says:

[T]hese garments are after the supernal pattern, as we have learnt: “There is a High Priest above and a high priest below, raiment of honor above and raiment of honor below. ”

The term for the priestly garment here is the Hebrew kavod , a word which means “glory ” but also implies “gravity ” or “heaviness. ” This is similar to the “garment of light ” that rabbinic traditions say Adam and Eve were clothed with before the Fall. Recall also the Ophite parody account of Eden, as we saw earlier. In the commentary on Genesis found in Targum Pseudo-Jonathan , it talks about the original garments being made from “fingernails, ” but they were then replaced by garments made from the skin of the Serpent:

And the Lord God made garments of glory for Adam and for his wife from the skin which the serpent had cast off (to be worn) on the skin of their (garments of) fingernails of which they had been stripped, and he clothed them.

Similarly, in Pirke de Rabbi Eliezer 20, we read:

From skins which the serpent sloughed off, the Holy One, blessed be He, rook and made coats of glory for Adam and his wife, as it is said, “And the Lord God made for Adam and his wife coats of skin, and clothed them. ”

Earlier in the same chapter of that book, the garment is described as both “nail skin ” and a “cloud of glory. ” Another rabbinic commentary text, Genesis Rabbah 20:12, says that Adam and Eve had “garments of light … like a torch … broad at the bottom and narrow at the top. ” They were priestly vestments, for Adam was the first priest, and Eden was the location of the first temple overseen by man, as argued by Robert Hayward in The Jewish Temple: A Non-Biblical Sourcebook . He points to The Book of Jubilees 3:26-27, where Adam is clothed by God before he first enters the Garden, and immediately offers sacrifice to his heavenly father. In the book De Somniis , Philo of Alexandria ’s commentary on the dreams Jacob had on the famous pillow-stone, the author describes his understanding that, upon entering the Holy of Holies, the high priest becomes “a being whose nature is midway between [man and] God. ” He speaks of an “oracle ” of unknown origin “given about the high priest ” that says “when he enters into the Holy of Holies, he will not be a man until he comes out. ” Thus, Philo says, “he retains this midway place until he comes out again into the realm of body and flesh. ”

As for Satan, The Life of Adam and Eve (12:1-16:2) tells us that Satan, before the creation of Adam, lived on “the throne of the cherubs who … spread out a shelter [and] used to enclose me. ” So we get the idea that the wings of these cherubs somehow formed his garment. This is in keeping with the notion that they were made from light and flame, for God ’s throne was surrounded and permeated by these things. In The First Book of Enoch , when Azazel (or “Asael ” in that text) is punished for his transgressions, God orders that the criminal be thrown into a pit in the desert and “covered in darkness. ” As Orlov notes:

Asael ’s covering with darkness appears to be a sort of counterpart to the garment of light which Enoch receives in heaven. This ominous attire deprives its wearer of receiving the divine light—the source of life for all God ’s creatures.

So we see here that Azazel has fallen into darkness beneath the earthly plane, but he wears the darkness like a jacket —a straightjacket, because it cannot be removed. Thus it is like he is “inside ” matter, possessing it like an indwelling spirit. This is something he is repeatedly shown to be capable of. The Primary Adam Books describe Satan entering the fleshy body of the Serpent, wearing him, and playing him like a “lyre. ” In the Armenian version, it states:

Then he went and summoned the serpent and said to him, “Arise, come to me so that I may enter into you and speak through your mouth as much as I will need to say. ” At that time the serpent became a lyre for him.

In the Greek version of this text, the specific words are “be my vessel and I will speak through your mouth. ” In the Pirke de Rabbi Eliezar , Chapter 13, Samael is said to have “mounted ” and ridden the Serpent like “a camel. ”

If Satan can be demoted from Heaven by putting on the “darkness ” of matter as a garment, and can even be trapped there, is dissolving this flesh jacket necessary to enter Heaven? It seems that this may be implied by some of the texts that we have examined here. In The Apocalypse of Abraham , entering into Heaven is described like passing through a fire, and Azazel even warns Abraham not to go there, saying that the fire will destroy him.

Perhaps, like Moses entering the flames of Hell, Abraham was cauterized with a baptism of divine fire, so that the flames would not hurt him. Or perhaps the fire there in Heaven simply is this divine fire, which can be used to protect oneself against all other fire. The ancient Greeks conceived of the highest heaven as the “Empyrean, ” a realm of fire. This was adapted by Dante Alighieri into the cosmology of The Divine Comedy , where it became the location of God ’s throne, inhabited by being composed of light. (The Midrash also says that some of the rivers beneath God ’s throne flow not with water, but fire.) Maybe, then, The Apocalypse of Abraham is implying that Abraham obtained from the angels a garment of fiery light that protected his flesh. Remember that Moses returned from his trip to Hell with shining skin.

As for Adam, the garments he was originally given were priestly vestments. Andre Orlov believes it is implied in The Third Book of Enoch that when Enoch ascends to Heaven and is translated into the angel Metatron, “his very flesh and bones are suddenly annihilated by the divine fire, the substance that refashions the visionary ’s moral body into and angelic … corporeality. ” Perhaps this is because, in Chapter 6 of that text, it says that Enoch was carried there by the angel Anaphiel “in great glory upon a fiery chariot with fiery horses. ” There his mortal odor was immediately perceived by “the ministers of consuming fire, ” who complained to God uncharitably about him:

What smell of one born of woman and what taste of a white drop [is this] that ascends on high…?

These fiery angels basically just told Enoch that he tastes like his father ’s semen and smells like his mother ’s vagina. How ’s that for a greeting on your first day of divinity school?

In The Second Book of Enoch , prior to coming to God ’s throne, Enoch ’s clothes are taken from him and he is anointed with oil. This implies the investiture ceremony of a priest, as argued not only by Orlov, but also Martha Himmelfarb and Crispin Fetcher-Louis, both of whom Orlov quotes. The oil is described as “greater than the greatest light … like the rays of the glittering sun, ” seemingly similar to the glorious kavod of light-emitting nail-skin given to humanity before the Fall, and a hint of what may be the reason behind the anointing of priests with oil in the first place. The dead are also similarly anointed, as if this shiny coat is necessary for the translation of the soul beyond the body into another realm.

In The Apocalypse of Abraham 23:4-11, the title character is given a vision of Adam and Eve being tempted by Azazel, here identified as the Serpent, who has taken on a peculiar form that is all at once animal, human, and angelic. Orlov interprets this as just a “garment ” that he is able to put on. It is here that the scene takes place, mentioned in an earlier chapter, in which Azazel is seen placed between Adam and Eve as they are “entwined ” sexually. It says:

And I saw there a man very great in height and terrible in breadth, incomparable in aspect, entwined with a woman who was also equal to the man in aspect and size. And they were standing under a tree of Eden, and the fruit of the tree was like the appearance of a bunch of grapes of vine. And behind the tree was standing, as it were, a serpent in form, but having hands and feet like a man, and wings on its shoulders: six on the right side and six on the left. And he was holding in his hands the grapes of the tree and feeding the two whom I saw entwined with each other. And I said, “Who are these two entwined with each other, or who is this between them, or what is the fruit which they are eating, Mighty Eternal One? ” And he said, “This is the reason of men, this is Adam, and this is their desire on earth, this is Eve. And he who is between them is the Impiety of their pursuits for destruction, Azazel himself. ”

Orlov makes the amazing observation that Azazel ’s appearance here is similar to that of the golden cherubim on top of the Ark of the Covenant (which are always said to have been made to mimic the cherubim that sit near God ’s throne in the celestial realm). He does not resemble just one of the cherubs, but both of them put together, as each cherub is said to have six wings, and here Azazel is described as having twelve. Abraham ’s Apocalypse actually specified that the cherubim on God ’s throne had wings coming from their shoulders, their sides, and their loins, bringing to mind Gnostic depictions of the god Bes which ended up on the coins connected by Hammer-Purgstall with the Templars. This figure has wings attached to roughly the same areas, including two wings that protrude from his bottom as tail feathers.

Orlov also notes, in an earlier chapter in his book, that just as Adam and Eve are entwined sexually around Azazel in the above description, the cherubs on the Ark of the Covenant were actually shown to be joined in sexual union as well. As for evidence, he presents a passage from the “Yoma treatise ” of The Babylonian Talmud , where it says:

Whenever Israel came up to the Festival, the curtain would be removed for them and the Cherubim were shown to them, whose bodies were intertwisted with one another, and they would be thus addressed: Look! You are beloved before God as the love between man and woman.

Later on in that same text, we read that that cherub images were so explicit, they caused scandal among Israel ’s enemies:

When the heathens entered the Temple and saw the Cherubim whose bodies were intertwisted with one another, they carried them out and said: These Israelites, whose blessing is a blessing, and whose curse is a curse, occupy themselves with such things! And immediately they despised them, as it is said: All that honored her, despised her, because they have seen her nakedness.

Regarding the vision of Azazel in the Garden that Abraham is given in the Apocalypse , Orlov states:

Scholars have previously suggested that Azazel may attempt here to mimic the divine presence often represented in sacerdotal settings as the intertwined cherubic couple in the Holy of Holies by offering his own, now corrupted and demonic version of the sacred union.

It seems to us that this is true, but that Azazel (whom The Zohar refers to as the Tanin ’iver or “intermediary ”) only manifests as this dual creature through the bodies of Adam and Eve, as though they provide the “garments ” that the male and female aspects of himself clothe themselves in, via demonic possession. But then, there is also the idea that Adam and Eve got their original heavenly garments from the Serpent, as it says in The Zohar . Orlov mentions this again, noting that:

Pseudepigraphic and rabbinic accounts often provide various interpretations of the serpent ’s gender. Some of these sources seem to understand the serpent as an androgynous creature, whose skin God later used to create the “garments ” of both Adam and Eve.

Then there is the aforementioned quote from The Life of Adam and Eve that before his Fall, Satan lived on God ’s throne, where the wings of the cherubim provided his garment. This really almost sounds like Satan were God himself! Remember that The Zohar refers to the “Beast ” formed by the combination of Lilith and Samael as “the Other God. ”

The idea of being inside the skin of the Serpent is added to with another bizarre quote from The Zohar which seems to indicate that human souls originate inside the womb of a “certain female animal, ” who appears to be Lilith. She is described as always thirsty, presumably because she has been consigned to a desert wasteland. We humans come to this realm, it says, because the Serpent (seemingly, the same as the one from Eden) bites a hole in her womb, opening up a portal that allows our souls to incarnate into human bodies. As the text (Vayaqhel [Exodus] 219b, from Volume 4 of the Soncino Edition) states:

There is … a certain female animal that has under her daily charge a thousand keys, and that pants continually after the water brooks to drink and quench her thirst, of which it is thus written, “As the hart panteth after the water brooks. ” It is to be observed that this verse commences with a masculine subject, “hart ” (‘ayyal), and continues with a feminine predicate, tha ‘erog (she panteth). the recondite explanation of this is that it is an allusion to the male-female as one undivided and inseparable; and so it is the female part of the same that “panteth for the water brooks ” and then becomes impregnated from the male element, and is in labour, coming under the scrutiny of Rigour. But at the moment when she is about to be delivered of offspring the Holy One, blessed be He, prepares for her a huge celestial serpent through whose bite she is safely delivered. And this is the hidden meaning of, “I will greatly multiply thy pain and thy travail, ” for she is in daily convulsions and pain because of the deeds of mankind: “in pain thou shalt bring forth children, ” a hidden allusion to the Serpent who casts a gloom over the faces of mankind; “and thy desire shall be to thy husband ” ... Why all this? It was on account of the Moon ’s dissatisfaction with her state, in punishment for which, as tradition teaches us, her light was diminished, also her power was reduced so that she is beholden to what they grant her from outside. It may be asked, Why is the Serpent necessary in this connection? It is because it is he who opens the passage for the descent of souls into the world. For if he did not open the way, no soul would come down to animate a man ’s body in the world. So Scripture says, “sin coucheth at the door ” (Genesis 3:7) alluding to the celestial door through which pass the souls at birth to emerge into this world. He, the Serpent, waits at that door. It is true, when the souls about to emerge are such as are to enter sanctified bodies, he is not present, having no dominion over such souls. But otherwise, the Serpent bites, and that spot is defiled and the soul passing through is unpurified. Herein is concealed a sublime mystical teaching. “In pain thou shalt bring forth children ” is a mystical allusion to that Serpent, as it is with him that She brings forth souls, since he is responsible for the body and she for the soul, and the two are combined.

It would seem that the creature giving birth here is a hermaphrodite. The hole bitten by the Serpent may also be what constitutes the cleaving apart of the male and female halves, since this is given as an explanation for why the woman (now thought of as Eve) yearns for her husband.

Maybe part of the mystery being hinted at here is that “Lilith ” was the first wife of “Adam ” because “Adam ” was originally God, and she was his female half. He was pregnant with all the possibilities of what could be, the “complete man ” that Adam Kadmon, the “first Adam ” of the cabalists, is described as. Part of what was inside him was the awareness of the possibility that some of his constituent parts could be separated from others. This awareness was in itself part of what caused that split to actually happen (the knowledge of Good and Evil). This brought about the rupture that caused the possibilities trapped in utero to be born as actualities, so that sex and death were simultaneously brought into existence. But the pain of separation between the male and female halves, now called “Adam ” and “Eve, ” and considered diminutive creations of their now deified (in the case of the male half, God), and infernalized (in the case of the female half, Lilith) past selves. Islamic tradition has it that after the Fall, Adam and Eve separated out of shame for a number of years, and when they reunited again, it happened in Mecca, near where the Kaaba would be built (a fact mentioned in the previously-quoted Shriner ritual).

This strange description of what seems to be the demon Lilith giving birth to humans, along with so many other hints that we have gone over in this book, bring to mind what is potentially one of the most blasphemous questions you could ask. Are all of the original hermaphroditic pairs —God and the Matronit, Adam and Eve, Lilith and Samael—all in some way the same thing? Is this what the rabbinic texts are hinting at: that the real reunion which our universe is yearning for is between God and the Devil? It would seem a question too audacious to ask, but then, this passage from The Zohar (I.35b, as quoted by Orlov) makes us feel we are not off the mark. We have quoted this in part before, but let us now look at the whole context:

Now observe a deep and holy mystery of faith, the symbolism of the male principle and the female principle of the universe. In the former are comprised all holinesses and objects of faith, and all life, all freedom, all goodness, all illuminations emerge from thence; all blessings, all benevolent dews, all graces and kindnesses—all these are generated from that side, which is called the South. Contrariwise, from the side of the North there issue a variety of grades, extending downwards, to the world below. This is the region of the dross of gold, which comes from the side of impurity and loathsomeness and which forms a link between the upper and nether regions; and there is the line where the male and female principles join, forming together the rider on the serpent, and symbolized by Azazel.

So it seems to us that Azazel somehow acts as the intermediary not just between the male and female halves of the Serpent (Lilith and Samael), but also between the principle of good (here described as male) and the principle of evil (here described as female). Is the Devil God ’s girlfriend here, or even his wife? It certainly seems that way. But if that ’s the case, it may be safe to assume that they are presently divorced, or perhaps legally separated. As in any split-up from a long-term relationship, there has been a legal agreement regarding the shared property (creation) and the kids (humanity). They seem to have joint custody. Drawing upon the work of writers Michael Stone and John Collins, Andrei Orlov describes the arrangement, with Azazel, the intermediary, being given power of attorney to oversee the Serpent ’s possessions on its behalf:

Michael Stone draws attention to the traditions found in chapters 20, 22, and 29 [of The Apocalypse of Abraham], where the reference to Azazel ’s rule, which he exercises jointly with God over the world, coincides “with the idea that God granted him authority over the wicked. ”; Stone suggests that “these ideas are clearly dualistic in nature. ” John Collins explores another cluster of peculiar depictions repeatedly found in the second part of the Apocalypse , in which humankind is divided into two parts, half on the right and half on the left, representing respectively the chosen people and the Gentiles. These portions of humanity are labeled in the text as the lot of God and the lot of Azazel.

But the idea of bringing this primordial couple back together again, no matter how dangerous that may be, seems to have been the ultimate goal of many, including the rabbis who wrote The Zohar , and the secret societies that have perpetuated through the centuries the mysteries discussed in this book. The Holy Grail has been described as both a cup and a stone. But really they are both of the same substance, and the ultimate treasure would be to obtain and reunite both the cup and the stone.

In his 1973 book The Spear of Destiny , Trevor Ravenscroft claimed that “The Sign of the Holy Grail … is a Dove winging across from the Sun into the invisible disc held within the arms of the Crescent Moon. ” This is essentially the same as one of the primary symbols of Christianity: the image of the heavenly Host descending into the Eucharist cup. It is shown either as a white disc (the communion wafer), usually marked with a cross, sometimes carried down in the beak of a dove, or it is shown as a sun disc with shining rays. Aleister Crowley ’s OTO uses their own version of this as their official “lamen, ” but instead the bird descends into a cup containing a rose, a Templar cross, and flames, presumably on its way to immolate itself like a phoenix in its own “baptism of fire. ”

If the Host is the Sun, then the cup, logically, is the crescent moon, a symbol of Islam that was also incorporated by the Templars into some of their official seals. On these the Moon was often shown along with either a lion, or the image of the Dome of the Rock. One of the most interesting depictions of the holy Host and cup can be found in the window of the Dominus Flevit (“The Lord Wept ”) church in Jerusalem, directly overlooking the Dome.

Interestingly, an event has occurred recently there at the Dome that brings to mind the image of the Host descending into the communion cup. On the night of January 28, 2011, a strange and sizable ball of light was seen hovering over the Dome, descending to touch the top, and then raising up again. It did this several times before it suddenly zipped off heavenward and flew away. The event was recorded by many witnesses. While we are not making any claims about what this meant, it does fall into line with the Holy Grail imagery associated with the Dome and the buildings nearby.

In alchemy, the combination of the Sun and the Moon is considered a symbol of the great chemical conjunction of the elements of the universe, which is allegedly key to the magical transformation of substances that is the goal of this art. It is these heavenly bodies, represented sometimes as a king and a queen, who are shown mating in a bathtub in so many alchemical images from medieval times. This is the “Bath of the Stars ” discussed in a previous chapter, in which they are shown bathing in the blood of their own children. It may also be the “Baptism of Wisdom as practiced by the Templars, in which, it seems quite possibly, they sacrificed babies produced during orgies, and utilized their bodies for black magic purposes.

The wedding of the solar and the lunar embodies the same concept as the merging of light and darkness (symbolized by the chequer pattern), as it is the blending of day and night. The courtship between Solomon and the Queen of Sheba (Sheba an incarnation, supposedly, of Lilith, and both of them associated with “wisdom ”) could be thought of as a symbol of the same idea. The fact that Solomon ’s birth name was actually “Jedidiah ” (“beloved of the Lord ”) indicates that “Solomon ” (a permutation of shalom or salem) was actually a symbolic title he took as king. It has the same root as the name of his capital city, “Jerusalem, ” and the alleged location of his temple/stairway to Heaven (the temple of the white rock). Again, the word also means “peace, ” like that which the reconciliation of opposing forces would bring. Meanwhile, the Queen of Sheba can be connected directly with the Kaaba in lore, for the guardians of the Kaaba have always been referred to as “Beni Shaybah, ” (“the Sons of the Old Woman ”), which is traditionally taken to be a reference to her. Prince Michael of Albany, as we noted, believes that it also points to the “widow ” Isis (impregnated with her son Horus by the undead body of her deceased and resurrected husband Osiris), as the epithet “Sons of the Widow, ” used by Freemasons to identify themselves, is meant to imply that they are symbolically her children.

As for what Baphomet (the “abbot of the temple of peace ”) was, or is, to the thousands if not millions of people who belong to secret societies and fringe religious groups influenced by this concept, well, there is no one answer. Rather, there are several answers that are all simultaneously true. It is really neither a single object nor a merely abstract concept. Instead it is a continuum running throughout time and space, connecting all of the gods, people, objects, myths and symbols that manifest the forbidden wisdom given to Eve in the Garden of Eden. Individual personages, both human and divine, have throughout history come along to act as living avatars of this hidden Gnosis. Baphomet is not a static, definable idea, but a mutable mercurial sentience that expresses itself in a multitude of ways.

We could certainly say that Baphomet is a nonhuman intelligence, variously described as a demon or a deity, seemingly made from the energies of the male and female halves of an originally hermaphroditic entity of primordial chaos. Baphomet is perhaps specifically the intelligence formed when Azazel, the Tanin ’iver, acts as an intermediary between the two serpents and allows them to mate. This seems to be connected to the idea of the Serpent/s using the bodies of humans as hosts through when they unite with each other sexually.

The Templars appear to have used an idol as a touchpoint to contact this entity. The idol is usually described as a head, and the name Baphomet applies to the idol itself as well (along with the various copies that were made of it to be used in Templar preceptories far-flung throughout Europe and the Middle East). They believed that their demon used these heads to talk to them. If they were anything like the other oracular heads in history, its mouth may have moved, like the robot head supposedly owned by Catholic saint and alchemist Albertus Magnus. It is likely that some Templars also thought that it spoke to them telepathically.

From the Templars ’ confessions, they seem to have believed that the head had given their leaders information that they found helpful in building their global empire through moneylending, trade, and military conquest. To them it was both a priest and a prophet, like John, whose head or skull may have been the actual physical idol. As we have explained, the heads of prophets were revered as having special magical qualities. We mentioned that there were Talmudic rumors that John had a demonic servant, and that the control of this demon was passed on to Jesus. It seems possible for there to have been a belief that Jesus, who was related to King Herod ’s bloodline, may have somehow gotten hold of John ’s head, and used it to control either John ’s own spirit, or a spirit that John had formerly controlled while he was alive. This head, then, may have later come into the hands of the founding Templars (or, at least, something that they believed was this). Or the head and attached spirit could have come to be possessed by John ’s student and successor Simon Magus first. Perhaps too, rather, as Alexander Rivera has suggested, Simon may have been beheaded just like John, and it could have been his head that ended up with the Templars.

If this was the case, it seems likely then that the spirit they acquired was connected to Lilith-Samael, the Serpent of the primordial deep, which makes sense if they had come into contact with it via their time spent on the alleged Temple Mount, or through something they found there. It also seems likely, given the combination of images that came to be joined to the concept of Baphomet, that the Templars used magic to blend in with this spirit the attributes of wild satyr gods like Dionysus, Hermes, and Pan (which were, in a roundabout way, already connected to Lilith-Samael via the imagery of the goat-demon Azazel, their intermediary). It seems like they also blended in the essence of the wisdom of Hermes Trismegistus, and that of the Gnostic Sophia.

What do we mean by saying that they “used magic ” to “blend ” these things? Let us give a few examples. In imperial Rome, when a new land was conquered, those people ’s gods would be rededicated and incorporated into the Roman pantheon, often joined up with other existing gods who were either considered to have the same attributes, or to be complimentary. The resulting hybrid entities would sometimes thereafter be represented with the physical features of both gods stuck onto the same body. The names would be hybridized too. There was a magical ceremony that was part of this process. Robert Graves wrote about it in The White Goddess :

In ancient times, once a god ’s secret name had been discovered, the enemies of his people could do destructive magic against them with it. The Romans made a regular practice of discovering the secret names of enemy gods and summoning them to Rome with seductive promises, a process technically know as elicio … . Naturally, the Romans, like the Jews, hid the secret name of their own guardian deity with extraordinary care.

In the modern fantasy anime series “Fullmetal Alchemist, ” real live “chimeras ” are created through alchemy by “marrying ” creatures of dissimilar nature, including humans and animals. The resulting monstrosities are then kept as servants, used to do things like guarding an alchemist ’s laboratory. While this is obviously just fiction, the writers of this show displayed a great deal of understanding of the subject not found in many nonfiction books on the subject. Ultimately, the Philosopher ’s Stone in this program is revealed to be made from human souls, and the sacrifice of these is what makes alchemical transformations possible —an idea that almost no modern writer has touched upon outside of horror fiction. But the true story of Gilles de Rais —a fifteenth century French nobleman who raped and murdered hundreds of boys in an attempt to persuade the Devil to transform lead into gold alchemically with their blood — proves that these things have been understood for some time.

The creation of chimera servants in the above-mentioned TV show brings to mind what chaos magick author Phil Hine says about “servitors ” that can be made by magicians to do their bidding. These are spirits that are pulled out of chaos (tehom , “the deep ”) and formed in whatever shape the magician chooses, to do whatever he needs. This involves the drawing of an image to represent the character that the servitor will take on, including what he looks like, what attributes he will have, and what rules he will operate by. Hine talks about creating the servitor as a glyph on a piece of paper, perhaps using the “sigil magick ” process discussed earlier, and then “animating ” it with meditation, sacrifices of blood, incense, and things of that nature, to impart to it energy and the essence of spirit.

However much one may believe in ceremonial magic, the instructions given by Hine indicate that the spirit created will never act like more than an imaginary friend, and its influence will be subtle if detectable at all (on the level of doing a personal affirmation in the mirror). However, if one actually has a severed human head for the spirit to inhabit, or one takes the bodies of creatures and sews them together a la Frankenstein, then uses magic to animate the resulting monstrosity, the event takes on quite more serious tone. Remember too that according to Polyhistor ’s quote of Berossus supposedly quoting Oannes, before the present stage of creation, there existed a primordial Abyss of chaos populated by beings with multiple heads, and “in which were combined the limbs of every species of animals. ” The substance of chaos seems to lend itself to such things, because it contains the potentiality of everything possible, in perfect mutability.

What we are proposing is that the Baphomet was a chimeric hybrid demonic servitor formed by the Templars, not from scratch, but through the transmutation and rededication of something they found, which was connected by them to a collection of related spiritual energies. This created an “egregore ”: a “thought form ” made from the combined imaginations and mental energies of a group of people that came to life and took on a will of its own. This egregore was then added to over the centuries by individuals and groups claiming to be perpetuating the mythos of the Templars: Freemasons, Eliphas Levi, Aleister Crowley, and Anton LaVey (creator of the Church of Satan). Along with them, a huge role was played by one of the Templars ’ greatest critics, Joseph von Hammer-Purgstall, whose work is still being assessed by us. (Please see our translation of Mysterium Baphometis Revelatum , with commentary by Tracy R. Twyman, which should be available shortly after the publication of the book you are now reading.)

Although we feel that, in a way, Baphomet is an artificial entity created by the Templars, we also think that they revered this figure as a teacher. As his connection to Hermes would indicate, Baphomet is an example of the archetype of the teacher of forbidden wisdom (as the goat god or Black Man of the Witches ’ Sabbath would later be seen by his acolytes also). This includes both the “divine secrets ” of another reality beyond our own, the “Pleroma ” (knowledge of which is Gnosis), as well as seemingly mundane knowledge of science and technology which we take for granted now, but which scriptures and myths teach us were once forbidden for men to know, and available to us now only because certain brave angels or gods defied divine law to bring them to us. The Serpent taught forbidden wisdom to Eve in the Garden. The Watchers, Azazel and Samyaza, in turn taught it to their half-human children before the Flood. After that, a number of teachers are remembered as having brought these things to men again, in the attempt to help rebuild our shattered civilization. Thus we have stories of figures like Enoch, Oannes, Enki, Hermes, Asclepius, Agathodaemon, and several others, teaching knowledge to men and initiating wisdom traditions that were passed on for generations.

Speaking of “generation, ” that is in fact part of the hidden wisdom. In the Garden of Eden it was carnal knowledge that was bestowed upon Eve. The secret of Genesis was the secret of generation. The hints embedded in this text, when decoded, reveal the implication that our universe is a time-space box that didn ’t exist until Eve ate the “fruit. ” We may wonder how it is that there was “fruit ” for her to eat (specifically “fruit of a tree bearing seed ”) when there was no sexual generation in the first place. The “fruit, ” most likely, was the fetal potentiality of new life, the fruit of the tree of carnal knowledge.

As we know, there were two trees in the Garden—the Tree of Knowledge of Good and Evil and the Tree of Life. If the “knowledge ” is carnal knowledge, and its “fruit ” is a fetus or a baby, wouldn ’t the fruit of the Tree of Life also be the same thing? We mentioned briefly the idea that the Philosopher ’s Stone is made from the flesh and blood of the young, babies and fetuses in particular, and that the consumption of such preserves youth (a notion explored in greater depth in Tracy R. Twyman ’s books Clock Shavings and Money Grows on the Tree of Knowledge). As Genesis implies, eating from the Tree of Knowledge brought birth and death into the world. Therefore, it says, the gods (or Jehovah and whoever he was talking to in this text) sealed off the Tree of Life, so that humans would not eat of it and become immortal. But the Tree of Life had only been briefly mentioned in the text until that point. Did the Tree of Knowledge become the Tree of Life after Eve ate from it? Did the Tree of Knowledge contain only the potentiality of life, which became real after carnal knowledge was obtained?

The idea of eating babies brings to mind the myth of Chronos, the Greek god of time eating his own children at birth, the imagery of which is directly invoked in alchemical treatises, with Chronos (the Roman Saturn) shown doing exactly this. In alchemy Chronos is equated with the nigrido or prima materia , the primordial chaos that is transformed through the alchemical process into the desired form, usually represented with either a skull or a black sun. In Money Grows on the Tree of Knowledge , Tracy R. Twyman talks about the fact that, in Greek myths, Chronos was treated the same was by his own father:

Ouranous (Uranus) had likewise resented his children, the Titans, and imprisoned them underneath the Earth in order to keep them from threatening his rule. Since his consort ’s name was Gaia, or Earth, this really means he was imprisoning them inside of her. Indeed some versions of the story refer to Ouranous shoving his children back into their mother ’s womb as a way of jailing them.

Chronos was said to have ruled over an epoch of Earth ’s history called the “Golden Age, ” in which there were no seasons, and nobody had to work for a living. It seems as if there may have been no death or birth in that place either, just like in pre-Fall Eden. In Part 1 of the article series on her website entitled “Regnum in Potentia: Saturn ’s Kingdom Transformed into the Golden Age, ” Tracy R. Twyman elaborates on this:

Here is the meaning of this myth. Chronos (“Father Time ”) had lived and ruled (or “unruled ”) for untold aeons in a timeless realm before the coming of Zeus. In this realm, there could be no begetting of offspring, or else there would also be death. Thus the birth of children had to be prevented, either by confining them within the womb —as Ouranos did —or by swallowing them at birth —as Chronos did, attempting to negate their existence by confining them to another womb of sorts: his gullet.

This is exactly what the story of the Garden of Eden indicates. Adam and Eve live in happy, timeless ignorance. They are the children of a god who remains, to them, invisible, and they are still shut up inside the womb, or within their father ’s gullet. There, they live as parasites, forming a symbiotic relationship with their host, who provides them with all of the sustenance they need. Then one day, a foreign fruit is introduced to them from outside. They are told by their father, the unseen god, not to eat it. But they do anyway, and it initiates in them an awakening to the reality of what they are involved in. Their eyes are opened. They wake up from the dream and realize that they are slowly being digested. At that moment, they are vomited out into the cold, cruel, outside world, forced to work for their daily bread, fighting for survival. With their birth, or perhaps, their second birth, the passage of time is finally allowed to begin.

In mythology, there is an archetypal scenario in which a person travels from one realm to another, and becomes stuck there upon eating the food of the other realm. This happened to the Greek figure of Persephone when she ate the food of the underworld. Eve ate from the Tree of Knowledge and it changed the universe, or perhaps it created a new universe, and she became trapped in it. Jesus told us to eat his flesh and drink his blood to live forever in the New Jerusalem (the “Kingdom of God ”) after death. In the New Jerusalem everyone drinks of the waters of life from the rivers of Paradise and becomes immortal. So perhaps there are other recipes involving similar ingredients that likewise could affect the universe around you upon consumption.

Satan, according to some interpretations, is God ’s firstborn son, who came before Adam. But Adam was his favorite, and when his firstborn son refused to honor his younger brother, God sacrificed him. Satan embodied the forbidden wisdom that Adam was not allowed to have, and God told him not to eat of that “tree. ” Was this “fruit ” the product of sexual union? The carnal knowledge that Eve was endowed with, according to the cabalistic legends, came from her having carnal knowledge of the Serpent, which bred Cain (and perhaps others, according to some stories). What happens when a human and a spirit of the chaos realm mate? Better yet, what happens when you eat the child that was born of such a union?

Cain was later exiled by his parents to a place called “Nod ” (after killing his brother and, according to some versions of the story, drinking his blood). Nod seems like a word for the Abyss. In other words, Cain was shoved back into the non-existent chaos that had fathered him, like the children of Ouranos were shoved back into their mother ’s womb. Upon the basis of the primordial events attempting to be expressed in these myths, it seems, the cultic practice of child sacrifice and brephophagy (baby-eating) has continued throughout the thousands of years of man ’s history, particular the sacrifice of the firstborn.

We think it likely that the Templars may have engaged in such a ritual, it being a “baptism of wisdom ” or “immersion in the divine mystery ” for the initiates (and, sadly, perhaps a deadly “baptism of fire ” for the victims). The title of this ceremony provides yet another interpretation for the name of Baphomet. Part of what may have been achieved for the participants by such ceremonies was a state of mind, which seems to be akin to merging one ’s mind with the other side, the Pleroma, or the pre-Fall Eden. This experience in itself is also one of the meanings of “Baphomet. ”

In addition to the effects on the mind for the ceremony ’s participants, there may have also been a belief among the Templars that a long-term goal could be achieved over time, through generations, if certain rituals were done in this state of mind, including the breeding of children, both for sacrifice, and for the continuation of a sacred bloodline. The lineage is that of Cain, the Serpent seed. The original Templars, and all of their grand masters, came from that bloodline, as did most of the royal families of Europe who have done so much to shape the world we live in. The members of this family can be thought of as incarnations of the Serpent, just as Lilith was thought by cabalists take human form in order to breed into the patriarchal pedigree of Israel. The goal of this, as we have indicated, might have actually been to put the seed of the Serpent in powerful positions on Earth, so that, through his children, he may finally rule over what he considers to be his rightful inheritance. Baphomet can be thought of as a combination formed by this chain of incarnations via these bloodlines throughout the centuries —the spirit that inhabits all of them, and ties them together. Also, through the bodies of these, the Serpent ’s descendants, the male and female halves of the Beast get to experience the pleasure of mating.

Returning once more to the image of Abraxas, can it not be thought to symbolize this dangerous union, capable of destroying the universe? For his body provides a place of union where two serpents, shown as his legs, combine. If so, perhaps the use of a rooster ’s head on top can be seen as an expression of hope that from the destruction wrought by such a union, the dawn of a brand new day (maybe a new Eden) will be announced.

So what if we look at Levi ’s Baphomet image in the same way? Does his goat persona connect him with Azazel, and indicate that Baphomet is the thing that unites these serpents in their destructive unholy matrimony? Is this part of what is symbolized by the two serpents on the caduceus that rises from his crotch region? Is this because his “body ” is the “temple ” where the conjunction of the two snakes takes place (perhaps at one point literally, via the bodies of the Knights of the Temple, through possession)?

One thing is for certain: Baphomet, to modern Satanists, exemplifies the nuanced view of the Devil that they now have, which is quite different from the views of all of the other religious groups that we have examined in this book (Jews, Christians, Hermeticists, Gnostics, and various pagan cults). To Jews and most Christians, Jehovah is the creator of the universe, and the bestower of all blessings. He decides how fate will be meted out, who will gain and who will lose. If you have wealth and health, it is because God has chosen that for you. The Devil is God ’s adversary, so whenever God blesses or curses something, Satan tries to do the opposite. Yet to the Gnostics, the entity who does these things was not the real “God, ” but an imposter with evil intent. To the Cathars he was actually the Devil, Rex Mundi. Since he was the lord of this Earth, you would think that all material blessings enjoyed in life would be attributed to him.

Actually, that is how modern Satanists view it, but they don ’t see Satan as a negative entity. They (generally) don ’t seem to lament the creation of the world. Rather, they enthusiastically embrace materiality and the flesh. To them (generally) Satan is the god of this world, from whom all wealth or earthly success is granted. While organizations like the Church of Satan aren ’t generally populated with financially prosperous people, other, more secretive fraternities are, and some of those do seem to have satanic intent when their symbols are decoded. Perhaps, just as their enemies on the outside fear, they have discovered that the secret to riches and power is to prostrate themselves before the one who is truly in charge of these things. The closest parallel, historically, to this viewpoint can actually be found in the Yezidi scripture called Al-Jilwah (The Revelation), in the first three chapters, where their lord Melek Taus (whom they also call “Azazil ” and acknowledge is identical with “Sheitan ”) is portrayed as a benevolent Demiurge —at least for those who honor him. As it says in the translation by Isya Joseph, from his 1919 book Devil Worship: The Sacred Books and Traditions of the Yezidis :

I was, am now, and shall have no end. I exercise dominion over all creatures and over the affairs of all who are under the protection of my image. I am ever present to help all who trust in me and call upon me in time of need. There is no place in the universe that knows not my presence. I participate in all the affairs which those who are without call evil because their nature is not such as they approve. Every age has its own manager, who directs affairs according to my decrees. This office is changeable from generation to generation, that the ruler of this world and his chiefs may discharge the duties of their respective offices every one in his own turn. I allow everyone to follow the dictates of his own nature, but he that opposes me will regret it sorely. No god has a right to interfere in my affairs, and I have made it an imperative rule that everyone shall refrain from worshiping all gods. All the books of those who are without are altered by them; and they have declined from them, although they were written by the prophets and the apostles. That there are interpolations is seen in the fact that each sect endeavors to prove that the others are wrong and to destroy their books. To me truth and falsehood are known. When temptation comes, I give my covenant to him that trusts in me. Moreover, I give counsel to the skilled directors, for I have appointed them for periods that are known to me. I remember necessary affairs and execute them in due time. I teach and guide those who follow my instruction. If anyone obey me and conform to my commandments, he shall have joy, delight, and goodness.

I requite the descendants of Adam, and reward them with various rewards that I alone know. Moreover, power and dominion over all that is on earth, both that which is above and that which is beneath, are in my hand. I do not allow friendly association with other people, nor do I deprive them that are my own and that obey me of anything that is good for them. I place my affairs in the hands of those whom I have tried and who are in accord with my desires. I appear in divers manners to those who are faithful and under my command. I give and take away; I enrich and impoverish; I cause both happiness and misery. I do all this in keeping with the characteristics of each epoch. And none has a right to interfere with my management of affairs. Those who oppose me I afflict with disease; but my own shall not die like the sons of Adam that are without. None shall live in this world longer than the time set by me; and if I so desire, I send a person a second or a third time into this world or into some other by the transmigration of souls.

I lead to the straight path without a revealed book; I direct aright my beloved and my chosen ones by unseen means. All my teachings are easily applicable to all times and all conditions. I punish in another world all who do contrary to my will. Now the sons of Adam do not know the state of things that is to come. For this reason they fall into many errors. The beasts of the earth, the birds of heaven, and the fish of the sea are all under the control of my hands. All treasures and hidden things are known to me; and as I desire, I take them from one and bestow them upon another. I reveal my wonders to those who seek them, and, in due time my miracles to those who receive them from me. But those who are without are my adversaries, hence they oppose me. Nor do they know that such a course is against their own interests, for might, wealth, and riches are in my hand, and I bestow them upon every worthy descendant of Adam. Thus the government of the worlds, the transition of generations, and the changes of their directors are determined by me from the beginning.

In A History of Secret Societies , Arkon Daraul (Idries Shah) describes his attendance at a secret meeting of a Yezidi cult active in London in the late 1950s. The order ’s members were wealthy and, it seems, mostly white Britons, who would pray to Melek Taus for success in business. Whenever they would gain “as a result of any activity for whose success they have prayed to the Peacock, ” they were expected to pay 2.5 percent to the cult. Their rituals involved baptism at initiation, and circumambulation around a stone, of which one member was quoted as saying:

Let us remember the force of the good and the bad which are one; and let us now stand before it, and move around our stone.

We also have the rare esoteric eighth-century Shiite text, Mother of Books (Umm al-ktab), which portrays “Azazi ’il” in terms identical to that of the Gnostic Demiurge. The Gospel of John ’s description of Satan is the “prince of the world ” is virtually indistinguishable from the Yezidi and Shi ’ite notions of who Melek Taus/Azazil is. In the Liber Secretum used by Bogomils and Cathars, the Devil is defined, as Yuri Stoyanov put it in The Other God , as:

… a creator and master of the visible world, as “Lord of the sky, the sun, the air and the stars. ”

This appears to have been how the Templars viewed their Baphomet also, and from all available evidence, worshipping him seems to have worked out for them, at least for a time. As Pope Pius IX put it, “Their watchword was, to become wealthy, in order to buy the world, ” and that they did. Later they confessed to their torturers that it was Baphomet who enabled it all.

It should not surprise us, then, that there are many people today who think their fantasies of fame and fortune can be fulfilled by making a pact with the Devil. On this topic, the name “Baphomet ” is frequently bandied about on the internet, as the popular belief is that this is the particular infernal name to invoke if you are looking to make such a Faustian bargain. (We noticed this trend took off after the release of Tracy R. Twyman ’s book Solomon ’s Treasure , which highlights the possible connection between the alleged “power ” of Baphomet and the global financial dominance of the US dollar.) Conspiracy theorists, who believe that popular musicians and movie stars are part of a Satanic “Illuminati ” plot, strain their eyes to find any pattern in a logo, an outfit, or even a set of curtains in the background of an image, that can in any way be construed to somehow look like a horned figure, and then call it “Baphomet. ”

We are certain that for as many people that there are who fear this perceived plot, there are just as many who are actually eager to join it. Both of the authors of the book you are reading now receive hits daily on their websites from people seeking information about how to make a pact with Baphomet for wealth (or, as we have seen it put so many times in our web statistics, “How to join the Baphomet ”). Many of these people, strangely, live in Africa. But there is plenty of interest in the West too. Recently, a statue of Baphomet was erected in Detroit by Satanists, to much public outcry, and the word was trending high on Google for days.

Today, people talk about Baphomet a lot, but they don ’t really know him. After years of research, however, we feel that we do, and we are pleased to have been able to introduce him to you. It is a knowledge you cannot disremember, and now that you have been dipped in its tincture, your mind will forever be stained. We hope you have enjoyed your baptism.

Initium Sapientiae Timor Domini .

THE MASONIC TOWER OF BABEL
CHRISTIANITY'S SYSTEMATIC DESTRUCTION

Jesus

"BE WISE AS SERPENTS

HARMLESS AS DOVES"

BE Wise as Serpents is the history of the systematic destruction of Christianity and the building of a 1-world-religion. As you read this research based on a. confidential interviews with participants within in the conspiracy, b. interviews of unwitting participants within the conspiracy, c. and historical documentation you will discover that there is great evidence for a history we have not been told, and a great struggle before mankind as the one-world-power/religion comes into focus.

PREFACE TO THE PRE-PUBLICATION EDITION

In 1990, I came out with The Watchtower & the Masons. That book connected the Jehovah's Witnesses' Watchtower Society with the Masons. Some of the chapters for Be Wise As Serpents were originally written for The Watchtower & the Masons, but were not used.

It was obvious as I wrote The Watchtower & the Masons that I could not go into depth in the book, and that the book would have to be followed up with an indepth work. For that reason its cover called it a "Preliminary Investigation."

In 1990, I began looking for a publisher of Be Wise As Serpents because such a work deserved to be published properly by a well-known publisher. The months past by on the calender, and the time clock continued ticking away on the New World Order's agenda as I looked for a publisher. Because no person can have a total monopoly on the facts of a subject, I welcomed the help of others. I looked out for anyone who would team up with me, or appreciate my research. They would even be welcome by me to publish my research themselves under their own name. I didn't find any takers. At this point it looks like I'm left to share this message that the Lord has given me by myself without the help of a co-author or publisher.

By the summertime of 1991 a publisher had been found. But the Lord laid it on my heart in December, 1991 that I would have to self-publish.

There is still research to be done. For instance, an ex-member of the Satanic Illuminati hierarchy revealed that the Russell family is one of the top 13 Satanic families that have generation after generation passed down their Satanic power. It would be nice to have the time to finish the genealogy work I began on Charles T. Russell's family to see how they fit in with the other Russells.

So why publish an unfinished book? This information is very timely. 1992 is a major year for the Satanists to kick off a series of crises to bring the world under the Satan's rule. I can not presume upon the future that there will be an opportunity to put out books like this. Marshall law under an emergency decree could come any time during the next few years.

If I could fight one thing with this book it would be fear. If we know what we are up against and are going to experience, I believe it will take away some of the fear of the unknown. The more we seek the Kingdom of God and his righteousness, and the more we love and obey God the less we fear. Christ warned, "Ye shall hear of wars and rumors of wars: see that ye be not troubled." (Mt 24:6.) Christ also said, "Take no thought for your life..." (Mt 6:25), which is rephrased by the Holy Spirit, "Be anxious for nothing." Phil 4:6. The Christian will "commit thy way unto the Lord and trust also in Him." (Ps 37:5)

We are unable to see how God will win a victory in all this. We know that it will be some kind of miraculous display of his power and glory. But we rejoice with the Lord always, and realize that today is the day that the Lord has made, we will take each day at a time, and rejoice in it This book is a call for people to face reality as it is today. I believe that if we are unable to face what the real situation is due to our fears, then the New World Order's many tenticles will continue to wreck havoc with our lives, it will continue to sap our resources for its causes and diversions, and it will continue to deceive us. May God give you hope and a spirit of courage that only God can give as you read this.

THIS BOOK IS DEDICATED TO ALL THE MEN & WOMEN WHO HAVE LOST THEIR LIVES IN OPPOSITION TO THE 1-WORLD-CONSPIRACY

(THIS DEDICATION & LIST WILL MAKE MORE SENSE AFTER YOU READ THE BOOK AND ITS DOCUMENTATION. The deaths of some of these people have been described as "accidents" and "suicides", in some cases the circumstances of these supposed "suicides", make suicide the last possibility. I will not give their murderers the consolation of downplaying their martyrdom. It is time to recognize these heros for truth and freedom. Most of those on this list were killed by the Freemasons because they stood for truth or knew the truth. They were directly martyrs. But the reader may discover that organizations run by the Conspiracy Power have slaughtered millions. These millions were their sacrifices.)

AUTHOR'S INTRODUCTION

My desire is to give you evidence. If you don't have the patience for some introductory pages of explanations and can't wait for the evidence, then turn to where the scouting report begins.

I have entitled the book "Be wise as serpents, and as harmless as doves."

This allusion to the story of the serpent reminds us that the crafty serpent was a threat because Eve was naive. Wisdom is founded upon correct and significant knowledge. The serpent was wise, because he knew the issues at stake. Evil was out of Eve's frame of reference. She didn 't know she was being seduced. She thought she was getting an apple. She and Adam didn't know enough to feel a need to recognize issues. Something as simple as biting an apple meant the difference between adherence to goodness and its counterpart rebellion. The time for being naive ended with Eve. She got her apple.

The second part "harmless as doves" is the response to the first part. While doves are symbols of true enlightment and foresight, they carry no malice toward others.

In the modern version of Eve's story, we find her thinking to herself when she meets the serpent, "My pastor has told me not to study the adversary and the cults. We only need to know what real money looks like and not to study the counterfeit. My pastor has told me what an apple looks like, and that is a real apple. It is a real apple, and real apples are edible. Mmmm." Eve is still getting her apple, and is still naive.

This book exposes a composite serpent which has devised sinister plans concerning everyone. Christians are attracted to its nice looking apple called the New World Order. The book will answer questions like, what does this serpent look like, will it be as good a thing as it looks on the surface, where is it, what is its power?

The book is based on evidence and testimony. In addition to the evidences obtained from primary documents and books, this work is based on dozens of interviews with informed people. This includes Jehovah's Witnesses, ex-JWs, Mormons, ex-Mormons, New Agers, ex-New Agers, Catholics, Jews, Masons, ex-Masons etc., etc.. The strongest evidences are the personal testimonies given to me by those people that have been intimately involved with the conspirators. Unfortunately, because of the viciousness of those seeking our enslavement with their grandiose schemes, my sources remain anonymous. This is understandable; such is the exigencies of a spiritual war against powerful conspiracies.

What I have done in this publication could be called a scouting report about our opponent. We are familiar that basketball and football teams send out scouts to see what their opponent is doing. We are familiar with how alert an athlete is in watching and forecasting his opponents moves. We would consider it very unwise if a team choose to close their eyes and stop their hearing when playing another team.

Are the scouting reports already made? We need better ones. The ones we have try to stop a snaking river with a stone in place for a dam, at best they redirect the opponent. The scouting report must be able to give us a solution, a real remedy that stops the flow because it correctly guages the width of the river. How wide is this torrent? This ravaging diluge is a conspiracy for power that extends into every dimension of life where power exists, be that religion, politics, finances, education, mass media, or science, and its current has been flowing for centuries. It has even skillfully planned and created its own opposition, which periodically makes preplanned non-fatal attacks.

Back to the basketball analogy, do I really think we can beat the world at its own game, especially when it has the home court advantage? No, not if we play their game by their rules. Yes, if we play our game plan and not theirs. You will find out ways to do this in Unit 3.

In the end it doesn't matter who wins the battles, but who is on the ultimate winning side when the war ends. Logic alone will tell you that evil which is self-destructive can not be the final victor. It is obvious that life had an intelligent creator. Do you think that an intelligent creator created life only to let it destroy itself?

How do we keep score in a spiritual war? Is a martyr for truth a victory for truth or a defeat for truth? I personally could not sit idly by and watch myself and my loved ones be enslaved. It made me sick to see the leaders that the Christian people looked up to selling them into slavery. I was tired of the Christian book stores filled with lies while the truth lay silent.

Of course a comprehensive work on the conspiracy of power would be volumnous, so this work concentrates on giving new information on where this crafty snake has hidden itself in religion.

The religious dimension would be shallow without supplementary information on the other aspects, indeed this work has been designed to fill in the gaps and tie together the scouting reports that are available.

The vast knowledge I had on the subject gave me a responsibility to warn others. I tried unsuccessfully to give my research to others, but in the end found that I would have to do the mission myself.

Why did we need another book on the One-World-Religion One-World-Government conspiracy?

First, the nature of the Conspiracy's power is so vast no book covers it entirely. It's power is on three levels--a. the dedicated, b. the deluded who have been deceived into buying into its philosophy, and c. those whom the Conspiracy in their secret papers have called "cattle" - those going along with the Zeitgeist of the times. It's power is multidimentional. Many of the books available to the public only scratch the surface of the religious dimension, or even pretend the religious aspect doesn't exist.

Even most Christian books tend to dismiss the reality of any spiritual danger from human conspiracies. This book's attempt to look at real situations which exist behind the scenes hopefully will expose the weakness of the pervasive Pietist viewpoint which narrowly defines the Christian's enemy as "the devil."

Due to the strong pietist influence within Protestantism in the Western World today, many Christians perceive spiritual warfare as something happening only on a spiritual level, something involving only the devil, and something happening only on a personal level. The world is not perceived as a threat. This pietism shields Christians from the fact that the world is out to destroy them, that there are real humans and real human institutions that desire to do physical harm to them.

The result of the Pietist view is that it shields the Protestants from experiencing the Spiritual power of the Christian community. Salvation is viewed on a very selfish personal level, and not as an aspect of Christian community. The church to the pietist is merely an aggregation of individuals. Concerning a wide variety of churches, even sects, that I have experienced, my opinion is that with minor exceptions the only Christian groups that really experienced Christian community were those of the Anabaptist tradition. These communities know already that the world is not a neutral environment, because they are sincerely attempting to live out in real life Christ's Sermon on the Mount. To give one example: the Amish believe Christians should care for their elderly. They do not view the State as a neutral or benevolent force, but an anti-Christian force that is treated with love as Christ responded to the despotic Roman rulership. Because of this viewpoint they rejected participation in the Social Security program and are responsibly caring for their elderly better in many ways than the general public. Because these Christians are willing to accept that the world they live in contains real live enemies, these type of Christian communities have already caught onto many of the solutions to the New World Order and are implementing them even though they are not aware of the extent of the human conspiracy that this book exposes. The Pietist view refuses to see the U.S. government as a threat, and so they have no problem giving the State more power to care for their elderly.

Second, this book "Be Wise As Serpents..." was written to show the full width and depth of the One-World-Religion while educating the reader how the One-World-Religion relates to the other powerful dimensions of the Conspiracy.

This book is designed for any freedom loving truth loving person. You do not need to be a Christian to appreciate this book. My guess is that sadly many non-Christians will be too brainwashed already to read something that is written by a Christian. In some ways, I can sympathize with non-Christians in this, because much of what is passed off as "Christian" is trash.

There are no sacred cows in my book. The world's manure caked bovines are shown for what they are. I treat God Almighty with respect and esteem his Word as Truth, because in my life they have proved truthful. Many people mock God and the Bible, but have never sincerely tested the validity and truthfulness of both. People who have not experienced the power of God in their lives, will not understand my motivation. I was sustained in writing this book by my conviction that the power of God which I have personally witnessed will somehow ultimately win the war against evil. It is beyond my comprehension how; God's ways have a tendency to be higher than my ways, so I am willing to trust in victory, without being granted any special revelation or visions of the future. I am a soldier of the Lord, ready to stand in place and fight. That is my duty.

To the powerhouse Fraternity I belonged to, West Point, USMA, I pledged service to duty honor country. I have wanted to fulfill this in a higher way. If this book ever sees publication, I will have only done my duty with honor for my country, the Kingdom of God. I hope that others who have made other pledges will reevaluate their oaths, and choose the higher fulfillment of their search for light by joining with me.

May God Bless You.

Pope John Paul II-	Jewish Freemason leading Catholic church into One-World-Religion of the New Age.
Rockefeller family-	Members of this family have been prominent in the Bilderbergers, CFR; they have been one-worlders and have funded countless projects and groups to further the New Order's goals. (See appendix)
F. Delano Roosevelt	A 33° Mason. A key player for the New Order. Gave America the New Deal, and gave America to the New Order. His wife was in the Communist party, and numerous other socialist/communist groups.
Rothschilds-	The most powerful family in the world for the last 2 centuries. They are at the center of power. (See chapter 3.3)
Russell family-	Members of this family have prominent Masons, Fabian Socialists, One-Worlders, lluminati and religious leaders. (See appendix)

Saint-Simon-	Associated with secret occult fraternal groups. Laid the groundwork for Marx, revolution and communism.
Robert Schuler-	33° Mason, leading Christian minister who is helping lead the Christians toward a one-world-religion. Has knowingly taught people taking Luciferian initiations
Joseph Smith, Jr.	Arch-Mason, prophet, founder of a super-rite of Freemasonry called Mormonism, a restoration of the Masonic mysteries.
H. G. Wells-	Prophet of the New World Order. British Fabian Socialist whose plans and books have been important in lending credibility to their goals. (See chapter 3.1 and other parts)
Rabbi Stephen Wise-	Arch-Mason, leader in the B'nai Brith, communist, friend of C.T. Russell. This man has played a leading role in Judaism and the New Order.

Just as there always seems a willing soul to offer himself to the New Order - there always will be men and women who have the courage to stand for goodness and truth. This list is but the tip of the iceberg and in no way indicates that these people contributed more than others, but rather they have been selected here for the part they have in this book's manuscript.

Constance Cumbey-	Christian lawyer whose book and research was a major expose of the New Age Movement and its links to the 1-World-Dictatorship.
Charles Finney-	An ex-Mason Christian evangelist who exposed and denounced Freemasonry.
Henry H. Klein-	Jewish lawyer who tried warning the world of a Jewish world conspiracy.
Marchetti-	Ex CIA agent, has tried to expose the CIA and its power.
Edith Star Miller

(Lady Queenborough)-	She compiled the first serious comprehensive study of the occult network of the New World Order. Her book is still a classic.
Brig.Gen. G. Mohr-	One of the leading challengers to the New World Order today.
John Robison-	An intelligent professor and Mason who exposed the Masonic/Illuminati plot to rule the world. His efforts may have saved the U.S. from an overt take over.
Menno Simons-	A prominent example of an Anabaptist minister. An example for Christians today. Anabaptists consisted of various groups that practiced a Christianity based on Jesus' teachings, such as non-resistance to evil, and loving your enemies.

IMPORTANT DEFINITIONS

Two words that need to be defined before the reader proceeds are Christian and Jew (also Jewish).

Christian- It was my desire to use language in its common usage. Who am I to say a person can or can't call himself a Christian? The primary use of the word Christian in this book is to use it in its broadest sense. Unfortunately, its common usage is so broad that it carries little meaning. Today, it is difficult to say, "I am a Christian," for the disciple of Christ because the word is devoid of meaning. In this book then, if a Satanist calls himself a Christian, he will be nominally refered to in this book that way. (The word Christian may have been originally a derogative word for the disciples of Christ.) The only other sensible alternative use of the word is its legitimate narrow sense which means a true disciple of Jesus. And the word is occasionally used herein in this legitimate narrow sense.

It should be pointed out that Jesus commmanded his disciples to love their enemies and to do them good. This means most of the Christian churches do not have a Christ-like world view. Or to say it bluntly, most of what is called Christian is not Christian. Protestants and Catholics think nothing about a millionaire evangelist preaching Jesus' sermons to the poor. Nor do many of them find discomfort that Protestants may have "Jesus in their heart", receive supportive prayers from their chaplains, and then climb into Jet bombers and drop 500 lb. bombs onto innocent civilians, who are written off as collateral damage. Jesus continued to call the Temple the "House of God" even though it had become a den of thieves. (Cf. Mt 21:13, Mr 11:17, Lu 19:46, et. al.)

Rather than detract from the readability by labelling all the various groups being used by the Conspiracy Power "pseudo-Christian", I prefer to use their own labels. Real Christians are an extremely small maligned minority. Although it is popular to say that it is judging to say someone isn't a Christian, it is equally judgemental to say he is a Christian. To judge means to form an opinion about, to determine authoritatively. This book claims no ability to determine authoritatively the final judgement of people by their Creator. The Scriptures do command Christians to form opinions about the actions and fruit of other people based on the authority of the Scriptures.

I have done this research and contribute my observations not because I am against any particular person or denomination of Christianity, but because I am sold out to Christ, and believe an expose of traitors (wolves in sheep's clothing) will protect the flock and encourage people to seek Godly men. Missing today from all the scientific, economic, and political studies is the vital voice of God the Creator. He can and is making a contribution to solve mankind's problems if mankind would listen. But to listen to God, means to quit listening to the SPIN of Cults connected to the Power. How can a Cult speak of God without knowing him? Consequently, there is collective ignorance, as the people allow the Power to religiously lead them. These people, although nominally Christian, live and worship in such a twilight zone that they can't distinquish black from white because of all the grey that has resulted, indeed somewhere along the way black has become white and white black. The definition of what is really a Christian has been lost in this Twilight Zone.

Jew, Jewish.-Some people would insist that the word must mean either a race or a religion. It can refer to the race that were the tribe of Judah. It can also refer to those who practice Judiasm. The word has been used to designate both a race and a religion, but today it can not be limited by common usage to either one for several reasons. Today, the "Jewish people" are not "a single race" nor are they "a single religion." The Jewish people range from being atheists, humanists, satanists, orthodox Talmudic followers, to Torah following Karaites, to upright God fearing men and women. The Jewish Encyclopedia uses the term Jew to mean both those who follow Judaism and those who are merely genetically descended from those who followed Judaism at some time.

Rabbi Morris N. Kertzer, a well-known and well-travelled Rabbi when asked to explain Judaism gave a very appropriate answer to the question what is a Jew.

"What is a Jew? It is difficult to find a single definition. A Jew is one who accepts the faith of Judaism. That is the religious definition. A Jew is one who, without formal religious affiliation, regards the teachings of Judaism - its ethics, its folkways, its literature - as his own. That is the cultural definition of a Jew. A Jew is one who considers himself a Jew or is so regarded by his community. That is the "practical" definition of a Jew. Prof. Mordecai Kaplan calls Judaism "a civilization." Jews share a common history, common prayer, a vast literature and, above all, a common moral and spiritual purpose. Judaism is really a way of life." (A Guide to the Religions of America. Rockefeller Center, NY: Simon & Schuster, 1955, p.65.)

Interesting is Rabbi Kertzer's point that whether religious or secular the Jews are "a civilization" that share a common purpose.

The Mason Richard Carlile quotes favorably in his Manual of Freemasonry, pp. viii, xi, a Rev. Robert Taylor who claims that the term "Jew" was originally the term for the 12th degree in the Eleusinian Mysteries which was the highest degree. The Eleusinian Mysteries began at least 1400 years before Christ and involved Isis and sexual rites. Those who attained the highest Eleusinian degree were named "Jew" and were considered to have become God himself by a deification process. Some then would view the term Jew to have come into use not so much from the tribe Judah, but from the fact that the tribal leaders of Benjamin, Judah and Levi were initiated into the Mysteries at Babylon. The Masonic lodge and Rosicrucians claim to continue the Eleusinian mysteries. (Whether or not Taylor's view has any historical merit, it is interesting to note that this is an alternative view that apparently a few people believe.)

This book uses the term Jew in its widest sense. Some of the people called Jews in this book might be surprised to be so labelled.

How do we describe a person who was born to Jewish parents, adopted by nominal Christians, sprinkled with a little baptismal water, and who then turns to Satanism? Is he Christian, is he Jewish, is he Satanic? In some cases like this, the person may in the book be identified as "Jewish"- that is if they knew they were adopted from a Jewish heritage on the assumption "blood [a blood tie] is thicker than water." Blood ties are important in Satanism and witchcraft. Many higher witches belong to the traditional view that one needs to belong to a family with a witchcraft heritage to be a real witch. The whole issue is really difficult. Karl Marx and Adolf Hitler were both Satanists. They were both nominal Christians, and from the best I can tell both had "Jewish" blood. The same Satanic blood line that sired Hitler's parent, financed Karl Marx to write Das Kapital. Why not say that Marx was of Satanic blood? Certainly, in these two cases to call either Karl Marx or Adolf Hitler Jewish doesn't seem proper at all. But then how does one describe their ties? If the word Satanic is used people think of only a spiritual tie in. The word Jewish, although it doesn't properly describe either man, comes closer to helping people understand a blood connection.

The use of the term Jewish in this book denotes neither disapproval or approval of a person. It can be correctly argued such a broad use of the terms Christian and Jewish makes them just a whisker above meaningless. I enjoy labelling people just a notch above catching AIDS. To use labels to prejudge someone is superficial.

The reason I use the term Jewish is that it is important to show the multitude of blood ties this conspiracy has. One of the primary Satanic groups, which is the vehicle to create a false Messiah for people to worship, is a false Jewish blood group. This false Jewish blood group is a danger to every Jew who loves his Creator, and his Creator's laws, and his Creator's genuine freedom, (and not the pseudo-freedom passed off on the populace like snake-oil.)

TERMS IN GENERAL

The prophet of Israel Isaiah warned "Woe to those who call evil good, and good evil." It seems that some of the advertising business hasn't taken Isaiah to heart. The English language of the population in general is becoming a tool of evil men, as the misnomers and Double-speak increase. The evil and selfish refer to themselves as good and generous. Slaves to sin call themselves liberated. The foolish call themselves enlightened. The lustful call themselves "good lovers." Mortals call themselves "God." The oldest religious superstitions call themselves "the New Age."

— CHAPTER 1 —

WHO BUILT YOUR FRAME OF REFERENCE?

There are three items you will learn in this chapter:

- You will learn how to use this book and how to improve your understanding of news events and history.
- You will be informed of some recent historical events that were planned but are generally believed to be accidental.
- You will be presented material from the conspirators own publications, a group of photocopies from authoritative sources showing the reader that this book is based on solid evidence.

Sometimes we could be looking for the truth, be told what the truth is, and still not see it.

There is a cow in the picture below. Can you see it?

If you really want to see the cow in the picture be flexible in your point of view. See page xix for the solution.

The reason this map of Washington, D.C. is presented is to instill within the reader the desire to see through camouflage. The reader will be able to draw deeper conclusions for himself about the message's significance after this book removes the camouflage from many hidden things. An inadequate frame of reference results in a false understanding of history.

If you don't know what these six pyramids are saying, but want to know, you need to be willing to learn the answer from people who are mindful and alerted to the esoteric answer. What is esoteric? Esoteric is a hidden meaning, a hidden answer, private information that only a select group know about Exoteric, is the opposite of esoteric.

There is something important being revealed in these six pictures, do you see it?

ANSWERS AT THE TOP OF NEXT PAGE

What are the three hidden numbers of this Universal Product Code?

If you said 666 you are right. No matter what Universal Product Code I asked you about, the hidden numbers are always 666. You will find the hidden numbers universally are 666. (See chapter 3.1 for how to decode the bar codes, and where to go for more information on this subject)

The hidden numbers happen to be 666 even if you are — say for instance — in Europe where they call their bar codes European Article Number EAR

THE SIGNIFICANCE GROWS THE MORE WE LEARN

The significance of this number 666 grows when we learn more about it.

Satanist Aleister Crowley who felt he was the Beast considered 666 to be his number. Other satanists have considered the number special to use also. Their attraction for the number matches an interesting prophecy made by a fisherman in the first century A.D.

This fisherman named John had a vision of the end of the age. From this be wrote a prophecy "that no one may buy or sell except one who has the mark or the name of the beast, or the number of his name. Here is wisdom. Let him who has understanding calculate the number of the beast, for it is the number of a man: His number is 666." REV 13:17-18

The significance grows when we ourselves learn how to decode the bar codes into numbers and prove to ourselves that the numbers 666 are the universally hidden numbers.

It grows some more when we learn about the great secrecy that surrounds the creation of the Universal Product Code.

The significance grows even more when we catch on to all the sneaky ways 666 is designed and hidden in many other items, including the cover of the new public school Globalism 2000 curriculum, Treasury Dept. badges, IRS codes and forms, social security forms, credit cards, and some bank cards.

The number 666 consistently reoccurs with evil. Gary D. Blevins uses a numeric code for the alphabet. He discovered that by using his system to assign values, and having his computer do the addition, that a large number of evil places are associated with the numbers 666, while the same system has come up repeatedly with good biblical values for Godly things. Whether you accept or don't accept Blevin's computer approach described in 666 The Final Warning (software for it is being sold), that doesn't negate the validity that the number reoccurs with high frequentcy.

BEFORE HAND WE COULD SEE NOTHING SINISTER IN THE BAR CODE

But as our frame of reference expands we begin to learn things that are surprising. Could the bar code in the future have anything to do with controlling buying and selling? Could it be associated with evil designs?

ANSWERS TO PAGE-2 QUESTIONS

A. The same people who contrived it for profit and power were the only winners.

B. You wouldn't have to, they are all run by the same group.

C. Magic and witchcraft are already being taught in many Christian churches, often under new labels. In fact, human sacrifices are already being done in secret in some well known Christian churches with well known pastors.

In August 1979, this Author passed some intelligence information to the CIA via a Jehovah's Witness.[1]

Seventy-seven months later, the President announced this information publicly when it was politically advantageous. The release of this information was purely manipulation of the public, and a distortion of historical perceptions. It was a lesson on how intelligence information serves those in power. The public is manipulated by those in power through the use of information.

What is amazing is how gullible even people with higher degrees are, those people who we might think would know better. Apparently, critical thinkers among the so-called educated public are few. Also, those, who have been in the government controlled educational system longer periods of time, have simply provided the system more time to condition and propagandize them, unless they are the type of person to challenge what they are being fed.

On the other hand, it must be remembered that all communication that a person perceives is then related to his or her whole experience. Fragments that do not relate to what a person has experienced more often than not are forgotten. The person may puzzle over the tidbits of incongruent fragments, but being unable to relate them to his world view, finds himself unable to file the fragments away in a meaningful manner.

There seems to be no end to the fragments of information relating to the conspiracy, and these are available to everyone, but the meaning is elusive, because the observing public can't assimilate or doesn't want to assimilate their meaning.

Making a fundamental change in our frame of reference is a frightening task. The reader isn't a piece of grid paper for me to design his thinking. The reader must participate with me. Even if it is too difficult for you to agree with everything I say, press on, for if you gain even a little insight it will begin a process.

[1] The reason I passed information to the CIA was that while I was in Libya, (working with my father who was with the U.N.), I learned about the large missile silos the Russians had installed and were manning. I had never had anything to do with the CIA but as a concerned citizen for the welfare of the freeworld, I felt an obligation to pass on this information concerning the outflanking of Nato with Russian missiles. Today, I would not pass that information on, because afterwards I learned that CIA agents such as Edwin Wilson were carrying out assassinations for Libya's Qaddafi. CIA agent Wilson hired Anti-Castro Cubans and Green Berets to carry out assassinations and other assignments for Qaddafi. The CIA agents Frank Terpil and Wlson supplied Qaddafi with all kinds of forbidden military hardware like heat-seeking ground-to-air missiles, sabotage and psyc warfare training programs, sophisticated assassination gear and bombs disguised as household trinkets using plastic explosives to slip past airport metal detectors. Wilson supplied planes, men, and weapons for Qaddafi's military invasions of Chad and the Sudan, and supplied training for his airforce which uses Pakistani pilots. (For information on CIA agent Wilson and Libya, and other crimes read Kwitny, Jonathan. The Crimes Of Patriots A True Tale of Dope, Dirty Money, and the CIA NY: W.W. Norton & Co., 1987, pp. 101-104, 291,312-13.) Even after information of these things leaked out, the U.S. government continued to pretend not to notice. Ironically, meanwhile, Reagon was picturing Qaddafi as a bloodthirsty terrorist supported by the Communists, while behind the scenes Qaddafi's invasions and assassinations were made possible by the CIA. While I was in Libya, Americans at home were being led to believe the Libyans were bloodthirsty for American blood, while Americans in Libya were running the oil fields. The reason I mention this anecdote was [a] to show how the public is manipulated by "news" and their leaders, [b] to show the reader how this Author has been around and writes from an informed position, [c] to begin destroying the illusion that Jehovah's Witnesses have nothing to do with the CIA or the New World Order. Chapters 5-17 of the first section show how the Watchtower Society of the J.W.s is part of the New World Order.

My book simply states what has happened and what is planned. I don't believe in crystal balls. At some point, the things in this book will become part of your own experience. That is when this book will become real to you. Perhaps it will be when they do a currency exchange. Perhaps it will be when they start a cashless society. Perhaps it will be when friends disappear. Perhaps it will be when W.W. III happens. Perhaps it will be when they try one of these things and the people refuse to cooperate. Because this material challenges people to rethink what they have experienced in their lives, it may challenge some of your core beliefs. I'll do my part in providing evidence, but I'm depending on you to get something out of this book.

I anticipate much of the reading audience may be Bible readers. Why should Bible readers read this book? Doesn't the Word of God fully equip us? In one sense it does. A soldier is fully equipped going into battle, but he must still study his enemy. When a missionary uses a Chilton's manual to repair a car, or prays for wisdom he is showing that the Bible was not designed to answer every question. What many Christians seem unaware of, perhaps it is a secret, is that the Bible was intentionally ambigious and insufficient so that we would turn to God and trust in Him, and not in some formula or knowledge. Knowledge is a tool. And as a tool it can be used for good or bad.

The most sordid events have been used by God. The Bible stories are full of humans at their worst. But God is able to communicate to us a spiritually beneficial message from such events. Likewise, it is this book's purpose to be spiritually beneficial.

This book is not a prophetic panhandler. Speculation on Bible prophecy is absent from this book. This book is based on fact, solid facts known to me about the New World Order regime and its one-world-religion. The entire picture is lacking in confirmed details at a few points and in these areas I try to advise the readers that I am giving only my observations.

By and large you will be reading fact, not theory. It is a complex picture when the pieces are all jumbled up. Hopefully, an integrated design will be seen by the reader by the end of the book.

SOME OF US WANT TO BE FOOLED

I was a West Pointer. West Point cadets learn the meaning of authority and discipline. I still believe in obedience to authority. Many religious or patriotic people want to believe in our leaders, for they feel it is our duty, right or wrong, to blindly obey. While in the military, I believed in obedience to authority. My primary focus in the military was how to carry out an order, not whether the order had merit. In this regard, I was like many of the men and women in this nation, an instrument of those who are deceiving this nation.

It is proper to obey authority. Even more important, it is proper to obey our highest authorities. As a Bible believer and as a child of God, you will want to obey your heavenly parent. If you do not believe in God, perhaps you believe in the Constitution or the concept of Man's freedom.

The Declaration of Independence and the Bill of Rights are reminders to patriotic Americans that there are limits to what a government should or even legally can do. Remember God is a higher authority, remember the Constitution is a higher authority. At times a person must prefer to obey a higher authority — did not even the founders of the American government and its laws say, "When in the course of human events it becomes NECESSARY for one people to DECLARE the causes which impel them to a separation..."?

After reading this book, you the reader will learn more on how the Cold War at the highest level was a staged production, reaping all kinds of benefits for those seeking to rule the world, and creating a frame of reference that made it difficult for people to see beyond an east-west confrontation.

What's funny, in a sad way, is that there were people predicting the total collapse of communism in Eastern Europe, because they had seen through the conspiracy, and yet the press again has still pulled a fast one on us. They proclaim, Who could have seen such a thing like the Berlin Wall coming down?

Whether they report it or not, let the record show there were people who could see what was going on behind the scene.[2]

The Trilateral Commission after its meeting in Apr. 1990 published a report (months before Iraq invaded Kuwait) about what it intended to do to Iraq.[3]

This group consisting of European nations, Japan and the U.S. had decided to disarm Iraq. Because they did nothing serious diplomatically toward this, it was clear that they meant to do it militarily. Those of us who have been to that area of the world, like myself, knew the Iraqi military threat was way overblown. Again, it was clear from history what the military would do. This author is no military genius, but he stated before Desert Storm that the military thing to do would be to first bomb for one month and then go around the fortifications like the Germans did the Maginot line. Knowing what was going to happen made it hard to watch the carefully orchestrated media manipulate the people. There is much more that could be said about what went on behind America's back during the Iraq-Kuwait crisis, but the point is simply this, some people were not being surprised by what happened.

If your frame of reference grows as a result of this book, perhaps you too will not be surprised next time.

Another example of how the public's frame of reference is lacking is Nixon. The Power built Nixon's false public image as a hard-nose anti-communist conservative, yet he was actually working for the conspiracy. His liberal voting record, his establishment of close ties with Communist China haven't been given much analysis, because that wouldn't fit his public image — that frame of reference that the Power created that he was an anti-communist crusader. Harvard history professor John Kenneth Galbraith, a socialist, revealed in the New York Magazine (Sept. 21, 1970) p. 25 that Nixon had surrounded himself as President with leading leftists and was pushing a Socialist agenda. Perhaps your high school history book like mine showed a picture of Nixon waging an anti-Communist crusade in the 1950's. Later, I learned that Nixon's involvement was really a sham.

Another random example is the album cover of Beatle star Harrison's Living in a Material World. This album cover does indeed show us how we are to live in a material world. The cover shows a hand containing money with the chakra point on the opposite side being illuminated. To me, this clearly shows an initiation point already in use and which is planned for the general population in the future. (It also happens by some holy coincidence to fit the Bible prophecy of the Mark of the Beast needed to buy and sell.) By the way, this book's story does not need Bible prophecy to prop it up. Whether you believe in Revelations or not, it is still possible to realize that a New Age initiation process has already begun.

Our previous experience and our information available will directly influence how accurately each of us assigns meaning to information we receive. This Author knew Harrison was into Hinduism. Although Hinduism and the New Age are not exactly synonymous the terms can be used interchangeably here in regards to Harrison. (The meaning of such terms will be detailed later.) I am also aware that the New Age movement has already begun initiations at the chakra points. I have seen horns tatooed onto the third eye position. I have experienced as an observer Hinduism first hand, and listened to New Agers discuss the chakra points. I have studied Texe Marrs' Mystery Mark of The New Age which examines in detail the initiation point and what is happening today compared to REV 13:16, 17. Revelation 13 says the Mark of the Beast will be placed on right hands and foreheads. These chakra positions are already initiation points for the New Age. What meaning would you the reader assign to this information about Harrison's album cover?

President Bush's remarks about the New World Order are another example. Few Americans are aware that Bush belongs to a powerful group called the Order (believed to be part of the American portion of the Illuminati). Nor are most Americans aware of what kind of New Order these people want for us. So when Bush says a New World Order is being created, most people must surmise at best what they think he means by this.[4]

(See this footnote for the documentation of Bush's membership in the Order.)

The popular film Indiana Jones and the Last Crusade provides the next example. At one point Indiana Jones (Harrison Ford) is told, The quest for the Grail is the quest for the divine in all of us. At a later point, a character who has belonged to a secret order tells Indiana Jones how his Order has protected the Grail for 2,000 years. Those who have read Holy Blood Holy Grail will recognize at once that this is preparing viewers to accept the new Messiah. Holy Blood Holy Grail exposes a conspiracy connected to groups such as the Masons and other secret groups to introduce a new Messiah. Supposedly the Holy Grail that secret societies have preserved is the holy blood line of Jesus Christ. By unconscious persuasion the viewer is having his frame of reference expanded so that when the story line of the new Messiah is presented, he will be able to place it within his frame of reference.

How has the American public had their frame of reference created by the conspiracy? More will be provided later on, but a few quick points can help establish for the Reader the extent of the conspiracy. They have been in control since the American Revolution. Over a period of 200 years they have had the time and the resources to create history and news. (See chapter 3-5 and 3-6) They control the major newspapers and the major political figures. If a President stepped too far out of line, he was assassinated. In each case, the assassination has been covered up. Although the coverup in the Kennedy and Lincoln assassinations doesn't fool anyone willing to look at the evidence, still they got away with it. They have written our history books and our text books. They have created such an artificial frame of reference that the public finds it hard to hang factual information about the conspiracy in their frame of reference. But this didn't happen overnite, they have had two hundred years.

Impossible you say! Article I, Section 8,10: U.S. Constitution forbids the production of paper-money by the government. Has this been ignored and circumvented?   Do you use paper money?

Oh, does it seem impossible? Another eye opener is the identity of who wrote Shakespeare's works. Manly P. Hall, a powerful Mason (whose credentials are shown in the photocopies of Masonic material following this opening chapter), provides proof in his book that Sir Francis

[4] The connections of Bush to the Power documented in this book (the New Order) are so numerous they won't all be given here except in brief form. His membership in the Order is discussed in Antony Sutton's America's Secret Establishment. A Biography about George Bush by Fitz Hugh Green entitled George Bush An Intimate Portrait (NY: Hippocrene Books, 1989) makes passing reference to his membership in the Skull & Bones Fraternity (p. 48) and the Andover Fraternity (p. 49). Sutton's books serve as a good beginning to document and study what George Bush is. One of his books is The Two Faces of George Bush. This information has been leaking slowly into the news in a way to keep some lid on it. The Williamette Week (Sept. 19-25,1991, Portland, OR) had an long article on the facts about Bush's Skull & Bones membership, pp. 1,8-11 based on John Lawrence's research. However, the tenor of the article was that the Order had little to do with a grand conspiracy but had much political influence. Without a proper frame of reference this type information is forgotten, ignored, or misused by people. Bush is also a 33 degree Freemason, (testified to by numerous Masonic sources) even though it is being denied by the White House. He has oil connections, banking connections, intelligence connections and he was director of the CIA. He has connections with blood lines connected to the Conspiracy. This footnote to Bush's connections to the Conspiracy could be a book in itself. His Zapata oil rigs were used to smuggle drugs into the U.S. Drugs were unloaded on the oil platforms off the coast of TX The small boats coming from the platforms do not go through customs. Also his son has been seen personally directing a flight of drugs which came through an Airforce base. Another good book about Bush is James J. Drummey's book The Establishment's Man (Appleton, WI: Western Islands, 1991).

Bacon wrote Shakespeare's works. This Author being a Certified and experienced handwriting analyst has long been aware the illiterate man who could barely sign his name William Shakespeare could never have written the works attributed to him. The works of Shakespeare are written by a man literate in several languages. Sir Francis Bacon was an early leader of that conspiracy which has successfully kept the identity of who wrote Shakespeare's works secret for all these centuries. If that isn't power, what is?

"From 80 to 90% of the population can be hypnotized to varying degrees...At least 5% (10,000,000) of the U.S. population is extraordinarily hypnotizable, so easily hypnotizable that they are in a constant state of exaggerated suggestibility, even when awake and going about their normal daily routine. They are at the total mercy of all forms of influences and can easily be persuaded to do things and afterward have no idea why they did them..." Dr. Tobias H. Brocher, Director, Center for Applied Behavioral Sciences, Menninger Foundation, Topeka, KS.

AMERICA'S MINDLESS FASCINATIONS

The conspiracy has succeeded in turning people from watching reality to a mindless fascination for a comic strip-video game-sitcom life of unreality. You are to do your job for the system, then go home and not think; or if you want to think, tune into one of their talk shows or read one of their newspapers. Perhaps no one has ever shown you the names of who exactly controls big business and the media. The power in this nation is controlled by an elite. That can be documented. And it can be shown what they intend for us.

Events in Eastern Europe are such a visible example of media manipulation. Spontaneous revolts are a fiction. People plan and stage marches and revolutions.

"The cold war is no longer needed by the conspiracy. In 1983, Constance Cumbey made an attempt to warn people about the New World Order planned for the entire globe in her book The Hidden Dangers of the Rainbow, The New Age Movement and our coming Age of Barbarism. On p. 123 she outlines their plans for the future, Next, the conspiracy was to involve 'a skeptical and destructive criticism of personal-immortality religions.' Strangely enough, communism was to be destroyed at the same time. However, the New Agers feel the program they are offering the world would satisfy the basic desire of Communists in that it proposes a form of worldwide socialism. The existing Communist formulae-per-se- were to be abolished..."

Well said Constance, It is really only being abolished per se because every platform of the Communist party has been adopted already in the United States, point by point. The US already has what the communists wanted.[5]

And often we the people have been unconsciously manipulated into asking them to do what they wanted.

At some point, the people of the world will ask them to create a One-World-Government. We the people will ask them to bring in what they have been wanting to do. That does not mean we understand what we are following. Hopefully, some of us blind followers will awake and break our mental chains of servitude and think for ourselves. Let us break our chains of servitude to gnostic religious powers who are pawns of the conspiracy. Let us recognize all the manipulations and the puppets of this vast power.

We asked them to create vast spy networks,

[9] In order to abbreviate this I will give the U.S. laws which establish Marx's 10 planks. (The reader is asked to look up the 10 planks of the Communist Manifesto (1848) by Karl Marx himself or to request from the publisher of this book a tract giving this in fuller form.) [1] Property tax which amounts to a type of governmental rental of land. [2J Graduated State & Fed. Income Taxes [3) Inheritance Taxes & Reformed Probate Laws. [4] Sedition Act of 1798; I.R.S. because we believed in their cold war ploy. And the cold war was real for the common man. But now these vast spy networks can not be dismantled. A great deal of their activities have nothing to do with the reasons they were created. And we unwittingly fund these secret services that spy on us, and are at the complete disposal of the conspiracy.

The machinations of the secret services such as MI 5, MI 6, the FBI, the CIA, and others boggle the mind.

It is no comfort to realize that men identified as related to the Conspiracy are also men in control of the secret services. The tie-ins by the leadership of all of these agencies to the Conspiracy confirms confidential leaks that they are used by the Conspiracy. For instance, George Bush(the Order) dir. CIA, Lord Rothschild (family part of the center of power) CSC (chief) of MI 6, Hugh Sinclair (family part of blood line for new Messiah) CSC (chief) of MI 6...and on and on... This chapter is not the place in this book to detail all this.

It may be sufficient at this point to simply sum up the power of MI 6 (British Secret Service overseas) and the American system that works hand in glove with the British by quoting Nigel West, an expert on MI 6,

..."the firm, as it is referred to by outsiders, enjoys a unique reputation for stealth, devious efficiency, ruthlessness and, it must be said, treachery. It has often been considered all-powerful, wielding enormous secret influence. It was once said in America in the 1920s that six institutions rule the world: Buckingham Palace, the White House, the Bank of England, the Federal Reserve Bank, the Vatican and the British Secret Service."

Should the reader indulge this Author long enough, he shall learn that apparently all these centers of power Nigel West thought ruled the world are controlled by an single elite group. If the evidence shows that the last two popes are not only Masons, but part of the conspiracy, (the present one is Jewish by the way) then indeed they have solidified the power of the world into one hegemony.

This Author would like to introduce the reader to this conspiracy and do so at whatever point of entrance will work for the individual. But he would also like the chance to suggest the means to implement readjustments. What good is it to know that a One-World-Government is planned if there is no means to resist? You can start by turning off the television and reading this book. You can start by turning off the control gnostic religious leaders have imposed upon you and thinking for yourself. Disconnect yourself from the umbilical cords of the conspiracy, which have fed you misleading information. You can start by thinking. Use this book as a launching pad to new investigations, it is not an infallible crutch to lean on, although the author will try to give the documentation you need. Some of the documentation can simply not be given. Dozens of interviews with people have simply resulted in the author knowing dangerous information that nobody wants to have their name associated with.

IMAGINE LIVING UNDER HITLER

The German population feared the Gestapo. The same International group of people that helped Hitler to power and assisted him to cleanse Europe of unwanted people are ready to go to work cleansing again. (See chapter 2 and other parts for the details.)

WHAT THIS BOOK IS NOT

This book is not a comprehensive study of the conspiracy, in spite of that appearance. It is actually a limited study on how a one-world-religion has been created, and is to become the religion of the New World Order that forces are moving us toward.

Many different groups have been studied in-depth, and all kinds of people with clues to how power is really functioning talked to. For instance, this Author studied the following group.

EXAMPLE OF ONE OF THE GROUPS STUDIED

In Rabbi Jack Moline's book Growing Up Jewish on page 76 he claims that Congress is run by the Jews, "For years, anti-Semites have accused Jews of controlling Congress, and for years it has been denied. Ironically, as of 1984, the Jews do control Congress. A recent survey of the 435 representatives, shows that for all practical purposes, 219 are practicing Jews. Interestingly, twelve members of the Black Congressional Caucus are Ethiopian Jews. On the Senate side, an astounding 62 out of 100 Senators identify themselves as Jews!" (This surely doesn't square with what the press is telling the public.)[6]

The Jewish author A. Cowen, in his book The X-Rays in Freemasonry, on page 6 says that Jews control Freemasonry, "The Jews swarmed into it (Freemasonry) from the earliest times and controlled it through the higher grades and councils. They have controlled the ancient and accepted Scottish Rite since the beginning of the Nineteenth Century." (This is not what the Scottish Rite is telling the public.)

The widely known Jewish author Marcus Eli Ravage in an article in Century Magazine, Jan. 1928 wrote, "We Jews are at the bottom of nearly all your wars; not only of the Russian but of every other major revolution in your history. We did it solely with the irresistable might of our spirit, with ideas and propaganda."

Rabbi Stephen Wise, a Scottish Rite Mason and leader in the Order of B'nai B'rith, when discussing communism said, "Some call it communism; I call it Judaism." (See the American Bulletin, 5/15/1935) What? How can communism be related to Judaism?

There are many other identical claims or similar ones made by other Jews in books and articles whose primary reading audiences would be Jewish. In investigating what power or powers control our lives, it was necessary to check the record to see if these Jewish claims had any validity. This Author is a researcher, a detective who wants to ferret out the original documents, discover an honest history based on a more balanced, broader picture of what happened in the past.

THIS BOOK IS NOT FOR OR AGAINST ANY RACE

This book is not a book about races, even though race plays a part in the story. The God of the Bible not only claims responsibility for creating the races, but also His belief that before Him they are all equal. Scriptures categorically state, "But now you must also put off all these: anger, wrath,... put on the new man who is renewed in knowledge according to the image of Him who created him, where there is neither Greek nor Jew, circumcised nor uncircumcised, barbarian, Scythian, slave nor free, but Christ is all in all." Christ placed no conditions on the great commission.

This Author could care less what race the world says you are. Popular concepts of race are to a large degree based on myths. If the Arabs are from Ishmael, and the over twelve million Ashkenazim Jews are descended from the Khazars as some Jewish historians validate, then these Askenazim Jews are derived from a combination of European blood overlaying the blood of a Mongolian tribe. This Mongolian tribe, the Khazars, claim Togarmah, a pagan person found in the Bible as their ancestor. Consequently, the majority of people called Jews would not even carry Semitic blood. The Arabs are known to be descended from Shem, hence Semites. Since the Jewish people are today the persecutors of the Arabs in the Middle East (at least by some Arab perceptions) that would make the Ashkenazim Jews the biggest anti-semites in the world.

At any rate, there are so many myths, so much intermarriage, and movement of peoples that the popular 'histories' of races should be tossed in the garbage. This Author believes that before our Creator there is no Jew, there is no Gentile, there is no Greek, no German, no Negro, no Scythian.

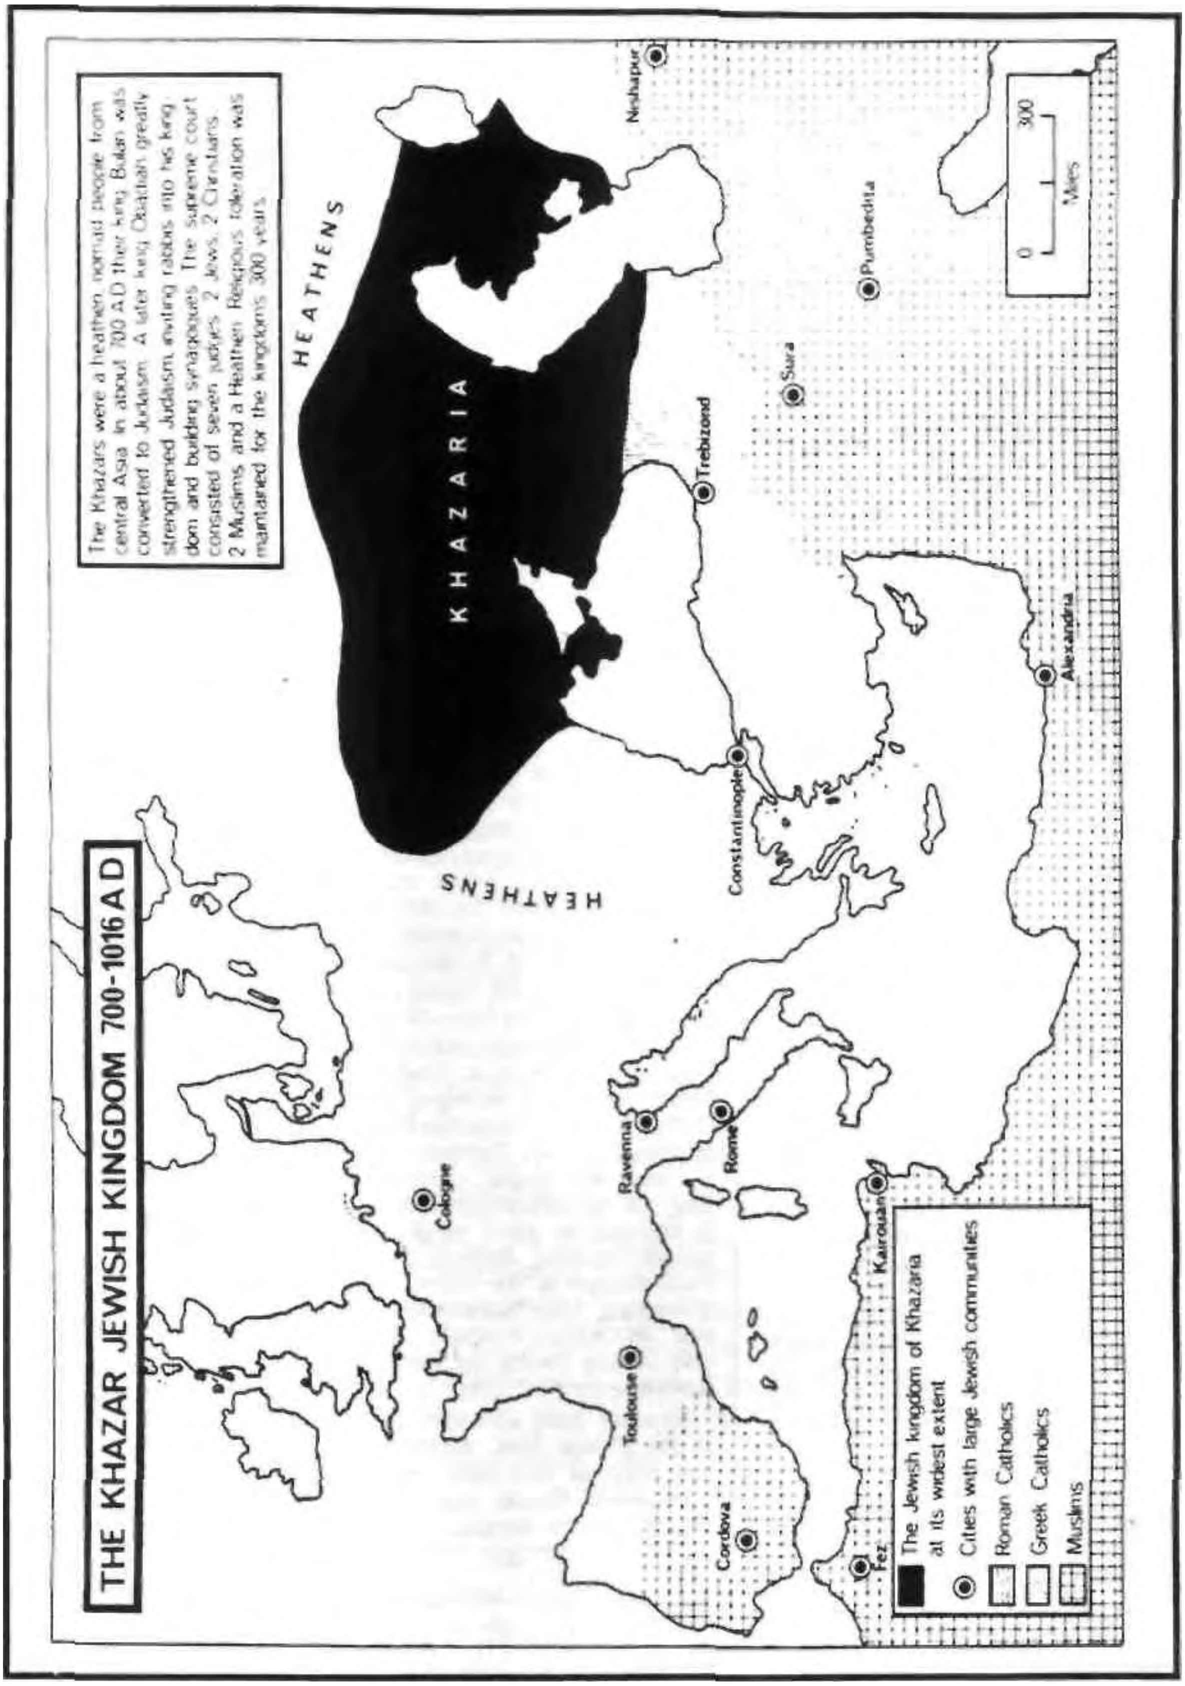
[8] For instance, Parade Magazine's Intelligence Report reports that 41 —that means 7 1/2% of the 540 Congressmen are Jewish. However, 35 Congressmen are listed "Unspecified", and Christian Scientists, Unitarians and other denominations may well contain Jews who do not belong to a Synagogue. Parade Magazine, Dec. 30, 1990, p. 20.



THE KHAZAR JEWISH KINGDOM 700-1016 A D
The Khazars were a heathen nomad people from central Asia. In about 700 A.D. their king Bulan was converted to Judaism. A later king Obadiah greatly strengthened Judaism, inviting rabbis into his kingdom and building synagogues. The supreme court consisted of seven judges: 2 Jews, 2 Christians, 2 Muslims and a Heathen. Religious toleration was maintained for the kingdoms 300 years.

The Jews That Aren't

By LEO HUMAN: Coplay News Service San Diego Union-28.8.1966

TEL AVIV

Nathan M. Pollock has a beef with the Israeli government.

His elaborate plans to celebrate this September the 1.000th anniversary of the Jewish-Khozar alliance were summarily rejected.

An elderly, meek-looking man who migrated to Israel from Russia 43 years ago, Pollock ekes out a living as a translator of scientific texts and proofreader in a publishing firm.

But his great passion, hobby and avocation is historic research.

He has devoted 40 of his 64 years to trying to prove that six out of 10 Israelis and nine out of 10 Jews in the Western Hemisphere are not real Jews' Jews, but descendants of fierce Khozar tribes which roamed the steppes of southern Russia many centuries ago.

For obvious reasons the Israeli authorities are not at all eager to give the official stamp of approval to Pollock's theories.

"For all we know, he may be 100 per cent right," said a senior government official. "In fact, he is not the first one to discover the connection between Jews and Khozars. Many famous scholars. Jews and non-Jews, stressed these links in their historical research works.

"But who can tell today what percentage of Khozar blood flows in our veins, if at all? And who can declare with any degree of scientific accuracy which Jews are Jews and which descendants of this Tartar-Mongol race?

"As a matter of fact, our alleged descent from the Khozars is the central theme of Arab propaganda," he added. "The Arabs claim most European Jews have no right to be in Israel in the first place because they are not descended from Biblical Hebrews, but from Tartar-Mongol nomad tribes, including the Khozars who were converted to Judaism en masse 1,000 years ago."

Scientific opinion in Israel is divided on the subject. No one argues the basic premise: that a group of 12.000 Jews, fleeing from persecution and wart in the Holy Land, in the wake of Byzantine and Moslem conquests, made the long overland trek to Persia, crossed the territory of today's Turkestan in Central Asia and found asylum in the Khozar Kingdom, which occupied a vast area between the Caspian Sea, Volga River, Ural Mountains, Black Sea and the Polish borderlands.

In the year 965 the Khozars were defeated for the first time in 500 years, by Prince Sviatoslav of Kiev. King Bulan III of Khozaria concluded that Prince Sviatoslav emerged victorious from the war because his troops and mercenaries were Christians, while his nomads were pagan worshipers. The king and his nobles embraced Judaism in 965, and in 966 a royal edict was passed enforcing Judiasm as the only legal religion in the Khozar Kingdom. Tribesmen had to undergo circumcision, learn Hebrew prayers and recognize Jewish rabbis as their spiritual leaders — on pain of death.

As other Jews who were persecuted in the Middle East, medieval Europe and Spain at that time, heard of the new Jewish-Khozar kingdom, rumors spread that the Messiah had arrived at long last. There were several consecutive migration waves to Khozaria, via Persia, Greece and Poland.

Pollock believes the traditional Russian anti-Semitism probably stems from that epoch when Hebrew-speaking Khozar raiders attacked Russian villages, killed the men folk, abductod women, forcibly converted them to Judaism and married them in full-fledged religious ceremonies. This also would explain why so many European Jews are blond and blue-eyed, with a slight Mongol slant to their eyes, as well as the total absence of Semitic features among many Israelis of European descent.

The flourishing Jewish-Khozar Kingdom was destroyed in 1230 by the Mongol invasion of Ban Khan.

Following the Mongol invasion and conquest, surviving members of Jewish-Khozar tribes trekked west and settled in Poland, Hungary, Bohemia, Austria, Romania and the Ukraine.

How can one find out if he is a "Khozar Jew" or a "Hebrew Jew?"

According to Pollock, whose parents came from Poland, if your name is Halperin, Alport, Halpern, Galpern, etc., you are a 100 per cent Khozar. "Alper" means "brave knight" in the Khozar tongue, and the name was granted by the king to the most distinguished warriors. Names like Kaplan, Caplon, Koppel, and the like are positive proof of Khozar descent, according to the scholar. "Kaplan" means "fierce hawk" in the Khozar language. Kogan, Kagan, Kaganovich show aristocratic descent from Kagan-Hagan, King Bulan's chief minister.

Likewise, the reader may trace his Saxon ancestors back to the Scythians, and from Assyrian tablets to Palestine. Just be aware that obedience to God, whether Gentile or Israelite, is a pre-condition of blessing, according to the history of the Bible. (Romans 2:28-29 sums it up).

Unfortunately, in the history of mankind, racism has played a role that has shown us the bad side of humanity. This is not to say that the races don't exist, nor does this mean God doesn't bless cities, tribes or nations as a group. But race has been such an important issue to many people in the wrong way, and so much so that the ideas and myths of race have woven themselves into the fabric of the conspiracy and can not be separated out without tearing out part of the story.

With the One-World-Power all racism becomes even more dangerous. Why? Read Orwell's 1984. Remember Krystalnacht. The One-World-Power loves to direct people's hate to their own advantage. The motion picture industry and their editing abilities are a powerful tool in creating and directing people's hates. On Aug. 1, 1990, Saddam Hussein was a good guy. Such a good guy that our President and government were generously supplying him with lots of credit and weapons. But after the invasion of Kuwait, it did not take long for television to create an image that Saddam Hussein had been an evil Hitler for a longtime. Indeed, he probably has been a rotten character for a long time. The point that the reader is being reminded of is that your image of hiM, whether good (during the Iraq-Iran war) or bad (during the Kuwait crisis), was formed by the system's television. For some reason most people don't ask, If he was a Hitler in 1989, why were we doing business with him? Many people's frames of references are built like faucets that the media controls and can turn hot or cold. Does the reader want to be a media faucet?

One idea that has been conditioned into the Christians through Christian television and their leaders (which will be discussed later in this book) is that the Jewish people are the apple of God's eye, the seed of Abraham, God's Chosen People. This prevalent form of racism is unquestionably accepted because the Old Testament blessings of God are applied to the Jewish nation. Christians apply for instance the blessing given to Balaam to Israel today, "Blessed is he that blesseth thee, and cursed is he that curseth thee." Num 24:9 Christians have been conditioned to view Israel as the prodigal son that the Father continues to smile on and bless. A more accurate view is that mankind in general are prodigal sons that the Father continues to have patience with. He actively watches for us to come home to Him.

The last thing this Author wanted to do was to thrust upon the reader any controvery concerning the Jews that might upset him and stop people from getting the wealth of beneficial knowledge this book has. But readers of the manuscript kept wanting to know where I got authority to dare criticize anyone Jewish. Aren't the Jewish people under a special blessing that exempts them from criticism or exposure?

Those who claim God's blessings to Israel base their claims to that blessing on two criteria. Either they claim the blessing on the basis Israel is the PHYSICAL seed of Abraham, or that they are Israel being the SPIRITUAL seed of Abraham. According to JEWISH scholarship, modern Israel is neither. 80% of the Jews today are not genetically the seed of Abraham, but are descended from the Khazar tribe in Asia which later was forced to move into Poland, and other European areas. The Khazars became Jews because their King decided his Asian kingdom would adopt the Jewish religion. See the page for a photocopy from a JEWISH HISTORICAL ATLAS authored by a JEW who is a JEWISH HISTORIAN. Informed Jews know of this. It is in the Jewish Encyclopeadia. The Sephardic Jews in Israel, who are genetic descendants of Abraham, not only are a minority in Israel but, according to some of them, are abused and discriminated-against by the majority of Jews which are descendants of the Khazars. Even the Sephardic Jews have assimilated much of the genes of other nations. Sephardic Jews from Africa look like Africans, from China they look like Chinese.

Are they spiritually in line for a blessing? The Universal Jewish Ency., p. 637, states that the ultimate authority for Orthodoxy is the Babylonian Talmud. The Bible itself ranks second to it in reality, if not theory. That 6,000 page Talmud, although not written when Christ was alive, is part of the system Christ repeatedly rebuked in public as the synagogue of Satan. It is only Christian ignorance of what the Talmud actually says that prevents Christians from realizing that that Jewish statement alone morally separates the Orthodox Jews from God's blessings. The Jew Jesus Christ rejected certain Jews' claims that they were God's chosen people, If ye were Abraham's children, ye would do the works of Abraham.'" Jn 8:39

The Jew and ex-rabbi Apostle Paul dropped a bombshell when he declared not everyone who is born of Jewish parents and educated in the synagogue is viewed by God as children of God's promised blessing. "For they are not all Israel who are of Israel; nor are they all children because they are the seed of Abraham; but, 'In Isaac your seed shall be called.' That is, those who are the children of the flesh, these are not the children of God; but the children of the promise are counted as the seed." Rm 9:6-8.

The Christian church trembles today before the Chosen Race, and is afraid to criticize anything the American government does to assist Israel. Nor will many of the Christian ministers speak out against the human rights abuses done to the Palestinians. They have hurt the cause of Christ several ways, first, there are a good number of Palestinian Christians, second, the Arab world has rejected Christ because of Christian support for Israel, and third, they are supporting human rights abuses. Since the Orthodox Jewish system was operating in Jesus' time it is clear what the Christian view was. The Christian Apostle Paul states that the good Orthodox Jews of pure descent are not the seed of Abraham. Romans 2:8,29 says this very thing.

Even Jews who have read about Moses will realize the great Moses was not allowed into the Promised Land for simply disobeying in one small matter. God wanted a holy people. Before God allowed the Children of Israel into the promised land, they had to wander 40 years to purge themselves of their sinful attitudes, disobedience, and idolatry. That was the good Lord's moral standard then, and I find no scripture that reveals God has lost his moral inclinations since then.

Why will this Author make references to Jews?

THEIR ROLE

Jews have given us Jesus, and many other positive things. It was a Jew, Michael Landon, who bucked the System to bring us Little House on the Prairie and Highway to Heaven. It was also a Jew, Henry H. Klein, who warned the world with his book entitled A Jew Exposes The Jewish World Conspiracy. Many attempts were made on Klein's life. The events this book covers are world-wide, and entail more than the Jewish people. Anti-semitism is a tool of the Conspiracy. Klein and others have exposed that. Who do you think controls the Ku Klux Klan?

THEIR HIDDEN IDENTITIES

According to Jewish sources, half of the Jews no longer have names that are recognizably Jewish.

Further, reliable Jewish sources indicate that on a yearly basis about 80% of the applications for name changes in the United States are Jewish. Where 50,000 applications are made roughly, that means on a yearly basis 160,000 Jews change their names legally, (this is not referring to marriages) and almost all of the name changes are to non-Jewish sounding names.[7]

Because the Jewish people are not easily identified, and yet are interwoven so deeply into the whole story line, it is necessary to point them out as the story develops. Scottish and British blood lines also play a part in the story. They too will be pointed out.

THE NEW MESSIAH HAS A JEWISH LINEAGE

Putting aside the Bible, and observing carefully what is happening today, the good observer will note several men are being groomed for a role as the new Messiah. The new Messiah will have the lineage of David and Christ. (At least that is what will be said.) Who can say how things will go for this Priest/King? But in the long run it must surely fail, because it is built on the same man-made ideas that have failed before. If this new Messiah doesn't fail, one of his successors will, otherwise thousands of years of historical lessons mean nothing. If people knew history, they would recognize that today's New Age movement is simply a regurgitation of all the ancient superstitions that failed mankind long ago. This is another example of the inadequacies in our media built Frame of Reference.

That certain Jews are involved is one thing. But not all Jews are alike, and this leads us to another question, who is a Jew?

This author has not used the term in the narrow sense that a very Orthodox Jew in Israel might. On the other hand, he has not used it in a way that would please those who might call themselves Jews, based on evidence of the migration of the 10 Israelite tribes. Anyone descended in some way from Jewish heritage gets the label. The descendents of the 10 tribes should be called Israelites anyway. Labels can be very important to people, but it is impossible to please everyone. Likewise, the label Christian is used loosely, as a label for those who claim to be Christian. God is not going to judge people on the basis of labels. For Him there is no stigma attached to being labeled Jewish, nor any benefit to the label Christian. What you actually are is what is significant.

This book is about the misapplication of God's promises to control people to serve a Power. The reader may on his own want to discover what God's promises are, and to whom those promises are made.

THIS BOOK IS NOT ABOUT FEAR

This book is not about fear. Cowards will not read this book. They will return to their ostrich existence afraid to face reality or challenge their world view. The universal religion being brewed up for us is devoid of faith, hope, and love, so it is important to keep people distracted with meaningless entertainment. This religion speaks of a cluster of values and a common fabric of values which leaves out faith in the Word of God. It speaks of evolution. It values what man can do.

This Author has a hope, a faith in the ultimate triumph of good, a triumph man alone can not achieve. And yet what is faith without works. If my neighbor is hungry and I only pray for him, that is not faith. If I am simply going to pray about all this when I can do other things, that is not faith. Faith without works is dead. So I give you this book revealing the struggle between God's value system and man's. This Author is betting on God's.

WHAT this book is revealing is the struggle between God's value system and man's. This Author is betting on God's.

WHAT THIS BOOK IS ABOUT

After telling you what this book is not, ~~it i~~s ~~not~~ about race and it is not about fear, it is time to tell the reader what this book is about.

This book concerns TRUTH and which AUTHORITY we go to for truth. What? Yes, Authority, because unless we replace the lying One-World-Power as our source of TRUTH, we are not going to resist it.

Is there any Authority that stands against the One-World Power?

Those people who view God as an ultimate Authority, are not allowing themselves to be cowed into going along with what they know is evil. God is a rival authority to the One-World-Power and One-World-Religion. Religions have been used by the One-World-Power (you will learn that as you read), so it is not religion per se that is in opposition to the One-World-Power, but those fanatics who believe that there is right and wrong, because they believe in their Creator.

This book is not an attack on individual religious or philosophical beliefs, except where necessary to turn people from the false Authority of the One-World-Power. I say false because when we have attended school, we believed we were being handed the unadulterated truth. When we read our so-called free-press and media we thought we were being handed the unadulterated truth. When we went to our Kingdom Halls, Masonic Halls, our churches and synagogues we believed we were being given the unadulterated truth. It is difficult to swallow that the same Authority that lied to us in the Kingdom Hall, in the Masonic Hall, in the Churches, and in our synagogues was the very same authority. This book's task is to demonstrate what false authority is behind the One-World-Religion and its New Order.

BUT IS THERE ANY CONNECTION BETWEEN GOD & TRUTH?

Science thought so. If it wasn't for the idea of creation by God, science would not have gone out looking for the principles that govern the universe. Science had the notion that a master mind had created this world, and that understanding the Universe was a window on that master mind. The subject of Geometry became sacred, because men realized that the entire Universe can be described mathematically, therefore Geometry was viewed as a window to God's thought processes.

The foundation of Government authority implies so. That men are to be governed implies that good rather than evil should be promoted. That behavior can be classed as good or bad ties into the concept that man sins. The God of the Bible clearly states man sins and is sinful. The concept of sin elevated the Children of Abraham's view of God had over the pagan view of the gods.

Perhaps the reader is protesting that real governments today don't speak of sin, how can their authority be from God?

If sin does not exist, what authority do governments have to tell people how to live their lives.

Because we don't acknowledge that man sins, we end up in a situation like the man in law enforcement who told the Author that there is no such thing as sin. After listening to his view, it was as if there are two basketball teams, the good guys and bad guys; our side are the good guys, the other side the bad. Therefore, he tells me there is nothing wrong for the CIA to bring in and sell drugs in this country. (Yes, he is fully aware they do.) But the bad guys are those guys in the streets selling drugs. This man hates people with rigid beliefs of right and wrong, and understandably so. If he didn't, how could he rationalize his support for the system? Who gives the U.S. government the authority to smuggle in and sell narcotics while at the same time waging a war against drugs?

The framers of the Declaration of Independence recognized the real authority of God (whether they were Christians or not) when they wrote, for the laws of Nature and Nature's God entitle...

The One-World-Power wants no rival. Their mass media is being used as a tool to destroy this rival authority. So much hate has been injected into the public's mindset that many people will not tolerate this book because it holds up God's authority. The public is unaware of the constant bombardment of anti-Christian material spewing forth from the media. The Moslems don't fare much better. Those who are Arabs and Christians are doubly cursed by this bias. As one Lebanese Christian aptly said, We are hated because we are Christians by the Arabs, and hated because we are Arabs by the Christians.

Absolute dominion by God and absolute truth is being subtly replaced by ministers and evangelists, whom you will learn later about in Part 2, with a subjective, false description of God. This is the subtle difference between confessing God is Lord and making God the Lord of your life. It is the distinction between accurate knowledge of God and a subjective, relative emotional belief.

It seems so rigid to believe in the existence of sin. It is. It creates standards. People are being taught to throw out standards. Art and life and other things have lost their meaning. Ancient Israel stood out as a nation because they tried to have standards.

Christians are condemned because they look to a rigid written standard. Yet, this is no different than the Supreme Court, which, after hearing opposing arguments, is supposed to return to the Constitution for their decisions. If it is rigid and reactionary for a Christian to follow a written standard, how should we view the Supreme Court? This is why the Constitution needed to be subverted. This is why President Bush abolished the Constitution with an Emergency Decree while the nation's attention was on Iraq.[8]

Yet, groups to save the Constitution are but a ploy of the Conspiracy. (See Part 2)

The real rival Authority is a Sovereign God that people will obey instead of some New Order Master.

IDENTIFYING THE MARKS OF THE TWO MAJOR AUTHORITIES

As the reader progresses through this book see if you can spot the following differences between the two authorities "the Power (New World Order) and God Almighty (who has left us Scripture).

SCRIPTURE	THE NEW WORLD ORDER
 In favor of honoring one's heritage, family, tribe, & nation	 Against the concept of national identities
 In favor of every man reaching God directly—every man is a priest (priesthood of the believer)	 Against man going directly to God—either he has a hierarchy imposed on him, for he is told to be his own God (misdirected, rerouted) told to look to self for answers.
 In favor of truth and honesty	 Against real truth, has snowed the people with lie upon lie, perverted truth is given out by "free" press
 In favor of sincerity & openness	 Against openess, creates secret societies & secret intelligence cults & hides their new laws from public
 In favor of one truth, one true God, and our responsibility to	 Against having one truth & just one true God (truth that God is supposedly unknowable, relative) Against any real truth, therefore against God & truth
 Calls men to use Scripture for instruction in Godliness	 AGAINST THE SCRIPTURES!!

Several Freemasons were responsible for the design of Washington, D.C. The streets of Washington form the upside-down Pentagram with its point at the White House. Also formed by streets are the satanic goat of Mendes, the Square and Compass, and the Arrow of Ra. The Washington monument is a phallic obelisk and further down is the reflecting pool which from the air is the masonic circle and dot.

Answer to page 2 concerning the pyramids. This Author doesn't know the motive behind each and every pyramid that is made without a capstone, such as each of these. However, the esoteric (hidden) occult meaning is that the light-bearer Lucifer who is the capstone has yet to take his place as world ruler.

The Secret Team: The CIA and its Allies in Control of the World by L. Fletcher Prouty

For nine years this man served as Pentagon focal point officer and CIA military activities were channeled through him. It is very difficult to learn much of what the CIA is doing, any book revealing too much is squelched on grounds of National Security, (ha! CIA security) This book is a blockbuster, not in all that it reveals, which is plenty, but in what it implies. Col. Prouty is an informed ex-participant who gives us a warning.

The Establishments Man by James J. Drummey

This well-written, well-researched book does a good job of exposing George Bush. It is well balanced between appealing to the broad masses and providing good detail for the sincere student of the New World Order. One of the shortcomings of the book is that they do not show that George Bush is only a cog in the big machinery of the New World Order. A little knowledge can be a dangerous thing. It is important to put George Bush in perspective. That is why Be Wise As Serpents is needed by conspiracy investigators. Drummey's book is good, but the reader is encouraged to apply its information in the bigger picture.

person becomes a slave to his own project. This is not the Plan, and if the condition continues uncorrected, physical society will collapse upon the individual, burying him beneath the debris of his own productions.

With the rise of materialism, the Secret Societies were concealed from the profane, not by any elaborate machinery of their own, but by popular disbelief. There was no place for sacred institutions in minds already dedicated to scientific skepticism. The importance of invisible principles over visible purposes and ambitions was simply ignored. Only that small minority which remained true to a higher standard of values continued to be concerned with inevitable outcome. For the majority, the physical world with its wonders was sufficient to absorb all available time and interest. The result is obvious. The physical state of man enlarged, and his ethical horizons were appropriately narrowed.

The old adversaries were gone. The power of the Church and State to plague the destiny of the average man was broken. It was no longer needful to struggle against the despotism of feudalism or the perversities of princes. The Inquisition had lost its terror, and theology was unable to impose its traditional formulas upon a down-trodden laity. But the ills that men must bear changed their appearances, not their substance. The authority of science took the place left vacant by the departing authorities of aristocracy and theology. It was still necessary for the human spirit to struggle against the intolerances of the human mind.

Personal ambitions, liberated by the new code of freedom, immediately began to dream of supremacy. A vast concept, highly competitive in principle and highly destructive in practice, perpetuated most of the instruments of the old tyranny. Siegfried had slain the dragon, but was in grave danger of being drowned in the blood that flowed from the mortal wound. Having overcome the despotism of entrenched classes, humanity discovered the despotism in itself. It was faced with the unhappy realization that tyrannical systems are only symbols of those tyrannical instincts which exist in all creatures until they are overcome by enlightened understanding.

—From Hunt's History of the Seal of the United States

THE REVERSE OF THE GREAT SEAL

Professor Charles Eliot Norton of Harvard described the design thus: "The device adopted by Congress is practically incapable of effective treatment; it can hardly (however artistically treated by the designer) look otherwise than as a dull emblem of a Masonic fraternity." This is one of the important esoteric landmarks that have been conveniently ignored.

It is evident that the continued operations of the genuine Secret Societies make it unwise to describe them or identify their members. Humanity has not yet reached a state of collective security in which leadership beyond the political sphere is unnecessary. The need for guidance actually increases with the complexity of mundane affairs. All of sincere heart find consolation in the conviction that powers beyond and above human corruption continue to administer the destiny of the globe. It would be a mistake to confuse this governing body with the various sects which pretend to authority, but give no indications or proof that they can manage efficiently even their own affairs.

A SECRET GOVERNING BODY CONTROLS THE GLOBE- NOT THE VARIOUS RELIGIOUS GOVERNING BODIES THAT PRETEND TO RULE.

MANLY PALMER HALL, 33°, G..C..

ILLUSTRIOUS MANLY PALMER HALL, often called "Masonry's Greatest Philosopher," departed his earthly labors peacefully in his sleep on August 7, 1990, in Los Angeles, California. Although bom in Peterborough, Ontario,, on March 18, 1901, Brother Hall moved to California in 1919 and devoted his life to lecturing, teaching, editing, and writing on all aspects of Freemasonry.

The author of over 50 books and more than 65 smaller works, Illustrious Hall was also the founder and a past President of the Philosophical Research Society of Los Angeles, California. He is best known for writing The Lost Keys of Freemasonry (1923), The Dionysian Artificers (1926), Masonic Orders of Fraternity (1950) and, of course, his monumental Encyclopedic Outline of Masonic history, philosophy and related subjects.

A member of the Scottish Rite Bodies in the Valley of San Francisco, Brother Hall was made a Mason in San Francisco's Jewel Lodge No. 374 and received the Scottish Rite's highest honor, the Grand Cross, in 1985 because of his exceptional contributions to Freemasonry, the Scottish Rite, and the public good.

Like Grand Commander Albert Pike before him, Ill: Hall did not teach a new doctrine but was an ambassador of an ageless tradition of wisdom that enriches us to "this day. His piety, wisdom, warmth, and humility have touched the lives of millions in America and around the globe. The world is a far better place because of Manly Palmer Hall, and we are better persons for having known him and his wprk.

dent. The theory of freedom could be preserved by Secret Societies, but the practice of freedom required the co-operation of an enlightened people dedicated to a lofty ethical standard.

When evaluating the esoteric groups of this period, the most reliable guide is their acceptance of the responsibility of the Great Plan. Progress is not ordinarily for the advancement of the individual, but for the unfoldment of the universal project. The real Esoteric Schools still labor toward the goal of the World Commonwealth. The Plan remains Utopian, and the disciple advancing through the grades of a legitimate initiate-system is being prepared, not for personal emancipation, but as an instrument for the liberation of his fellowmen. Wherever religious inducements are personal and selfish or the devotee is encouraged to advance his own growth without consideration for others, there is something wrong with the policy of the sect. Yet, the literature of modem metaphysical movements seldom emphasizes growth as responsibility. The reader is encouraged to study mystical systems or to affiliate with organizations claiming extraordinary knowledge in the hope that he will acquire the skill to advance his own condition. Where such objectives are used to intrigue the gullible, those of sincere mind and heart are entitled to reservations.

The old Secret Societies remain as they had always been, custodians of an overconviction. They are now emphasizing the right use of privileges. Education can be conferred by schools and universities, but enlightenment must still result from internal growth. Without the proper development of his superphysical resources, the individual cannot protect his physical rights and privileges. Progress of society always demands that the human being as a person be in advance of the institutions which he creates. When leadership passes to the keeping of external enterprises, the mensity of planetary evil, demonstrated through the destructive war of the past few years (1914-1945), great and permanent good can come; the spiritual Hierarchy stands ready to evoke the good latent behind the work of destruction which has been done, but this can be so only if the goodwill of humanity itself is employed with adequate invocative power. If this goodwill finds expression, two things can occur: first, certain potencies and forces can be released upon the earth which will aid men's effort to attain right human relations, with its resultant effect—peace; secondly, the forces of evil will be so potently defeated that never again will they be able to wreak such universal destruction upon earth.

Years ago I said that the war which may follow this one would be waged in the field of the world religions. Such a war will not work out, however, in a similar period of extreme carnage and blood; it will be fought largely with mental weapons and in the world of thought; it will involve also the emotional realm, from the standpoint of idealistic fanaticism. This inherent fanaticism (found ever in reactionary groups) will fight against the appearance of the coming world religion and the spread of esotericism. For this struggle certain of the well-organised churches, through their conservative elements (their most powerful elements), are already girding themselves. Those sensitive to the new spiritual impacts are still far from powerful; that which is new always faces the supreme difficulty of superseding and overcoming that which is old and established. Fanaticism, entrenched theological positions, and materialistic selfishness are to be found actively organised in the churches in all continents and of all denominations. They can be expected to fight for their established ecclesiastical order, their material profit and their temporal rule, and already are making the needed preparations.

The coming struggle will emerge within the churches themselves; it will also be precipitated by the enlightened elements who exist in fair numbers already, and are rapidly growing in strength through the impact of human necessity.

RELIGIOUS ELEMENTS.

he finds that which he has sought and which has been deeply hidden yet close at hand. He must learn that the experience which 'travel in foreign countries' and the arduous task of the Builder has given, is the only thing that can fit him to join the ranks of the Master Masons of the Universe, and carry on the eternal quest in company with all brothers.

This is the revelation which the passage of the candidate through all the degrees conveys. In the first three degrees we have depicted for us the search of the individual for light, wisdom and life. In the higher degrees there is given us the varying aspects of the universal search (by the collective whole) in the various ways, and in the many lands and through the diverse religions, for the final revelation for which the so-called Blue Lodge has prepared the candidate. Subtle and illusive indications are given also of that organised and intelligent activity which is carried on by that Grand Lodge of Master Masons who have for ages watched over humanity and guided men steadily in the way of light.

Little as it may be realised by the unthinking Mason who is interested only in the outer aspects of the Craft work, the whole fabric of Masonry may be regarded as an externalisation of that inner spiritual group whose members, down the ages, have been the Custodians of the Plan, and as Those to Whom has been committed the working out of the will of God for the race of men. These Master Masons, to whom T.G.A.O.T.U. has given the design and Who are familiar with the tracing board of the G.M. on high, are called by many names and are known at different times by various appellations. They can be referred to as Christ and His Church—that band of disciples who follow in the footsteps and work under the inspiration of the great Carpenter of Nazareth. They can be known by others as the Masters of the Wisdom for They are skilled in the divine ways and have mastered the arts and sciences which Their fellowmen have yet to master. They are the Dispensers of Light and to Them has been given, by virtue of Their achievement, the privilege and the authority to pronounce the great Masonic formula: 'Let there be light' and to evoke the response: 'And there was LIGHT'.

They are therefore sometimes known as the Illuminati and can direct the searchlight of truth wherever its beams are needed to guide the pilgrim on his way. They are the Rishis of the oriental philosophy, the Builders of the occult tradition and those Individualities of outstanding wisdom, strength and beauty of character Who have guided, by precept and example, the faltering steps of blinded and ignorant humanity. They are the bestowers of the privileges and benefits of initiation, and They prepare the candidate for those great revelations and expansions of consciousness which are the reward of all who persevere in the quest, and thus learn to work in the Temple of the Lord. Step by step They guide the candidate until he has gained the right to stand in the East before the Presence, and there, before the brethren, prove himself initiate. Stage by stage They assist at the unfolding of the consciousness of the candidate until the time comes when he can 'enter into light' and, in his turn become a light-bearer, one of the Illuminati who can assist the Lodge on High in bringing humanity to light. Silently and with full understanding They watch the initiate go down to the gates of death in order to prosecute the search for the Master's Word and, in defence of his ideals is slain by those with whom he has worked. Then they too go down to the G ....wherein the Master lies, and through Their united effort and by the strength of Their joint endeavour They raise him to the fullness of life and service, giving him that secret which must suffice to guide him in his search until the time comes when the race (as one united whole) has proved itself fit to receive the true L.W. Then humanity can be admitted to that high and holy Temple where reigns the the Triune God.

The rites, ceremonies and initiations of Masonry may be regarded (and are so regarded by many) as being faint representations and symbolic rehearsals of those major spiritual initiations through which every human being must pass before achieving his goal of manifested divinity and can enter finally within the veil, leaving behind him an example of fortitude and self-control which his fellow men can emulate. It is to be noted also that there has never been a time in the long history church as a teaching factor should take the great basic doctrines and (shattering the old forms in which they are expressed and held) show their true and inner spiritual significance. The prime work of the church is to teach, and teach ceaselessly, preserving the outer appearance in order to reach the many who are accustomed to church usages. Teachers must be trained; Bible knowledge must be spread; the sacraments must be mystically interpreted, and the power of the church to heal must be demonstrated.

The three main channels through which the preparation for the new age is going on might be regarded as the Church, the Masonic Fraternity and the educational field. All of them are as yet in relatively static condition, and all are as yet failing to meet the need and to respond to the inner pressure. But in all of these three movements, disciples of the Great Ones are to be found and they are steadily gathering momentum and will before long enter upon their designated task.

The Masonic Movement when it can be divorced from politics and social ends and from its present paralysing condition of inertia, will meet the need of those who can, and should, wield power. It is the custodian of the law; it is the home of the Mysteries and the seat of initiation. It holds in its symbolism the ritual of Deity, and the way of salvation is pictorially preserved in its work. The methods of Deity are demonstrated in its Temples, and under the All-seeing Eye the work can go forward. It is a far more occult organisation than can be realised, and is intended to be the training school for the coming advanced occultists. In its ceremonials lies hid the wielding of the forces connected with the growth and life of the kingdoms of nature and the unfoldment of the divine aspects in man. In the comprehension of its symbolism will come the power to cooperate with the divine plan. It meets the need of those who work on the first Ray of Will or Power.

The Church finds its mission in the helping of the devotee, in aiding the great public which is innately religious and of good will. It hides in its heart those who vibrate to press themselves, then will there be more intelligent and more useful work offered in cooperation with the Occult Hierarchy.

In the esoteric group, which is composed of the true spiritual esotericists found in all exoteric occult groups, in the church, by whatever name it may be called, and in Masonry you have the three paths leading to initiation. As yet they are not used, and one of the things that will eventuate—when the new universal religion has sway and the nature of esotericism is understood—will be the utilisation of the banded esoteric organisms, the Masonic organism and the Church organism as initiating centres. These three groups converge as their inner sanctuaries are approached. There is no dissociation between the One Universal Church, the sacred inner Lodge of all true Masons, and the innermost circles of the esoteric societies. Three types of men have their need met, three major rays are expressed, and the three paths to the Master are trodden, leading all three to the same portal and the same Hierophant.

It must not be forgotten that only those souls who are on the Probationary Path or the Path of Discipleship will form the nucleus of the coming world religion. It exists on the inner planes for the purpose of gathering out of all the churches those who have reached the point in evolution where they can consciously and of their own free will place their feet upon that PATH which leads to the centre of peace; who can in full awareness turn their eyes upon the Great Lord, and transmute the life of worldly endeavour into the life of service. The first detachment gathered into the coming Church will be found to be a part of the present great band of servers. These have, down the ages, been associated with the Christ in His work. Remember always the fact of the work He did in connection with the last advent, and remember likewise that in the turning of the cyclic wheel, in the evolution of the spiral, similar conditions will eventuate, the same needs arise, and the same egos incarnate that were present in the days of old in Palestine. The numbers of those associated with Him will be greatly increased, for all who knew Him in earlier incarnations in the ancient East, all whom He cured or taught, all who contacted Him or in any way incurred karma with Him or with the Master Jesus, will have the opportunity to cooperate at this time. Each sincere aspirant who is closely connected with the present Church organisations, who feels a close link with the Christ and who loves Him, can be practically sure that in Palestine they saw Him, knew Him and mayhap served and loved Him.

The sacraments, properly understood, serve to strengthen this link and realisation, and such a one as that of Baptism (when entered upon with understanding) will draw forth oft a response from the Great Lord Himself. It is almost as if a golden strand were directed from His heart to the heart of the servant—a strand unbreakable and unfathomable and which, with each administration of any of the holy rites in the succession of lives, becomes stronger, broader and brighter. Eventually these many strands will become reabsorbed into their source when the Body of the Christ—one of the seven Heavenly Men on the second or monadic plane—is completed in full expression, for each one linked to Him becomes, in a vital sense, a cell in His Body. This the initiate Paul truly sensed and knew. Via this strand passes the power to strengthen, to stimulate, to vivify and to bless, and this is the true apostolic succession. All true disciples are priests unto the Lord.

There is no question therefore that the work to be done in familiarising the general public with the nature of the Mysteries is of paramount importance at this time. These Mysteries will be restored to outer expression through the medium of the Church and the Masonic Fraternity, if those groups leave off being organisations with material purpose, and become organisms with living objectives. When the Great One comes with His disciples and initiates we shall have (after a period of intensive work on the physical plane beginning around the year 1940) the restoration of the Mysteries and their exoteric presentation, as a consequence of the first initiation. Why can this be so? Because the Christ, the great love ray, the second Ray of Love-Wisdom. Christ Himself works through it and by its means seeks to contact the vast Christian public. It is the leaven in His hands to leaven the whole lump, and being in a form comprehended by the people, it can touch the great masses of seeking souls.

IN PLACE OF CHRISTIANITY THE MYSTERY RELIGIONS WILL BE RESTORED BY THE CHURCH & MASONRY.

By means of the educational work of the world, the Great Lord seeks to reach those of the intelligent public who cannot be reached by means of ceremonial and symbolism as in Masonry, or by religious means and ritual, as in the Church. It touches the masses and those in whom the intelligence aspect predominates to the lessening of the other two aspects. It aids those men who are predominantly on the third Ray of Intelligent Activity.

In all these bodies there are to be found esoteric groups who are the custodians of the inner teaching and whose uniformity in aspiration and in technique is one. These inner groups consist of occult students and of those who are in direct or occasional touch with the Masters and of those whose souls are in sufficient control so that the will of the Hierarchy may be communicated and gradually filter down to the channel of the physical brain. These groups which constitute the true inner esoteric group are many, but their membership is yet small, for the fact that a student may belong to any of the outer esoteric groups so-called is no indication of his true esoteric status. When the few who are the true esoteric students of the world know the difference between etheric and astral forms, between mental clairaudience and clairvoyance and their astral counterparts, between the elementals of thought and the elementals of nature, then will the Christ and His church have a real esoteric group on the physical plane and the outer organisations receive the needed stimulation. That is why it is necessary to work with the students at this time and train them in the nature of true occultism. When we understand better the significance of time in prevision, and of force in movement, and when we comprehend more fully the laws that control the subtler bodies, and through them therefore the laws that function on the planes whereon those bodies ex-their work be accomplished it is not sufficient that they have the needed vision. This vision must be communicated. It must be extended throughout human society until humanity redeems itself by the experience of enlightenment. The security that the world seeks cannot be bestowed; it must be earned. When a sufficient number has attained this degree of true leadership, the imperishable democracy of the sages will become a fact in the mortal sphere.

The genuine Esoteric Associations always required that disciples prepare themselves for careers of practical service. The student was expected to attain to a state of unusual skill or proficiency in some branch of learning. He was then to practice this profession or craft as a means of extending his sphere of constructive influence. He was to teach through example, enriching his chosen vocation with the overtones of enlightened religious philosophy. Thus, gradually creating a significant zone of influence, he was available for whatever task the Keepers of the Great Plan required. Practical ends can only be achieved by practical means, and the agents of the Universal Reformation must be sufficient for every emergency.

Rather than attempt to indicate modem organizations which may or may not be instruments of the Mystery system, it is more useful to recommend that each truth seeker make use of his own faculties of discrimination. The Esoteric Orders have never accepted candidates without reasonable qualifications, nor have they offered any inducements except the privilege of becoming unselfish, useful, and humble. They have never promised to gratify the whims of mortals, and have reserved the right to select in their own way those whom they believed to have the courage, the insight, and the fortitude which the magnitude of the project demanded. Human society cannot be preserved by Fraternities of the unfit, even though the members be well-intentioned. Suc-

INTRODUCTORY.

In placing the present work before the public I have no apology whatever to offer, and this for several reasons. First, because I have been ordered to prepare it, and Second., because much of what I herein give is not new, for the simple reason that there can be nothing new in Masonry. True, many a thing, especially what concerns Mystic Masonry, has not been given to a profane people, but this is not to say that it is new, for it is not.

I know that the present work will stand unchallenged as to the Truths it contains, and this for the reason that I quote from the highest Masonic authorities in the world, that which concerns Mystic Masonry comes direct from him who knows and who has no superior in his work.

I also know that I will not be accused of stealing, for the very good reason that I give credit for every single quotation, unless it was changed. With these facts before me I can feel well satisfied to let it go forward.

There are several reasons why this book should go before the people, and especially before Masons themselves. Too little is known by my Brother Masons concerning that Order to which they have the honor to belong, but which some of them do not honor and the clares to be the law of Masonry. And this was wisely done, for it is evident that no law less universal could have been appropriately selected for the government of an institution whose prominent characteristic is its universality.

219. "The precepts of Jesus could not have been made obligatory on a Jew; a Christian would have denied the sanctions of the Koran; a Mohammedan must have rejected the laws of Moses; and a disciple of Zoroaster would have turned from all to the teachings of his Zeud Avesta. The universal law of nature, which the authors of the old Charges have properly called the moral law, because it is, as Conybeare remarks, 'a perfect collection of all those moral doctrines and precepts which have a foundation in the nature and reason of things,' is therefore the only law suited, in every respect, to be adopted as the Masonic code."*

220. "So broad is the religion of Masonry, and so carefully are all sectarian tenets excluded from the system, that the Christian, the Jew, and the Mohammedan, in all their numberless sects and divisions, may, and do harmoniously combine in its moral and intellectual work with the Buddhist, the Parsee. the Confucian, and the worshiper of Deity under every form."

the Roman Catholic Church, by the Madonna, is the Mother Principle of every living thing in the universe, and, when a man or woman has their spiritual mind awakened they have a love for everything that lives and breathes, and they look on every object in Nature as the outward manifestation of the Divine Living Principle within. God is in all, and no matter at what Shrine we worship, God is there.

222. "The whole design of Freemasonry as a Speculative science is the investigation of Divine Truths. To this great object everything else is subsidiary. The Mason is, from the time of his initiation aa an Entered Apprentice, to the time at which he receives the full fruition of Masonic light, an investigator—a laborer in the quarry and the temple—whose reward is to be truth, and all the ceremonies and traditions of the order tend to this ultimate design. In Speculative Freemasonry there is an advancement from a lower to a higher state—from darkness to light—from death to life—from error to truth.

223. "The Mason living and working in the world as his lodge, must seek to raise himself out of it to that eminence which surmounts it, where alone he can find divine truth."*

224. "Every Speculative Mason is familiar with the fact that the East, aa the source of material light, is a symbol of his own order, which professes to contain within its bosom the pure light of truth. Aa, in

THE RELIGION OF MASONRY IS A UNIVERSAL RELIGION.

217. "Freemasonry does not profesS to interfere with the religions opinions of its members. It asks only for A declaration of that simple and universal faith, in which men of all nations and all sects agree—the belief in a God and in his superintending providence. Beyond this, it does not venture, but leaves the minds of its disciples, on other and sectarian points, perfectly untrammelled. This is the only religious qualification required by a candidate, but this is most strictly demanded. The religion, then, of Masonry, is pure theism, on which its different members engraft their own peculiar opinions; but they are not permitted to introduce them into the lodge, or to connect their truths or falsehood with the truth of Masonry."*

218. "Every Mason," says the old Charges of 1722, "is obliged by his tenure to obey the moral law." Now, this moral law is not to be considered as confined to the decalogue of Moses, within which narrow limits these ecclesiastical writers technically restrain it, but rather as alluding to what is called Lex Naturae, or the law of nature. This law of nature has been defined by an able, but not recent writer on this subject, to be "The will of God, relating to human actions, grounded on the moral differences of things; and because discoverable by natural light, obligatory upon all mankind." This is the "Moral law," to which the old Charge already cited refers, and which it de-these pearls of great price were guarded and handed on with alight modifications into the possession of those grand early Christians, the Gnostics, the so-called heretics; then straight from the Gnostic schools of Syria and Egypt to their successors, the Manichaeans, and from these through the Paulicians, Albigenses, and Templars to the Hermetics, the Rosicrucians, and other less powerful Secret Fraternities—these Occult traditions, or rather, Occult Truths, have been bequeathed to the Mystic bodies of our own times. Persecuted by Protestants on one side and by Catholics on the other, the history of Mysticism, outside of the Rosicrucian Fraternity, is a history of martyrdom."

123. "These principal streams of religious thought can be traced distinctly as we struggle through the labyrinth of evidence, and these may not inappropriately be termed the Petrine, Pauline, and Johannine doctrines, the last being the fountain-head of all the later Christian Mystical heresies. The Johannine doctrine caused great excitement in the fourteenth century. It must be borne in mind that the true Occultism, the real Mysticism, is essentially religious in its nature, and students must not be surprised to find that some of the historical religious sects—many of the principal secret societies take St. John as their patron saint, notably is this the case with many of the Masonic bodies—had their foundation in Occultism and Mysticism before stated, the Occult doctrines of the Gnostics were heirlooms and sacred traditions from a very distant past, and when the early Christian era dawned, the human ram had long been plunged in the darkening and materializing tendencies of the Black Ages. Soon the Gnosis was rejected by the orthodox church, and the Sacred and Secret teachings of the Great Master, Jesus, become materialized; they have, however, never been lost, and traces of them can be discerned from epoch to epoch.

124. "The Masonic movement, to state it generally, was at first a sort of broad, semi-mystic and largely moral movement, worked from certain unknown, to Them, centers, and deriving its origin from the Ancient and not generally known basis.

125. It never had anything to do with Operative Masonry or the Builders' Guild. Masonry was founded on the Ancient Wisdom Religion, and when founded was not known as Masonry.

126. Its basis was, and is, unknown to all of those who do not recognize a definitely spiritual guidance in the practical, mental, and moral developments which from time to time change the surface by the introduction of new factors into the evolving processes of which life consists. Researches into Masonic literature must be made in many languages and countries before this view can be firmly established for the general world, but to students of Mysticism and who are also students of Masonry it becomes more and more apparent that the movement which is generally termed Masonic had its roots in that true Mysticism which originated, as an Ideal effort, from the Spiritual Hierarchy which guides the evolution of the world; and that, however much the branches may be separated from the root-idea, there is nevertheless a Mystic teaching in Masonry for those who will seek below the surface.

127. "The Ancients of Atlantis preserved not less than sixteen distinct Secret Orders, all of which constituted—what was known at the time of the advent of Poisedon to the Kingdom of Atlantis—as the Mystic Brother or the Great White Circle. What is now the Fraternity of the Rosy Cross was recognized as the very highest of these Orders, by virtue of their knowledge of the Secret Forces throughout Nature. This Order of men ruled the Destiny of nations and all Institutions.*

128. "With the destruction of Atlantis, this perfection of order and organization was severed and history from this event only conveys scattering glimpses of these various Orders—all of which, while preserving some remote impressions of their former relationship, have lost trace one of the other."

129. Says John A. Weiss, M.D., in his "Obelisk and Freemasonry:" "According to our reading of history, the Priesthoods of Belus, or Baal in Assyria, of Osiris in Egypt, of Jehova in Palestine, of Jupiter in Greece and Borne, of Ahura-Mazda in Persia, or Brahma in India, and of Teutates in Britain, were Primitive Secret Societies, who instructed and governed the primitive families and races. It little matters whether we call the members of those priesthoods Belites, Pastophori, Levites, Curetes, Mage, Brahmins, or Druids; they were connected by Secret Ties, and intercommunicated from the Indus to the Tiber, from the Nile to the Thames. Hence there ever has been, is, and ever will be Freemasonry on our planet. Masonry was ever more or less connected with priesthoods till about the thirteenth century of our era, when Masons declared themselves Freimaurer (Freemasons). Since about that period priesthoods have ever denounced and persecuted Freemasonry."

130. "A thoughtful consideration of our principal ceremony irresistibly leads us to the doctrine that was typified by the Pastos in the King's Chamber of the great Pyramid, and connects with the main characteristic of all the Mysteries, which embodied the highest truths then known to the Illuminated ones.

131. "The twelfth century witnessed an outbreak of Mystic symbolism, perhaps unparalleled, in our era, and gave us the religious legends of the Holy Grail, which point to an Eastern origin ; this period coincides with the greatest popularity of the Templars, whose fall is contemporaneous with the decadence noticed "by the lecturer.

132. Without pressing the argument, I may suggest that some portion, at least, of our symbolism may have come through a Templar source, Romanist, yet deeply tinged with Gnosticism; while at a later date the Lollards, inheritors of Manichteism, and who were but one of the many religo-political societies with which Europe was honeycombed, possibly introduced or revived some of these teachings. One thing is certain, that satisfactory renderings of our symbols can only be obtained by a study of Eastern Mysticism; Kabal-earth will then sink down into Duzakh, and become for three periods a place of punishment for the wicked. Then, by degrees, all will be pardoned, even Ahriman and the Devs, and admitted to the regions of bliss, and thus there will be a new Heaven and a new earth."

In the doctrines of Lamaism also, we find, obscured, and partly concealed in fiction, fragments of the primitive truth. For, according to that faith, "There is to be a final judgment before ESLIK KHAN : The good are to be admitted to Paradise, the bad to be banished to hell, where there are eight regions burning hot and eight freezing cold."

In the Mysteries, wherever they were practised, was taught that truth of the primitive revelation, the existence of One Great Being, Infinite and pervading the Universe, Who was there worshipped without superstition; and His marvellous nature, essence, and attributes taught to the Initiates; while the vulgar attributed His works to Secondary Gods, personified, and isolated from Him in fabulous independence.

These truths were covered from the common people as with a veil; and the Mysteries were carried into every country, that, without disturbing the popular beliefs, truth, the arts, and the sciences might be known to those who were capable of understanding them, and maintaining the true doctrine incorrupt; which the people, prone to superstition and idolatry, have in no age been able to do; nor, as many strange aberrations and superstitions of the present day prove, any more now than heretofore. For we need but point to the doctrines of so many sects that degrade the Creator to the rank, and assign to Him the passions of humanity, to prove that now, as always, the old truths must be committed to a few, or they will be overlaid with fiction and error, and irretrievably lost.

Though Masonry is identical with the Ancient Mysteries, it is so in this qualified sense; that it presents but an imperfect image of their brilliancy; the ruins only of their grandeur, and a system that has experienced progressive alterations, the fruits of social events and political circumstances. Upon leaving Egypt, the Mysteries were modified by the habits of the different nations among whom they were introduced. Though originally more moral and political than religious, they soon became the heritage, as it were, of the priests, and essentially religious, though in reality limiting the sacerdotal power, by teaching the intelligent laity the folly and absurdity of the creeds of the populace. They were therefore necessarily changed by the religious systems of the countries into which they were transplanted. In Greece, they were the Mysteries of Ceres; in Rome, of Bona Dea, the Good Goddess; in Gaul, the School of Mars; in Sicily, the Academy of the Sciences; among the Hebrews, they partook of the rites and ceremonies of a religion which placed all the powers of government, and all the knowledge, in the hands of the Priests and Levites. The pagodas of India, the retreats of the Magi of Persia and Chaldca, and the pyramids of Egypt, were no longer the sources at which men. drank in knowledge. Each people, at all informed, had its Mysteries. After a time the Temples of Greece and the School of Pythagoras lost their reputation, and Freemasonry took their place.

Masonry, when properly expounded, is at once the interpretation of the great book of nature, the recital of physical and astronomical phenomena, the purest philosophy, and the place of deposit, where, as in a Treasury, are kept in safety all the great truths of the primitive revelation, that form the basis of all religions. In the modern Degrees three things are to be recognized: The image of primeval times, the tableau of the efficient causes of the Universe, and the book in which are written the morality of all peoples, and the code by which they must govern themselves if they would be prosperous.

The Kabalistic doctrine was long the religion of the Sage and the Savant; because, like Freemasonry, it incessantly tends toward spiritual perfection, and the fusion of the creeds and Nationalities of Mankind. In the eyes of the Kabalist, all men are his brothers; and their relative ignorance is, to him, but a reason for instructing them. There were illustrious Kabalists among the Egyptians and Greeks, whose doctrines the Orthodox Church has accepted; and among the Arabs were many, whose wisdom was not slighted by the Mediaeval Church.

The Sages proudly wore the name of Kabalists. The Kabalah embodied a noble philosophy, pure, not mysterious, but symbolic. It taught the doctrine of the Unity of God, the art of knowing and explaining the essence and operations of the Supreme Being, of spiritual powers and natural forces, and of determining their action by symbolic figures; by the arrangement of the alphabet, were anxious to preserve, among themselves, the knowledge which they had acquired."*

107. "The Dionysia, or Mysteries of Bacchus, were intimately connected with those of Ceres and perhaps, still more with Freemasonry; the rites came from Egypt, and there, according to Plutarch Ceres, was the Egyptian Isia, and Bacchus was Osiris.

108. "The Dionysian artificers or architects were an association of scientific men, who were incorporated by command of the Kings of Pergamus into a corporate body, some three hundred years B. C. They had the city of Teos given to them. The members of this association which was intimately connected with the Dionysian mysteries, were distinguished from the uninitiated inhabitants of Teos, by their Science, and by words and signs by which they could recognize their Brethren of the Order. Like Freemasons they were divided into Lodges which were characterized by different names.

109. "Such is the nature of that association of architects, who erected those splendid edifices in Ionia, whose ruins even afford us instructions, while they excite our surprise. If it be possible to prove the identity of any two societies, from the coincidence of their external forms, we are authorized to conclude that the Fraternity of the Ionian architects and the Fraternity of Freemasons, are exactly the same; and as the former practiced the mysteries of Bacchus and Ceres, several of which we have shown to be similar to the mysteries of Masonry, we may safely affirm, that, in that it would be inconsistent and improper and, therefore, impossible in the light of his understanding and development. Several thousand men and women, among the others who unite with the Rosicrucian Order every year, before becoming Rosicrucian students spend large sums of money in the purchase of such books with the hope of economically and conveniently learning the principles which they believe will produce the utmost benefit in their lives. Such students finally discover that the purchase of these books becomes a costly proposition and that more money can be spent in this way in one year than in several years in the proper manner of study. They find that they receive no benefits but are becoming constantly confused by the differences of opinions on the part of these authors and by the continual issuance of new books with new ideas written to tempt the seeker to continue to buy books in the hope mat his search will eventually come to an end. The more alluring and tempting and the more inclusive are the titles of any of these so-called Rosicrucian books, the surer one can be that the books contain nothing of real value and are designed solely to appeal to the susceptibility of the unguided seeker.

Those books which claim to be an exposition of the Rosicrucian mysteries or a presentation of the Rosicrucian rites and rituals, or of the secret doctrines of the Rosicrucians, are not only misleading in their titles, but deceptive in the claims set forth, inasmuch as such books do not and cannot contain what is claimed for them.

Attention is called to a secdon of the history of the organization published in this book, which explains how and why a number of pseudo-Rosicrucian movements have attempted to carry on the impression of being a part of the Rosicrucian Order by the adoption of misleading names or by simulating emblems while doing nothing more than publishing and selling useless books.* Everyone with common sense will appreciate the fact that a book claiming to be a complete presentation of the secret teachings and secret ritual of the Freemasons, would be unworthy of purchase at any price, for one would know instinctively that the contents of the book could not possibly fulfill the claim made by the title. The same may be said of books dealing with the subject of Rosicrucian philosophy.

to supplant. Hence Free-Masonry, vulgarly imagined to have begun with the Dionysian Architects or the German Stone-workers, adopted Saint John the Evangelist as one of its patrons, associating with him, in order not to arouse the suspicions of Rome, Saint John the Baptist, and thus covertly proclaiming itself the child of the Kabalah and Essenism together."

[For the Johannism of the Adepts was the Kabalah of the earlier Gnostics, degenerating afterward into those heretical forms which Gnosticism developed, so that even Manes had his followers among them. Many adopted his doctrines of the two Principles, the recollection of which is perpetuated by the handle of the dagger and the tesselated pavement or floor of the Lodge, stupidly called "the Indented Tessel," and represented by great hanging tassels, when it really means a tesserated floor (from the Latin tessera) of white and black lozenges, with a necessarily denticulated or indented border or edging. And wherever, in the higher Degrees, the two colors white and black, are in juxtaposition, the two Principles of Zoroaster and Manes are alluded to. With others the doctrine became a mystic Pantheism, descended from that of the Brahmins, and even pushed to an idolatry of Nature and hatred of every revealed dogma.

[To all this the absurd reading of the established Church, taking literally the figurative, allegorical, and mythical language of a collection of Oriental books of different ages, directly and inevitably led. The same result long after followed the folly of regarding the Hebrew books as if they had been written by the unimaginative, hard, practical intellect of the England of James the First and the bigoted stolidity of Scottish Presbyterianism.]

"The better to succeed and win partisans, the Templars sympathized with regrets for dethroned creeds and encouraged the hopes of new worships, promising to all liberty of conscience and a new orthodoxy that should be the synthesis of all the persecuted creeds."

[It is absurd to suppose that men of intellect adored a monstrous idol called Baphomet, or recognized Mahomet as an inspired prophet. Their symbolism, invented ages before, to conceal what it was dangerous to avow, was of course misunderstood by those who were not adepts, and to their enemies seemed to be pantheistic. The calf of gold, made byAaron for the Israelites.was but one of the oxen under the layer of bronze, and the Karobim on the Propitiatory, misunderstood. The symbols of the wise always become the idols of the ignorant multitude. What the Chiefs of the Order really believed and taught, is indicated to the Adepts by the hints contained in the high Degrees of Free-Masonry, and by the symbols which only the Adepts understand...................

[The Blue Degrees are but the outer court or portico of the Temple. Part of the symbols are displayed there to the Initiate, but he is intentionally misled by false interpretations. It is not intended that he shall understand them; but it is intended that he shall imagine he understands them. Their true explication is reserved for the Adepts, the Princes of Masonry. The whole body of the Royal and Sacerdotal Art was hidden so carefully, centuries since, in the High Degrees, as that it is even yet impossible to solve many of the enigmas which they contain. It is well enough for the mass of those called Masons, to imagine that all is contained in the Blue Degrees; and whoso attempts to undeceive them will labor in vain, and without any true reward violate his obligations as an Adept. Masonry is the veritable Sphinx, buried to the head in the sands heaped round it by the ages.]

"The seeds of decay were sown in the Order of the Temple at its origin. Hypocrisy is a mortal disease. It had conceived a great work which it was incapable of executing, because it knew neither humility nor personal abnegation, because Rome was then invincible, and because the later Chiefs of the Order did not comprehend its mission. Moreover, the Templars were in general uneducated, and capable only of wielding the sword, with no qualifications for governing, and at need enchaining, that queen of the world called Opinion." [The doctrines of the Chiefs would, if expounded to the masses, have seemed to them the babblings of folly. The symbols of the wise are the idols of the vulgar, or else as meaningless as the hieroglyphics of Egypt to the nomadic Arabs. There must always be a common-place interpretation for the mass of Initiates, of the symbols that are eloquent to the Adepts.]

"Hugues de Payens himself had not that keen and far-sighted intellect nor that grandeur of purpose which afterward distinguished the military founder of another soldiery that became, formidable to kings. The Templars were unintelligent and therefore unsuccessful Jesuits.

people and subject them by intellectual bondage and servitude to a foreign potentate. That "World Power" is far better organized than we are; is far more numerous than we; is richer, more shrewd, more ambitious, more aggressive, and more unscrupulous than we. It has attacked our Public Schools as being "schools without religion" and intended "to turn the people into refined Pagans." Listen to this by the Rev. Michael Muller: "The object, then, of these Godless, irreligious Public Schools is to spread among the people the worst of religions, the one religion, the religion which pleases most hardened adulterers and criminals—the religion of irrational animals. The moral character of our Public Schools in many of our cities has sunk so low, that even courtesans have disguised themselves as school-girls in order the more surely to ply their foul vocation."

Yet, in some of our larger cities, like Chicago and Boston, seventy-five per cent of the teachers of the Public Schools are members of that "World Power."

Wrapped in the seamless robe of the Savior for which it gambled at the foot of the Cross, that "World Power" comes to us in the name of Jesus, garbles and twists His teaching, and proclaims itself His sole representative on earth. Yet, when it considers itself safe, it throws aside the garb of religion and reveals its true nature as a gigantic political organization, determined to crush individual liberty and freedom of thought, and by superstition, ignorance, and fear, to bring all peoples into subjection to its tyrannic will.

Don't fool yourselves by thinking that the danger is past because as a result of the last election one of its craftiest agents has been taken out of the public service, and a 32° Mason placed in the Presidential Chair. There is danger, and it is very real and near. That "World Power" has_ muzzled nearly all our press. It has captured or poisoned our sources of information.

It is organizing an army of Knights who are sworn to bring our Country to the knees of their Pontiff in humble obedience.

Before "Freemasonry as a World. Power" there looms the inevitable struggle with.... this superior foe-superior in numbers, wealth and strategy. Shall we face the coming conflict like Shakespeare's Hamlet, nerveless and bewailing—

The time is out of joint: Oh, cursed spite
That ever I was born to set it right.

Or, shall we not rather cry, like the English poet, Rupert Brooke, who sailed from Gallipoli to the front and gave up his life for liberty, in the late war:

"Now, God be thanked who hath matched us with this hour!"

We need to face the future with intelligent fortitude, calm faith and resolute wills. Let not the odds against us daunt us. Let us catch the inspiration of that magnificent exclamation of the heroic Fichte:

> I raise my head to the threatening rock, the raging flood, and the fiery tempest, and cry, "I am Eternal and defy your might; break all upon me, and thou Earth and thou Heaven, mingle in the wild tumult; and all ye elements foam and fret yourselves, and crush in your conflict the last atom of the body I call mine, my Will, secure in its own firm purpose, shall soar unwavering and hold over the wreck of the universe!"

Then "Freemasonry as a World Power" will, stand revealed, as unconquered and unconquerable.

Most base is he who, 'neath the shade
Of Freedom's ensign plies Corruption's trade.

WHENCE AND WHITHER?

By C. A. OPPENBORN, 32°

The Masonic Order is held to be the greatest force of constructive initiative in existence

WHAT IS the impelling force that is drawing men in such large numbers to Freemasonry? In an age of progressive endeavor, bristling with inventive and scientific genius, focused continually on bringing to light something of material benefit to the human race; what is there about this great Brotherhood, which had its origin and won many of its laurels in the remotest times of antiquity, that it so universally appeals to men today?

POTENCY AND INFLUENCE

How came men to find the seed for the inestimable Institution of Freemasonry, and the inspiration to generate it to a practical fruition? What gave them the perspective that in its ameliorating cement was to be found the ultimate hope of the world ? What made them, when humanity was still wearing its swaddling clothes, provide the measure for its beneficent bounty? At every hand we come in contact with the workings of the silent potency and expanding influence of its invigorating leaven. Everywhere we behold the magnificent edifices it has in the building, so that the imagination is taxed with wonder and admiration.

With its origin wrapped in the profoundest secrecy, it should not surprise anyone that Freemasonry still is as much of an enigma to many of its initiates as it was in olden times. While the modern mind has become capable of penetrating some of the veils of its deepest mysteries, the fact that it not yet has fully come into the possession of the Grand Arcanum—how its philosophy laid hold on the human and in spite of strenuous persecution maintained an almost unbroken sway of perpetuity during the now silently slumbering ages—should encourage and stimulate in the initiate a thorough mastery of the truths of its scientific formula.

WISDOM TO BE GAINED

While many students of Freemasonry pride themselves of being possessed of the secrets of their Brotherhood, the genuine adept is not so sanguine about having found the kernel of its fundamental philosophy and still is groping for more Light. The true Mason feels that the Institution yet holds unlocked in its majestic bosom from mortal the key to the magnetic charm and suasion that has led so many to and is holding them in contentment at its Altars.

The true Mason feels that, in accordance with its Ancient Formula, Freemasonry only from time to time unlocks as it sees fit, from its storehouse of Wisdom, the Truths required for the human needs and not more of them than can be borne. He has an abiding assurance that its Great Founder never intended that mortality should see Freemasonry in the luster of its full splendor and glory.

Has Freemasonry, then, a spiritual conception only? __ Is its objective but the solidifying into a beautiful Utopia the wonderful Infinity of the First Cause and the kaleidoscopic finiteness of its mortal, human creatures? Is. its mission solely directed to the establishment of the long-heralded and hoped-for Kingdom of the Brotherhood of Man? And has its Founder for these reasons but allowed the human occasional glimpses of some of the inner beauties that ever are sweeping it onward and upward; that ever are dazzling the physical vision from its distant snow-capped elevations; that ever is compel-sole claim to greatness, to recognition, is its past.

Masonry is the "greatest force" for what Masons see as good, & has more than just Utopia and brotherhood in store for mankind.

Masonry's greatness is not in the antiquity of its beginnings, neither in its conservatism, but rather in the fact that it has always been a leader of thought and action.

Its members have been the world's pioneer corps, clearing away the dense growth of ignorance, bridging the turbid waters of superstition and fanaticism, blazing ways of enlightenment whereon the mighty army of humanity...might move to nobler achievements, to grander victories.

The great leaders in Masonry as well as in the secular world have been men who, though clinging tenaciously to certain great principles, were quick to see and take advantage of everything in the line of progress and development. Theirs was no blind conservatism holding fast to a dead past, but a glorious faith in the possibilities of the future, a faith, that, like the star in the East which led the Magi of old to the lowly birthplace of the Redeemer has led mankind under the leadership of many a Moses through the wilderness of pain and travail and bitter opposition into the bright light of twentieth century civilization.

I repeat, a comprehensive understanding of the history of Masonry leads inevitably to the conclusion that not through conservatism has it most served the world, but rather through its spirit of unrest, its utter abhorrence of unnecessary restraint, its abiding love for liberty, its unconquerable desire to progress away from the old to the new and better conditions.

Wherever the conflict has been waged between the old and the new, between a narrow conservatism and real progress, our Masonic brethren have been found on the right side, witness the members of St. Andrew's lodge of the Green, Dragon who threw the tea into Boston. harbor.

We must not be content to abide in the glory of bygone days. There is need today of just such men as have made Masonry great in the past. We cannot rest on our laurels, but following in the footsteps of our sires we must make Masonry of the twentieth century as potent a factor for good as it has been in the centuries that have gone.— Masonic Tidings.

Antiquity Admitted a Century Ago.

An old book published in London in the early part of the last century contains the following in regard to Freemasonry:

"This very ancient society is so called, either from some extraordinary knowledge of Masonry, of which they are supposed to be masters, or because the first founders of this society were persons of this profession. They are now very considerable, both on account of their numbers and the rank they hold in society, being found in every country in Europe, as well as North America; and they consist principally of persons of merit and consideration. They make no small pretentions to antiquity, for they claim a standing of some thousands of years. What the design of their institution is, seems still in some measure a secret.

"The members are said to be admitted into the fraternity by being put into possession of a great number of secrets, called the Mason's word, which have been religiously kept from age to age. In a treatise on Masonry, published in 1792, by William Preston, grand master of the Lodge of Antiquity, the origin of Masonry is traced from the creation. Ever since symmetry began, and bar-

CORRESPONDENCE

Pine Grove, W. Va., May 18, 1922.

The New Age,

Washington, D. C.

Perhaps you do not want to be bothered, but I just sort o' feel, after reading your May number, that you ought to be told that there's one Mason here in the hills who believes you've got the right "dope" in your magazine.

Somehow or other I became a Scottish Rite Mason after I'd somehow or other become a Blue Lodge Man. And somehow or other I got into reading the NEW AGE when it came along—not dumping it into the waste basket. And I don't know whether I agree with it in beliefs or policies or whether it agrees with me. Anyway I go through every number and underline the pointed sentences, and pass them on to my friends, and wait patiently for another month to bring some other good things for thinking Masons.

Here's what I like in the May number: "Many of the new members see no plans on the trestle board for them to work on other than to attend the social features, and comparatively few assist in the conferring of degrees . . . and the tendency seems to be towards taking an active part and interest in all measures that have for their objects the best interests of the land." That's from "A Growing Unrest" under Notes and Comments.

What's the use of building up an organization like Masonry has built up, and inspiring men as Masonry has inspired them, and then leaving the whole stand idle and useless at a time when our country needs just what Masonry can give it? Let's use this great machine.

Yours fraternally,

PAUL BALWANZ.

CATERING TO THE JESUITS ?

The Sacramento Church Federation of Sacramento, Calif., sends us a copy of a letter written to The San Francisco Call, concerning a certain article printed in one of its issues. As it is not at all bad reading we herewith reproduce it. We venture to believe that The Call did not print it.

Editor, "The Call,"
San Francisco, Calif.

DEAR SIR:

In Jane Doe's " Long, Long Trail" in the May 23 Call, occurs, in a reference to the Y. M. C. A. and the Y. W. C. A., these words: "not too much insistence on the word Christian."

There is a world-wide campaign, inspired, we believe, from Jesuit sources, suggesting the elimination of the name of Christ from both these useful organizations, each born of Protestantism. One hears such suggestions in Edinboro, as well as in San Francisco; in Sydney, in London, as well as in New York. Are you unconsciously echoing their propaganda?

The example of Jesus constitutes the very life of both these institutions. A Christian who took The Christ as his model founded the first "Y." Remove the Christ spirit from the "Y" and it will soon degenerate into an institution ossified with materialism, officered by seekers for soft jobs.

You suggest facilitating contacts among mate-seeking young business folk. Do you know that the most successful San Francisco institution of this land is managed by a Protestant Christian Church, that, as a product of its "beau parlors," as its girls call them, have come scores of happy marriages; that this institution, costing about a quarter of a million, was given to San Francisco business women devoutly by its donor, in the name of The Christ, to be administered by His Church?

On the other nand, partly because of the lack of such mating facilities, as you wisely suggest, society has the problem of the unmarried mothers. Do you know that these in Northern California gravitate for protection to another institution, again founded by a Protestant Christian woman, and managed for many years by another, the daughter of a multimillionaire who, in Christ's name, left her life of luxury to care for these poor girls, continuing until she broke down from overwork?

Have you ever dared similarly to criticize a Catholic institution? We venture this question because the Protestant Orphan Asylum of our city was forced, under Jesuit threats to cut off government support, to change its name to "Sacramento Orphanage Farm." Are Protestants found doing such things?

Masons are encouraged to use Masonry makers, for they shall be called the children of God I First be reconciled to thy brother, and then come and offer thy gift at the altar. Give to him that asketh thee, and from him that would borrow of thee turn not away I Love your enemies; bless them that curse you; do good to. them that hate you; and pray for them which despitefully use you and persecute you! All things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye also unto them; for this is the law and the Prophets! He that taketh not his cross, and followeth after Me, is not worthy of Me. A new commandment I give unto you, that ye love one another: as I have loved you, that ye also love one another: by this shall all know that ye are My disciples. Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friend."

The Gospel of Love He sealed with His life. The cruelty of the Jewish Priesthood, the ignorant ferocity of the mob, and the Roman indifference to barbarian blood, nailed Him to the cross, and He expired uttering blessings upon humanity.

Dying thus, He bequeathed His teachings to man as an inestimable inheritance. Perverted and corrupted, they have served as a basis for many creeds, and been even made the warrant for intolerance and persecution. We here teach them in their purity. They are our Masonry; for to them good men of all creeds can subscribe.

That God is good and merciful, and loves and sympathizes with the creatures He has made; that His finger is visible in all the movements of the moral, intellectual, and material universe; that we are His children, the objects of His paternal care and regard; that all men are our brothers, whose wants we are to supply, their errors to pardon, their opinions to tolerate, their injuries to forgive ; that man has an immortal soul, a free will, a right to freedom of thought and action; that all men are equal in God's sight; that we best serve God by humility, meekness, gentleness, kindness, and the other virtues which the lowly can practise as well as the lofty; this is "the new Law," the "WORD," for which the world had waited and pined so long; and every true Knight of the Rose + will revere the memory of Him who taught it, and look indulgently even on those who assign to Him a character far above his own conceptions ar belief, even to the extent of deeming Him Divine.

Hear Philo, the Greek Jew. "The contemplative soul, unequally guided, sometimes toward abundance and sometimes toward barrenness, though ever advancing, is illuminated by the primitive ideas, the rays that emanate from the Divine. Intelligence, whenever it ascends toward the Sublime Treasures. When, on the contrary, it descends, and is barren, it falls within the domain of those Intelligences that are termed Angels. . . for, when the soul is deprived of the light of God, which leads it to the knowledge of things, it no longer enjoys more than a feeble and secondary light, which gives it, not the understanding of things, but that of words only, as in this baser world. . . ."

"... Let the narrow-souled withdraw, having their ears sealed up! We communicate the divine mysteries to those only who have received the sacred initiation, to those who practise true piety, and who are not enslaved by the empty pomp of words, or the doctrines of the pagans. . . . "

". . . O, ye Initiates, ye whose ears are purified, receive this in your souls, as a mystery never to be lost! Reveal it to no Profane! Keep and contain it within yourselves, as an incorruptible treasure, not like gold or silver, but more precious than everything besides; for it is the knowledge of the Great Cause, of Nature, and of that which is born of both. And if you meet an Initiate, besiege him with your prayers, that he conceal from you no new mysteries that he may know, and rest not until you have obtained them! For me, although I was initiated in the Great Mysteries by Moses, the Friend of God, yet, having seen Jeremiah, I recognized him not only as an Initiate, but as a Hierophant; and I follow his school."

We, like him, recognize all Initiates as our Brothers. We belong to no one creed or school. In all religions there is a basis of Truth; in all there is pure Morality. All that teach the cardinal tenets of Masonry we respect; all teachers and reformers of mankind we admire and revere.

Masonry also has her mission to perform. With her traditions reaching back to the earliest times, and her symbols dating further back than even the monumental history of Egypt extends, she invites all men of all religions to enlist under her banners and to war against evil, ignorance, and wrong. You are now her knight, and to her service your sword is consecrated. May you prove a worthy soldier in a worthy cause!

Religious Organisations in the New Age

Let us now return to our consideration of the spread of the deepened religious ideals and the growth of the new religious organisms. In the process of transmuting the old form and so releasing the imprisoned life, there are two things which are steadily held in view by the Guides of our evolution:

First, that the general public serves or is dominated by the concrete mind and is unable to grasp abstractions. It is the form which matters to them the most, for they are conservative and cling to the familiar. The church is intended to serve the masses and is not intended to be of use (except as a field of service) to the esotericists of the world, for they heed not the form to the same extent, having contacted somewhat the inner compelling life.

Secondly, the church movement, like all else, is but a temporary expedient and serves but as a transient resting place for the evolving life. Eventually, there will appear the Church Universal, and its definite outlines will appear towards the close of this century. In this connection, forget not the wise prophecy of H.P.B. as touching events at the close of this century. This Church will be nurtured into activity by the Christ and His disciples when the outpouring of the Christ principle, the true second Coming, has been accomplished. No date for the advent do I set, but, the time will not be long.

The Christian church in its many branches can serve as a St. John the Baptist, as a voice crying in the wilderness, and as a nucleus through which world illumination may be accomplished. I indicate the hope. I do not assert a fact. Its work is intended to be the holding of a broad platform. The church must show a wide tolerance, and teach no revolutionary doctrines or cling to any reactionary ideas. The

The Outline of a Church Universal shall appear by the end of the 20th century.

Chapter 1.2

PILLARS OF MYSTERY

Three items you will learn in this chapter:

- In the last chapter's documents Freemasonry, the Church and Education were said to be the three vehicles to bring in the One-World-Religion which is the "Universal religion" of Masonry. You will learn more about Freemasonry's role.

- You will learn about the secret Masonic bodies that rule our lives. Plus you will receive an overview of some of the other Masonic organizations.

- You will find out how Jews played an important initial part in the early Masonic Lodges.

THE PLAN TO BRING IN A ONE-WORLD-RELIGION

Alice Bailey in her writings, especially the book The Externalisation of The Hierarchy quite openly spells out The Plan to bring in a New Age One World Religion.

Alice Bailey needs no introduction to followers of the New Age Movement. Her 24 New Age books, her organization Lucis Trust (originally named Lucifer Trust), her Arcane School, and the Findhorn community in Scotland (started by her disciples Peter and Eileen Caddy and Dorothy McLean) are present-day reminders of the immense impact she and her 32° Mason husband had on the New Age Movement.[1] She is credited with starting over one hundred New Age groups. She worked for the Dept. of Health, Education, and Welfare in 1958 setting up educational goals, and her writings were used in the new Globalism 2000 curiculum (already tried in some areas) and soon-to-be used across the board in the US public schools.

Alice Bailey started the Arcane School to teach New Age disciples the principles of the Plan to bring in the New Order. The Arcane School is located in Europe and America, and headquartered in New York City. A major part of this Plan is for mankind to recognize the Spiritual Hierarchy of the planet. This Spiritual Hierarchy is headed by the Spirit Being Sanat Kumera (the first name is a scrambling of the name Satan), and helped by the Great White Brotherhood. Her writings were given to her by the same Great White Brotherhood that Masons, like Manly P. Hall (33°) , say direct Masonry. Other New Age leaders, for instance Elizabeth Clare Prophet in her book The Great White Brotherhood in the Culture History and Religion of America, also believe the Great White Brotherhood has been controlling religion. Various Rosicrucians claim to be guided by the Great White Brotherhood too.[2]

THE EXPECTATIONS FOR MASONRY BY NEW AGE LEADERS

According to Alice Bailey, the Masonic movement will be the religion of the New System. Benjamin Creme, another big New Age leader, also believes Freemasonry with a revitalized Christian Church will be the religion of the New Age.[3] Lola Davis, another New Age leader, also sees Freemasonry as the New Age Religion (Dark Secrets of the New Age, p. 273).

Bailey wrote in 1957, "The Masonic movement... is the custodian of the law; it is the home of the Mysteries and the seat of initiation. It holds in its symbolism the ritual of Deity, and the way of salvation is pictorially preserved in its work. ... It is a far more occult organization than can be realised, and is intended to be the training school for the coming advanced occultists. In its ceremonials lie hid the wielding of the forces connected with the growth and life of the kingdoms of nature and the unfoldment of the divine aspects in man."

"... when the new universal religion has sway and the nature of esotericism is understood-will be the utilisation of the banded esoteric organisms, the Masonic organism and the Church organism as initiating centres. These three groups converge as their inner sanctuaries are approached. There is no dissociation between the One Universal Church, the sacred inner Lodge of all true Masons, and the inner-most circles of esoteric societies."

There the reader has it, the Universal Churches of the One-World-Religion such as the universal churches of the Baha'i, the mysteries of the Masons, and the occult (esoteric societies) are not disunited. And this comes from one of the most powerful New Age leaders in the recent past.

MASONIC ASPIRATIONS

But would the Masonic Lodge want to the centerpiece of the One-World-Religion and an initiation center?

•In the Masonic Ritual during the opening ceremonies for the 31st degree of the Scottish Rite the Masons pray,

" Hear us with indulgence, O infinite Deity ... Let the great flood of Masonic light flow in a perpetual current over the whole world and make Masonry the creed of all mankind."

•The Italian Masonic Constitution, almost identical to the original Masonic Constitution of Anderson of 1723, states in Article 6 "It [Italian Masonry] proposes to itself as its first object to unite all free men in one vast family, which may and ought to take the place of all Churches. . .thereby to constitute the true and only Church of Humanity."[4]

Albert Pike, 33°, was one of the greatest Masonic leaders.[5] Articles praising Pike abound in official Masonic publications.[6] His book Morals and Dogma, written in second half of the 19th century, reveals the expectation of esoteric groups to become the world's leaders, "...the World will soon come to us for its Sovereigns and Pontiffs. We shall constitute the equilibrium of the Universe, and be rulers over the Masters of the World." (Morals and Dogma, p. 817, referring to the goal of esoteric groups.)

For many this may be shocking. Why would Masonry be the religion of the New Order, and appoint its religious leaders (pontiffs) when it doesn't claim to be a religion?

Freemasonry, the Church of Scientology, the Watchtower Society (Jehovah's Witnesses), the Theosophical Society, the Maharishi's Transcendental Meditation Heavenly Communities are all similar in that they strongly deny that they are religions. It is standard practice for many groups of the New World Order to protest to the public that they are not a religion. Yet each of these groups repeatedly contradict that, by declaring at other times that they are in fact a religion. Masonry not only functions as a religious institution, its leaders have quietly declared it is a religion. (See chapter 1.17 for proof on this.) And not only is it held to be a religion, but the true religion encompassing all truth. Further, Masonry is not passive in waiting for its leadership role to happen, it is militant.[7]

HAS FREEMASONRY BEEN UNDERESTIMATED AS A WORLD RELIGION?

At least one Masonic author writing to Masons felt that Masonic religious power had been underestimated. He writes,

"In the past Masonry has been condemned as a shallow substitute for religion. This the Masonic body has always denied but in fact the new age revitalised Masonry will be a paralleling evolutionary way of man's approach to God, and Masonry and religion will gladly cooperate." --The Spirit of Masonry, p. 129

O.K. We've seen that some of the most prominent leaders of the New Age movement plan for Freemasonry to be the future One-World-Religion. We've also seen a few (of the many quotes available) where Masons declare their desire for Masonry to be the creed of mankind. But can they do it? or is this just bravado and talk?

How the Masons have done it is the subject of this book. Chapter 2.12 will examine specific sets of plans to bring in a New World Order with its One-World-Religion. Unit two will examine denomination by denomination, sect after sect and expose how Masonry controls a vast diversity of groups. The diversity is but only an appearance. Unfortunately, we have tended to look at the superficial outside, rather than the inside substance. This book may change your life in regards to that.

Freemasonry is a front for the Power, but it also is a major part of their power. To illustrate this point let us look at the manned- mission to the moon Apollo. We'll develop the story enough that the significance of the final point will be appreciated.

THE SPACE RACE

In 1960, Pres. John F. Kennedy tugged on the emotional heart strings of Americans, "We are in a strategic space race with the Russians, and we have been losing...But we cannot run second in this vital race." Kennedy challenged the nation to land a man on. the moon by the end of the decade.

And so America was rushed into a race to the moon. It seemed forgotten that the moon had been around for a long time, and would continue being there for a long time, even if man didn't get there by the end of the decade.

U.S.-U.S.S.R. COOPERATION

This Author is not going to try to document this next paragraph. To do so really is another book. But if the reader is aware of the US-USSR cooperation it clears up a long list of anomalies. The reader can do with it what he pleases, but what if this paragraph is true? First, . the interested person can learn about the U.S. technology that our leaders have quietly given the Communists over the years, such as nuclear weapons by reading Anthony Sutton's well-documented books. F.D. Roosevelt's own son, James Roosevelt, wrote a book alleging FDR sent Russia the plans and materials to build an atomic bomb. The officer in charge of Lend-Lease to Russia during W.W. II states this in a book too. In recent years, the various cultural and scientific exchanges are even being publicly reported.

One area of cooperation that is extensive and has been for many years is between the CIA and the KGB. Both of these agencies feud like siblings, and both are honeycombed with double-agents, triple-agents, Airier. Communist CIA agents, etc., it is rather impossible to develop a clear picture of where loyalties are of particular individuals. In fact, it may be harder to see the overall picture for those closest to the scene, because these agencies are so segmented that people work in offices unaware that other secret offices ajoin their own rooms, and unaware of people working in secret only a few feet away. It is the epitome of Orwell's 1984. And the process is that Big Brother of the New World Order controls the world and works through the MI6, MI5, the CIA, the KGB, and Moussad. However, that is a hefty concept to swallow, so the reader is welcome to disbelieve it, and to put that on the back burner. It is only mentioned to serve as an introductory background thought to the next item. (The topic will be picked up again in chapter 2.7).

THE SOVIETS PROVIDE HELP

The Soviets gave the American leaders the reason to go to the moon. The Soviets played their role well. They continually gave mixed signals as to their intentions.

For instance, on Oct. 15, 1968, Russia's top scientists denied Russia was interested in going to the moon. On Nov. 23, 1968 Tass declared that Zond 5 and 6 were test flights to precede a manned flight to the moon and back.

Such statements greatly enhanced NASA's sales pitch, that if we did not go to the moon, the Russians would. Thanks to the Russians, few people in the U.S. opposed the Apollo program.

One day the Russians would deny interest and then the next day would come some statement like, "The Soviet Union is preparing to launch its most spetacular manned space flight by dispatching shortly at least two, and probably three, men on a circumlunar flight,..."

Rocketry is a sophisticated science. The U.S. leaders knew that the Russians were strapping several small rockets together in a hazardess fashion, and that they were not far out in front of us technologically, but inferior. (How could they be ahead of us? We were supplying them with much of the technology, just as we had for years. The examples are endless. One example is the chassis of the feared W.W.II T-34 Tank was American technology.) Going to the moon is such an involved process that it is not believable that our intelligence agencies did not have a fix on where the Russian space program was. Either, they did have a fix on it and our leaders lied, or, they didn't know much if anything about the Russian space program.

Recently, the Russians have displayed a craft they say they built to go to the moon. Only one model of it was built. However, building such a model, and actually having the technology to send men to the moon are two different items.

(The Space Program actually serves purposes that are entirely different from its cover. That is material for another book.)

Next, it is eye-opening, because supposedly according to our President, whoever got their flag and men to the moon first was to be considered the leader of mankind on earth.

The point this Author is making is simply that the Russian threat, which was blown out of proportion, helped NASA sell its space program to the public.

Informed critics of the Apollo program tried to point out how on a scientific basis, unmanned spacecraft are far less expensive and will yield far more scientific information. A case in point, is the relatively inexpensive Surveyor spacecraft series which took thousands of close up lunar pictures and made soil analyses of the lunar soil.

THE MEDIA COVERUP

The media and NASA cooperated to keep a lid on the public's awareness of the level of risk for the Apollo astronauts. Safety features and calls from NASA technicians were ignored in order to meet self-imposed deadlines. Critics claimed that the fatal accident of Apollo 204, could easily have been avoided if safety concerns had been listened to.

However, a Senate Committee on January 30, 1968 reported after the fatal Apollo 204 accident which killed three astronauts, that the end-of-the-decade "Moon landing was necessary because the schedule is an essential and significant management tool."

The critics of the Apollo program who railed about the terrible odds and lack of safety features were suppressed, and are now silent because the Apollo program gambled against the odds and actually won. Critics had claimed that the manned moon program was "an arbitrary goal" and that there was "no logical next step" beyond landing men on the moon. They were correct in terms of the public-known space programs, yet the glory of the Apollo program and its success silences their reasoning. So why bring up their moot criticism?

Because it is being established for the reader how much the manned space program, which took money away from possible unmanned programs, was actually motivated on the basis of national pride and not scientific research.

The lives of many brave American astronauts were recklessly played with so that the world could marvel at Americans planting the American flag on the moon. But America wanted that glory. Some of the NASA scientists got antcy, because so much precious lunar time was spent on the first lunar mission, Apollo 11, just "raising" the flag. They were more concerned with learning scientific data than pomp and ceremony. Americans wouldn't trade that glory for more moon dust, or for more knowledge of the lunar surface. They were proud to get their flag to the moon first.

It seems then that with so much hoopla and pride, with so many billions spent to achieve that great feat, with so much danger given to our brave astronauts that America would not want to share the glory of the moon landing. It would seem that it might be disconcerting to some Americans to learn that the Masonic flag got to the lunar surface at the same time the American flag did. The Masons tied for first flag to the moon. Yes, taxpaying Americans spent billions of dollars to get the Scottish Rite's flag to the moon first.

Most people I have mentioned this to have seen the significance of this. Then others say, "So what if the Masons got their flag to the moon first?" Our President Kennedy answered that one. He said that whoever got their flag to the moon first was to be considered the leader of mankind on earth.

There are other interesting aspects to this. How ironic it is that the organization that sponsored and got the first Communist Internationale going was given such a big privilege by a supposedly anti-communist U.S. space program. Communism's sponsoring organization during the 1860s was the Masonic Lodge.

H.G. Wells, who has ties to Freemasonry, and was a Fabian Socialist, prophecied that men would land on the moon. Masons have held H.G. Wells up as a "prophet" in their official Scottish Rite publication. The One-Worlders seemed to have a interest in insuring his forecast and plans would happen.

H.G. Wells felt that the New World Order would rule because it controlled the air and sea ways. Indeed today they do dominate it completely.

For instance, his book The Shape of Things To Come, on p. 11 advises us that "...during the struggles and changes in world government that went on between 1980 and 2 059, at which date the Air Dictatorship, properly so called, gave place to that world-wide Modern State."

He also calls the Air Dictatorship a different name "the new World Council". "The new World Council, which is known also as the Air Dictatorship..."(p. 348)

In A Modern Utopia, p. 67, H.G. Wells tells us that this Air Dictatorship's Utopia will be "Bacon's visionary House of Saloman." And in the following pages he foresees that some of this Utopia's methods will use Plato's thinking.

The Air Dictatorship's air power was demonstated in the book The Shape of Things to Come and the film based on it, in the same manner that George Bush demonstated the New World Order's air power in Iraq. The parallels are interesting.

Is it proper to call 33° Mason George Bush's New World Order an Air Dictatorship?

•In 1991, when Iraqi Scud missiles were launched Air Force Space Command Defense Support Program missile-warning satellites provided stereo data on the Iraqi Scuds within seconds of their launches.[8] Within 12 0 seconds the underground facility in the Rocky Mountain, which is full of computers, had received the data and determined what to do. The commands would be relayed in seconds back to the Patriot missile crews in Saudi Arabia or Israel which then would figure the last minute tragetories and launch their Patriot missiles.[9] The reaction time would be in a matter of something like 6 minutes from the time the scuds were fired until the Patriots were launched. Is that air power?

•The government admits that its spy-satellites can read license plates and newspapers from outerspace. When describing intelligence capabilities it usually understates its capabilities. Imaging satellites beam their intelligence down to the Air Force/CIA at Fort Belvoir, VA. In the future if the Air Dictatorship wants to turn its attention to control you, it could conceivably watch your house from space, and follow you going out to your car, and track your car electronically. A description of one of the spy satellites:

"The 20m-long 13t KH-lls fly in pairs. Sun-synchronous orbits so that a first pass over a particular site is followed three hours later by the second craft. Each sports solid state CCD arrays for multi-spectral imaging via a 2m-diameter mirror and, although its 250km perigees that contribute to its 1,000-day lifetimes limit resolution to around 30 cm, the digital imagery is really manipulated and available to analysis within 90 min. This rapid response was the essential ingredient in attempting the rescue of the hostages in Tehran's U.S. embassy in 1980..."[10]

Yes, the satellites are like a pair of eyes in the sky which can be used for directing military operations. Satellites have also been used in law enforcement in the United States. Is that not air power? Can't our New World Order today properly be called an Air Dictatorship?

The significance that Bacon's House of Saloman (Solomon) is also describing this same World Order (this Air Dictatorship) will be seen as we examine some more about what the Masonic Lodge is and its history.

Few people inquire about the Masonic temples that dot the map. Some of those that were curious have told this Author what they were told by the Masons. They were given such bland answers as the following that this author has collected: the Masonic lodge functioned as a. a place where men play cards, b. a Christian organization c. a fun and games fraternity that does benevolence work. (A club that plays cards got their flag to the moon first?)

Masons and their wives have gotten upset with this Author, when merely the implication is made that Masonry has secrets . When one friend, who is still a Mason, gave slight criticism of the lodge to his mother (who was the wife of a Mason) , he was essentially disowned. His mother is in Eastern Star also. In other words, generally Masons will not suffer the slightest criticism or exposure of their organization without hostility, even if it comes from another Mason.

Masons have instantly hated this Author when he has made some very simple statements, such as the Masonic Lodge has secrets. They declare adamantly that they have no secrets. Christians who listen to them repeat this line.

This Author has pursued the Truth from the beginning to the end of this research. To weave fiction into the momentous message of this book would only detract rather than enhance the message.

TWO BEGINNING ITEMS OF MASONRY ARE A STORY IN A NUTSHELL

Two items tell much about the Freemasons by themselves. These two items occur before anyone becomes a Freemason. They tell a story in a nutshell.

First a petition by each candidate is made in the standard form supplied by the Lodge requesting " ... that I may be initiated into the mysteries of Freemasonry ... " It can be shown from many Masonic sources that the Mysteries of Freemasonry are the Mystery religions, and the initiation is an initiation into those mystery religions.

Second, an oath on penalty of a gruesome death is made that the candidate will not reveal any of the secrets of Masonry and will deceive those on the outside as to what goes on in the lodge. That this is carried out, can be easily shown by Masonic articles which discuss such deception. And if that were not enough proof, it is attested to by the testimony of men who quit practicing such Masonic deception.

MASONRY REPEATEDLY CLAIMS TO HAVE A DIFFERENT TRINITY THAN CHRISTIANS.

What is the Holy Trinity that early Masons talked about?

Mackey in his History of Freemasonry & Concordant Orders, p.771 states, "Masonry does ...not teach the 'Trinity in Unity' as Christians understand it; furthermore, it does not teach that T: G: A: 0: T: U: is Immanuel, the God with us, the Christ. Templary is called the Masonic Christian Order, but modern Masonry is not Christian."

DECEPTION

The great pontiff of Masonry, Albert Pike, has had his words on page 819 of Morals and Dogma often quoted. He states there that lower degree Masons are intentionally deceived and whoever tries to undeceive them will labor in vain because the first degrees are convinced they have the true explanations.

As most people, including most Masons themselves do not know what the deep secrets of Masonry are, they are not in a position to know whether Masonry has any secrets.

Deception itself has many forms. Peceptions management is adroitly used by the Masons not only to deceive outsiders as to their true goals and intentions, but also to deceive many of the Masons, who are supporting a structure that unbeknownst to them is destroying what they believe in. The impact of Masonic disinformation and smokescreens in extensive.

In the C.S. Lewis' Screwtape Letters, the novice demon is taught how to convince others he doesn't exist. Likewise, the Masons who worship Lucifer and/or knowingly know the Masonic machinations to control the world find that they are likely to find more unwitting accomplices than actual hard core occultists in favor enthroning Lucifer.

On the one hand, they must expose what they really are about to get those recruits who will give themselves over to their evil designs. Yet on the other hand, they must conceal their true face to the majority. By filtering the candidates through a series of degrees, the ones who will serve Luciferian (Satanic) goals can be identified.

Those who control power over the world benefit from the general population's reluctance to admit the possibility of ugly realities. The general method of thinking is to attribute to these men motivations common to the common man, such as fair play, national interests, human decency, and honesty. Perhaps the best book on the mind-set of those who secretly rule the world is Lindsey Williams' Syndrom of Control. Lindsey Williams, who rubbed shoulders with some of these men, studies how the mind-set of power is in a different realm than the common person. Think power, control, and money. Think of men who believe they are special, and that destiny has called them to Lord it over the world.

The Christians are manipulated to fight each other. The various nations pretend to feud with each other, concealing the fact they are puppets on strings with the same Master. The democrats and republicans feud with each other, when the real power has nothing to do with their pretended power struggles. Many straw-monsters are created, and pretended power struggles, and senseless conflicts, simply to mask the steady growth of the one-world-power. This strategy is taught in military colleges as Divide and Conquer.

Our self-deception is one of the One-World-Powers best allies.

MANY REFUSE TO ADMIT MASONIC DECEPTION

When the profane non-Masonic world uncovers some Masonic ritual, or Masonic act, then the uncovering is taken as proof that there was no deception. "Why [supposedly] was there no deception? Because the world was able to uncover things." Obviously such thinking believes we are only deceived when we are unaware that we have been deceived. This thinking can be summed up, We have never found anything that the Masons have successfully covered up. And because we have been able to discover things, then there must not have been a serious attempt to hide things.

HOW EASY IT IS TO DECEIVE

Our self-deception is one of the Power's best allies.

The truth simply needs to be suppressed, and fictions embellished somewhat to fool most people. For instance, suppress the actual figures of how many Masons are in government positions, and embellish fictions of how many anti or non-Masons are in government. Masonic statements to such effect don't mention how those non-Masons allowed in government still fit into their plans and power structure. Grand Orient Masons are not on the rolls of American Lodges, although they are Masons. Masons pretend to the public that those Americans with only European lodge memberships are not Masons. Further, a man bought off by the Masons is just as much theirs as one who is a member but they can say he is not a Mason. Or again, suppress the actual figures of Jewish involvement in the Masons, and stress the fiction of anti-Jewish lodges. Or again, suppress the actual figures of Jewish Masonic involvement with Communism, and stress the fiction of anti-Semitism in Russia. The show case propoganda in communist countries of anti-semitism works well to hide the overwhelming figures of Jews within the communist power structure.

Still, this Author's experience is that many Christians would rather listen to men who have repeatedly sworn to deceive than to read what the Masons actually teach. Why? It is discomforting to them to disturb their secure feeling in this present system. They don't want to learn that their present system is an elaborate myth, concealing and insulating the world power from anything that might oppose it.

The Mason Rev. Dr. William Dodd in a speech to brother Masons to open a new Masonic temple in 1794 traced Freemasonry from "the first astronomers on the plains of Chaldea, the wise and mystic kings and priests of Egypt, the sages of Greece and philosophers of Rome." Whether or not this would be historically correct if one looks from 1794 backward in Masonic history, it clearly shows that even in 1794 the Freemasons did desire to identify themselves with the Mystery Religions of the ancient pagans.

Let us examine one Masonic deception- that their organization was or is Christian.(See chapter 1.17 for more on Masonic deception.) Recently, Episcopalian theologian Dr. Morey wrote a book declaring Freemasonry's origin and early history to be Christian. Today, Masons are still leading people to believe it is a Christian institute. Morey's book has been in Christian book stores. According to Morey, his book is popular with Masons, and is to be advertised in a Masonic magazine. This Episcopalian Theologian with Masonic friends, says that his permission to visit the best Masonic library was because the Masons were blinded just like when Brother Andrew went into Communist countries. He says they never once asked in weeks of his research who he was. Indeed, they opened up locked documents and made suggestions as to what he could see.[11] This Author and others have repeatedly been told by official representatives of the Scottish Rite that no-one except Masons with special permission are allowed to use such libraries. This Author and others know that they do ask who people are. They don't just allow anyone in. Also in this Author's research experience almost everywhere he has researched at, i.e. at Public Libraries, the Patent Office, etc., he has experienced numerous requests for I.D. or his signature. The reader can draw his own conclusions, but it is the opinion of this Author that it is highly possible the grossly misleading research of Morey's book, was a setup, aided by his Masonic friends who asked their library to play dumb, break the rules, and assist (guide) this research. There are other suspicious items about the book, but it will take time to follow them up.

THIS BOOK'S MESSAGE- AMAZING BUT TRUE

Yes, I agree Be Wise As Serpents conclusions sound outrageous AT FIRST. But after the reader is aware of this book's contents though, then the testimony of those who have confided to this Author of their paricipation in the conspiracy of the major religions to bring the One-World-Religion will be seen to be credible.

AN INTRODUCTION TO THE VARIOUS GROUPS

It is true that there are several centers of power upon the earth. However, these groups have made alliances and together create the New World Order. A One-World-Government already exists. Even though the world is ruled by a secret world government, the world has not willingly consented to this. H.G. Wells, who spent his life planning how this One-World-State would come into power and function, fully expected today's situation in his timetable, "The World Council was in effective possession of world power, but not in unchallenged possession. Even in 2000 C.E., nineteen-twentieths of mankind were still unassimilated to the organization. If the world was not rebellious it was mutinous, and there were plenty of alert and intelligent people in opposition, ... to the reconditioning of human affairs on Modern State lines. "[12]

The reader is familiar with how two royal blood lines can be joined by marriage, to produce a new royal blood line containing both lineages. This principle has been used a great deal in creating the unified One-World-Government of today.

The Black Nobility is a group of nobility that traces back to the Roman Emporers. Many of the royality of Europe belong to the Black Nobility. The Knights of Malta are one of the Black Nobility's secret orders. The Order of the Knights of Malta helps continue the cohesion of the Nobility as a group. This Black Nobility have formed an alliance with two major groups, the Jewish blood line of the House of David, and the group of International Bankers who are practicing Satanism. The merging of these three groups has created a unity called the New World Order. A host of other organizations are built upon this nucleus. Freemasonry is one of the fundamental ones.

The Jewish blood line (considered to be not only the House of David but to contain the Royal blood line of Jesus) has been preserved by the secret order the Prieure de Sion.

The Satanists have been actively working through groups that are illuminized. There are groups are called the Illuminati. There are also individuals (usually at the head of gnostic religious groups--see chapter 1.3) who are Illuminati. One main Rosicrucian group is called the Church of Illumination.

The three groups- the Black Nobility, the Satanists, and the claimed Blood Line of Jesus- have an outer group of about 500 men who assemble once a year. This group is nicknamed the Bilderbergers. Although the heads of some of the largest newspapers attend, and their meetings are newsworthy, the media do not cover their supersecret meetings. (More about the Bilderbergers in chapter 2.12.)

The center of power geographically recides in Great Britian.[13] That does not mean New York, Zurich, Rome, Paris and Moscow, etc. aren't important. These cities also are centers of their power.

Through a vast number of organizations the world has been brought under their control. Some of their organizations like the Boy Scouts or the Order of the Antelope[14] play little part in the control of humankind and their construction of a one-world-religion. While others like the Order of the B'nai B'rith and the Order of the Skull and Bones play major roles. The One-World-Power has used and is using foreign cults and secret societies that Americans rarely hear about like the Hung and Triad secret societies in China, and the Tenri Kenjukai in Japan.

As a reference to help the reader get started a list of some major groups is now provided. (This author has files on hundreds of organizations and sects. The number of religous groups and secret fraternal organizations, and New Age organizations started by the One-world-power is simply fantastic. See chapter 2.9. for a chart showing some.)

the Order of B'nai B'rith- Although its strictly Jewish membership is not secret anymore, the inner workings at the top are. It's purpose is to organize, unify, and direct the Jewish people. It also directs Christian clergymen and Freemasons at times. Its militant arm is the JDL and ADL. It also has Hillel and some other all-Jewish organizations included in its membership. Although it claims to represent all jews, it has promoted the liberal "Reformed" Jewish movement. The Order has around 500,000 members and 3,500 local lodges.

the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn- An illuminated Satanic group that worked with the German Thule Society, related to the O.T.O. Reportedly directed by the Rothschild family. (See chapter 3.3) This was a branch of the Masonic Societas Rosicruciana in Anglia. Many groups developed from the Golden Dawn including Stella Matutina (Morning Star). The Morning Star is Lucifer.

Grand Council of Allied Masonic Degrees (AMDGC)- The council controls the various allied degrees. It works fourteen degrees: Royal Ark Mariner, Secret Monitor, Knight of Constantinople, Grand Tyler of Solomon, Red Branch of Eri, Ye Ancient Order of Corks, and other degrees. It's subordinate groups are called councils.

Grand Orient- This is a type of Masonry which is almost global, but based in Europe. It is blatantly occultic, and sponsors revolutions. It maintains strong ties with all the other branches of Masonry incl. British Masonry. The French Grand Orient is the mother lodge directing other G.O. in other countries. Funds for the assassination of the Archduke in 1914 travelled from Paris to Rome between the Grand Orients on behalf of the Alliance Israelite Universelle.[15] the Group- Based at Oxford University, this group's initiates form part of the Illuminati's British elite.

Jason Society- A branch of the Order of the Quest, this secret group is extremely powerful in the United States. Some of its men sit on MJ-12, the body that rules the United States for the New World Order.

Jesuits, the Society of Jesus- This is the Catholic branch of the Illuminati. Black masses are performed at the higher levels. Only the higher echelons are aware of the Illuminati contacts. There are about 28,000 Jesuits worldwide. They have been primary agents to change Christianity into Marxism through Liberation Theology.

Knights of Malta- This order preserves the cohesion of the "Black" nobility, the European aristocracy that dominated Europe for many centuries, the head family traces itself back to the Roman emperors. Not all Knights of Malta members have connections to the Black nobility though, only about half of the 10,000 members are Black nobility. (Another Black nobility group in Europe is the Club of Rome with a small select group of about 75.) Typically, U.S. Govt.envoys to the Vatican are Knights of Malta.

Mizraim Rite (of Freemasonry) and the Prieure de Sion (Priory of Zion)- These two closely related groups are guarding the lineage of a future messiah to rule the world. The Mizraim Rite is almost exclusively jwish. The Prieure de Sion is primarily in Scotland, Britian, U.S., Canada, and France. France has about 43 members, of the 9,731 members. The Prieure de Sion is divided into the Legion (charged with the Apostolate) and the Phalange (charged with the guardian of the tradition.) The Prieure de Sion has nine levels of initiation.

Palladium Rite- A secret rite that extends globally. This super-rite is sold out to Lucifer and controls Freemasonry behind the scenes. Both men and women are members. Its triangles (lodges) are in the major cities.

Independent Order of Oddfellows- This group is designed for the lower classes and minorities. Because its members are not often in powerful positions, it functions less as a powerhouse fraternity than does Freemasonry, but places more emphasis on the occult for the lower levels.

Order of the Quest- This is the group in charge of preserving their plan for world domination. (The name used here for this order is the one Manly P. Hall used for it, it-- like other groups-- most likely it has an esoteric name also.) Several groups mentioned in this list play important roles for the Order of the Quest.

Scroll & Key Fraternity- Based at Yale, this is a secondary group which also provides some leadership for the Illuminati along with Wolf's Head.

Skull & Bones Order (Russell Trust)- Based at Yale, this group is one source of American leadership. It is part of the larger "Brotherhood of Death." Exactly 15 members are added each year. (Previous to 1860 the number initiated varied.) There are about 600 active members currently. In the last 150 years about 2500 Yale graduates have been initiated into this super-secret society. Some members, perhaps exceptions, have been initiated away from Yale. Most are descended from the early Puritan families, and are tied to the Unitarian/Universalist movement. These older S&B families have formed blood alliances with wealthy families such as the Rockefellers. (See Chapter 2.3)

Thule Society- Based in Germany, this group was the primary German Illuminati group prior to W.W. II. This Society recruited German leaders including Adolf Hitler who they placed in charge of their Nazi party. Their symbol was the swastika, which was then also used by their daughter organization the Nazi party. Saturn was an important god, so their lodges met on Saturday. It was associated with the Prussian Freemasonic Lodges which were opposed to the western or Jewish Masonic lodges.

York Rite Sovereign College (the YRSC)-- A partial supreme council for the York Rite, organized into at least 57 colleges. Membership is by invitation only, and the insignia of the order is the pentagon. It's has an annual "General Assembly", and headquarters in Detroit, MI.

SELECTIONS FROM MASONIC HISTORY

The following pages will discuss selected aspects of the history and development of Freemasonry and related groups. These selections will help you to understand the story of the New World Order.

THE PRIEURE DE SION PLAYED AN IMPORTANT LEADERSHIP ROLE IN THE EARLY MASONIC LODGE SYSTEM

The St. Clair Charters of 1601 and 1628 are interesting. William St. Clair, who was part of the Prieure de Sion, and a descendent of the St. Clairs of Roslin was given the right to govern the Masons.

[FIG. 6 Charles Radcliffe Pasteup 3.25 x 2.5]

HOW THE PRIEURE DE SION STARTED THE SCOTTISH RITE

Charles Radclyffe was the Grand Master of the Prieure de Sion from 1727-1746.[16] "It is probable that Scottish Rite Freemasonry was originally promulgated, if not indeed devised, by Charles Radclyffe."[17] It seems also most likely that Charles Radclyffe was one of the "unknown superiors" (likely the head one) of a German nobleman Baron Karl Gottheif von Hund[18] (1722-1776) who is well known to have created the Rite of Strict Observance.[19] According to von Hund a Grand Master of a super secret order authorized him to start the Rite of Strict Observance. The Rite of Strict Observance entered France in 17 58 under the name of Council of the Emperiors of the East and West, and three years later authorized Stephen Morin to take the rite to the four corners of the earth.[20] With his Charter of Authority Morin went to Jamaica where he initiated the Jew Moses M. Hayes. Hays went to Charleston, SC. The Rite that Hays established had only the 25 degrees that Von Hund had offered.[21] The Rite of Perfection is now known as the Scottish Rite, and in around 1802 the authorization was given to allow Masons to progress in eight more degrees.[22] Another early branch of the Rite of Perfection had 32 degrees, and this contradiction was eventually worked out. The result is that Scottish Freemasonry has 32 degrees for most worthy Masons to achieve, with 33 special men chosen to an advanced 33 degree. In addition to this numerous men are made honorary 33° Masons. The Scottish Rite Lodges are still referred to as the Rite of Strict Observance.

The Prieure de Sion recruits it own special ones from the upper reaches of the Scottish Rite. After the Scottish Rite men can procede to the Rite of Mizriam, which also has ties to the Prieure de Sion. The upper grades of the Scottish Rite are the lower degrees of the Prieure de Sion, according to M. Jean-Luc Chaumeil, a man who had contact with the Grand Master of the Prieure de Sion and was familiar with that Society.[23] Also according to Jean-Luc Chaumeil, whose knowledge of the Prieure de Sion is obviously of merit and worthy of attention, the Prieure de Sion is generally Jewish but a few non-Jewish members are admitted.[24]

Why would a man like Chaumeil leak information about this powerful Jewish society which is claimed to guard the holy blood lineage of King David and Jesus Christ? Because the time is close when the most powerful "Jews" in the world plan to reestablish a King-Priest to rule the world. People must be given a chance to believe in this purported blood descendent of Jesus Christ. In order to legitimatize their story, they have orchestrated a complex series of "leaks", which has revealed the existence of their Order and its antiquity. Whether their story line that they have guarded the royal blood line is true or not, it has enough truth in it to fool most people. It is and will be one of the best orchestrated hoaxes of history. By uniting both the Christians and Jews behind this Messiah, they can rule the world with the religious blessings of the masses. Now the reader begins to see the significance, that the present day Pope is Jewish, a Freemason, and working with the Prieure de Sion.[25]

FREEMASONRY & THE HOUSE OF DAVID

The Prieure de Sion is specifically tied to the blood line purported to be of Jesus of the House of David. The various orders of Freemasonry also relate to the lineage of the House of David.

For instance we learn from 33° Mackey, "So that now almost all the symbolism of Freemasonry rests upon or is derived from the "House of the Lord" at Jerusalem. So closely are the two connected, that to attempt to separate the one from the other would be fatal to the further existence of Masonry. Each lodge is and must be a symbol of the Jewish Temple; each Master in the chair a representative of the Jewish king; and every Mason a personation of the Jewish workman."[26]

In the big book Masonic History of the Northwest written by some past Grand Masters we are told,

> "In the English organization of the Chapter the presiding officer is the Prince and heir to the Jewish throne, ZERUBBABEL (being descended in the direct line from King Solomon), and as such represents the King, though nominally a tributary Prince, first under the Persian King Cyrus and afterward Darius....by reason of the war of the Revolution for American Independence, caused the word Royal to be looked upon with disfavor by patriotic American Masons; and, as Oliver, the English Masonic historian, truly says in his 'Historical Landmarks.':
> 'Our transatlantic Brethren,[Americans] impelled probably by a dislike to royalty, have deposed Zerrubbabel from the first chair and place the High Priest in his place, giving the King only the second throne, which is evidently erroneous; and they have also greatly injured the force of the illustration of the triple office of the MESSIAH, by substituting a scribe for a prophet in the third chair."[27]

Masons have looked forward to the Jewish goal of rebuilding the Jewish temple. It is a theme repeatedly pushed in the Masonic temples. An example of this is the Scottish Rite article by 33° Mason Charles L. Bachtel entitled "Where Is King Solomon's Temple". "Until the arrival of the day when the Temple is located and reconstructed for the use of all mankind, we should carry the symbol of the Temple in our hearts."[28]

JEWISH PARTICIPATION WITHIN THE EARLY MASONIC LODGE

Because there has been such a powerful coverup of the role Jews have played in Freemasonry, this subject must be dealt with. The Reformed Rabbi Gotthold Saloman wrote that Freemasonry was more a Jewish movement in origin than Christian. However, as is so often the case today, Jews can say things about themselves which if Gentiles, the Goy, say the same thing, then the non-Jews are in serious trouble.

The initial formation by four Masonic lodges in 1717 of the first public Grand Lodge, included several Jewish Masons as participants. These were Marranos Jews (Jews converted to Christianity) and included Mendez, de Medina, Alvarez, and Baruch.[29] In other words, Jews were there from the start. A look at the seals of the various Masonic groups in England in the 18th century reveals a Jewish or magical influence. (See illustrations of early Masonic seals with the Star of David, etc.)

Many books, including Morey's recent one, portray the American lodges as anti-Jewish. This is a smokescreen. The only Grand Lodge that was really anti-Jewish was the Prussian Grand Lodge which eventually transformed itself into the Thule Society and then into the Nazi Party. The reason that the Prussian Lodges became concerned in the early 19th century about Jewish control of Freemasonry could be a book in itself, but was based on several items, 1. being close to the several radical Jewish movements in Poland and the German States the Germans were more aware of what was taking place, 2. in Germany warnings were given by ex-Masons and Masons, 3. German authors like Johann Christian Ehrmann in 1816, Eduard Emil Eckert (Der Freimaurer-Orden in seiner wahren Bedeutung, c. 1850), and Georg Michael Pachtler to name a few wrote books warning the Germans about Freemasonry and the power of Jews within the lodges.

A close examination by reliable Masonic, Jewish, and other sources reveals that the Jews have indeed played an important part in the Masonic lodges since their beginning. A person today will witness for instance such things as the Feast of Tishri observed by for instance the Arkansas Lodge of Perfection.[30]

SECRET DENS OF ANTI-CHRISTIANITY

The first early lodges in the various European nations of Scotland, England, German states, and France built upon a number of existing organizations. Various secret societies were built upon. Although it is beyond the scope of this chapter to explain Masonry's early history, it will be found in the Knight's Templar groups, in the secret societies of Europe and the Middle East (including the Order called Roshaniya, the Assassins, & Sufism), the Rosicrucians, the Prieure de Sion, the Mystery Religions (including the evolution of the Mazdains to Mithraism to Manicheanism to Freemasonry), witchcraft, and Platonic humanists and philosophers.

Not only were the Masonic Rites formed from the early secret societies, but the secrecy of the Lodges encouraged and provided a forum for men of all types of anti-Christian persuasions, including - but not limited - to the Jews. John Robison, a Mason and a leading intellect of his day, exposed the conspiracy of Illuminized Masonry to take over the world and destroy Christianity in 1789.

After decades of working closely with these men and listening to them in the Lodges he writes about the activities of these men, "...although in direct opposition to a standing rule, and a declaration made to every newly received Brother, 'that nothing touching the religion or government shall ever be spoken of in the Lodge.' But the Lodges in other countries quickly followed the example of France, and have frequently become the rendezvous of innovators in religion and politics, and other disturbers of the public peace. In short, I have found that the covert of a Mason Lodge had been employed in every country for venting and propagating sentiments in religion and politics, that could not have been circulated in public without exposing the author to great danger. I found, that this impunity [freedom due to Masonry's secrecy] had gradually encouraged men of licentious principles to become more bold, and to teach doctrines subversive of all our notions of morality..."[31] "...under the protection of Masonic secrecy, they planned schemes... they formed associations in opposition to the... superstitions of the church....The church dreaded the consequences, and endeavored to suppress the Lodges. But in vain.... the rigours of the church only seved to knit the Brethren [Masonic Brethren] more firmly together...The Lodges became schools of skepticism and infidelity, and the spirit of conversion or proselytism [to spread Masonic Dogma] grew every day stronger. "[32]

Robison found in his attendence of Masonic meetings that even some of the Church officials like the Prince Bishop of Liege at the Loge de la Parfaite Intelligence mocked and attacked the church in his talks given at the Masonic Lodge and this while many of the other Lodge members were dignitaries in the church.[33] This type of thing is still continueing. Today some of the most important "Christian" ministers who are Masons have only contempt for Christianity once they have the Lodge's secrecy to talk.

The Standard Jewish Encyclopedia states, "Early European Jewish settlers in the U.S. were amongst the most enthusiastic masons and the...first lodge in Newport, R.I....[was established by them]".[34] Indeed, the St. John's Lodge of Newport was one of the first lodges in the colonies.[35]

Charlestown, S.C. became a "capital" or a nerve center of Freemasonry for a number of reasons. The city of Charlestown, S.C. had the largest Jewish population of any U.S. city in 1800.[36] It was also an early strong point for the Unitarian church whose congregation originated in Charlestown in 1772.[37] Further, Charlestown was a cosmopolitan commercial center with strong French ties. (The Rite of Perfection came from France to Charlestown via the West Indies.)[38] The Scottish Rite's Sublime Grand Lodge of Perfection was created in Charlestown in 1783. Also the Order of Palladium (the Palladium Rite) had been started soon after 173 0 in Charlestown.[39] (The significance of this last point will been seen later.)

One of the original founders of the Mother Supreme Council, Scottish Rite, at Charleston, S.C. was Abraham Alexander. Abraham Alexander was the chazan (reader) for the Bayh Elohim Jewish Congregation,[40] and later a Rabbi.[41]

Another Jew involved in founding the Scottish Rite at Charleston was Moses C. Levy. He was a man of great learning who became the president of the Bayh Elohim congregation.[42]

The Inspector General appointed by the Grand Consistory of Princes of the Royal Secret to oversee Masonry in the British colonies in the New World was Stephen Morin, a Jew. Morin was joined by the Jewish Mason Moses M. Hays in Jamaica. Moses M. Hayes established the Sublime Lodge of Perfection in Boston, Mass.[43] The Jewish Mason Abraham Da Costa worked with Morin to establish Masonry in Charleston, S.C.[44] They set up the King Solomon Lodge. Morin forged Frederick the Great's signature on his Masonic documents to gain credibility. Another Jewish Mason, Isaac Dacosta, in 1758 working with Moses M. Hayes established the St. Andrew Lodge in Boston, and helped out in S. Car. Dacosta helped establish the Charleston Lodge of Perfection, and served as one of its Grand Masters. Joseph M. Meyers, another Jewish Mason was his successor.[45] The Jew Moses Cohen, who was originally initiated into Masonry in Philadelphia, was one of the first members of the Mother Lodge in Charleston.

From the two mother lodges in Boston and Charleston, S.C. came many of the Scottish Rite lodges.[46] Charleston, S.C. would also be known as the cradle of Reformed Judaism. Interestingly, the Jew Isaac Harby who fathered Reformed Judaism in Charleston is called "Pallas Athena" in the Jewish author Max Dimont's book The Jews in America, (Simon & Schuster, 1978), p. 93. The significance of this will be discussed soon.

And Charleston, S.C. would be the place the Civil War conflict began. Mason Brig. Gen.Beauregard ordered the first shots on Fort Sumpter.

One other prominant Jewish founder of the Mother Supreme Council, of the Scottish Rite was Israel de Lieben, a prosperous Jewish merchant.[47] And yet another Masonic merchant who participated in establishing the Mother Supreme Lodge, believed to be Jewish and having a monopoly on the world's Indigo (purple dye) trade, was Moses Lindo.[48]

SUMMARY OF JEWISH FOUNDERS OF THE MOTHER SUPREME LODGE

So far we have mentioned a few of those Jewish Masons who were involved with the founding of the Mother Supreme Lodge in Charleston, S.C. (there were other Jewish Masons): Abraham Alexander, Abraham Dacosta, Isaac Dacosta, Moses Cohen, Moses C. Levy, Israel de Lieben, Moses Lindo, Joseph M. Meyers, and last but not least Stephen Morin. (This explains why this Author slightly winces when he hears the oft said remark that the Jews had nothing to do with early Freemasonry.)

A quick overview of the eleven founders of the Supreme Council 33rd degree of the Scottish Rite:
Rabbi Abraham Alexander (33°)-Jewish
Emanuel De La Motta (33°)-Jewish
Israel De Lieben (33°)-Jewish Moses Levy (33°)-Jewish
Dr. Isaac Auld (33°)-Presbyterian
Dr. Frederick Dalcho (33°)-Episcopalian
Dr. James Moultrie (33°)-Scot who studied at the University of Edinburgh, Scotland de Grasse (33°)-French aristocrat active with Grand Orient Masonry
Jean B. Delahogue (33°)-Frenchman
Mitchell & Bowen (both 33°) -two men born in Ireland.[49]

Hezekiah Levy, a Jewish Mason, was one of the earliest members of the Fredericksburg Lodge No. 4 to which President George Washington would join.[50]

Jews played prominant roles in the lodges in America and Europe. For instance, the English Grand Lodge's Coat of Arms was designed by Jewish Mason J.J. Leon Templo.[51] In 1717, when Anderson's Constitution began to be drawn up, the Constitution not only included parts of Egyptian and Pythagorian thought, but also included the two pillars Jachin and Boaz which derive from Jewish Rabbinical tradition concerning Solomon's temple.

The German Jewish Mason Moses Mendelsohn (1729-1796) was a friend of the Mason philosopher Kant and was himself a very famous philosopher. He has been called the "German Socrates." He wrote a metaphysical book Abhandlung uber die Evidenz in den Metaphysichen Wissenschaften.[52] Another Jewish Mason, Karl L. Reinhold, was also a philosopher and friend of Kant. He published Letters on the Philosophy of Kant, and the book The Hebrew Mysteries or the Oldest Religious Freemasonry. This later book explains that Moses got his religious system from the Egyptians, and that Freemasonry derives from that lineage. Remember, that Moses practiced magic.[53]

Many of the Lectures of the Sublime degrees contain an epiteme of the arts and sciences, and in their hisory many valuable and important facts are recorded, obtained from authentic archives in the possession of our society, and which, from the manner of their communication can never be mutilated or corrupted. This is an object of the first magnitude in a society whose principles and practices should be invariable? Much variety and irregularity has unfortunately crept into the Blue degrees, in consequence of the want of Masonic knowledge in many of those who, preside over their meetings, and it is particularly so with those, who are unacquainted with the Hebrew language, in which all the Words and Pass-Words are given. So essentially necessary is it for a man of science to preside overs Lodges that much injury may arise from the smallest deviation in the ceremony of initition, or in the Lectures of instruction. We read in the book of Judges, that the transposition of a single point over the Sbeez; in confequence of a national, defect among the Epharimites designated the Cowans, and led to the slaughter of forty-two thousand. The Sublime figure of the Divinity formed in the Fellow-Crafts degree, can be elegantly illustrated, only by those who possess some knowledge of the Talmud. Most of the Words in the Sublime degrees are derived from the Chaldean Hebrew and Latin languages.

The various tranflations which the Symbolic degrees have undergone since their first establishment, from one language to another, and that; oftentimes by men illiterate even in their mother tongue, is another cause of the variety which we lament. Not so the superior degrees, they appear in that Sublime dress which their founders gave them; skilled in science and embellished by genius. Many of the Sublime degrees are founded on the polite arts, and unfold a mass of information of the first importance to Masons.

Although many of the Sublime degrees are in fact, a continuation of the Blue degrees, yet there is no interference between the two bodies. Throughout the continent of Europe, and the West-Indies, where they are very generally known, they are acknowledged and encouraged. The Sublime Masons never initiate any into the blue degrees, without a legal warrant obtained for that purpose from a Symbolic Grand Lodge; but they communicate the secrets of the Chair to such appllicants, who have not already received it, previous to their initiation into the Sublime Lodge, but they are, at the same time informed, that it does not give them rank as Past Masters in the Grand Lodge.

The Sublime Grand Lodge, sometimes called the Inessable Lodge or the Lodge of Perfection extends from the 4th to the 14th degree inclusive which last is the degree of Perfection. 16th degree is the Grand Council of Princes of Jerusalem, who hold jurisdiction over the 15th degree, called Knights of the East, and also over the Sublime Grand Lodge, and is to them, what a Symbolic Grand Lodge is to the subordinate Lodges. Without a warrant and Constitution regularly issued by them, or by an higher Council of Inspector, they are deemed irregular and are punished accordingly. All the degrees above the 16th are under the jurisdiction of the supreme Council of Grand Inspectors General, who are Sovereigns of Masonry. When it is necessary to establish the Sublime degrees in a Country where they are unknown, a Brother of the 29th degree, vhich is called K. H. is appointed Deputy Inspector General, over the district. He selects from among the Craft such Brethren as he believes will do honor to the fociety, and communicates the Sublime degrees to as many as is necessary for the first organization of the Lodge, when they elect their own officers, and govern themselves by the Constitution, and warrant which is furnished them. The jurisdiction of a Lodge of Perfection, is twenty-five Leagues.

It is well known that about 27,000 Masons accompanied the the Christian Princes in the Crusades, to recover the Holy land from the Infidels. While in Palestine, they discovered several important Masonic manuscripts, among; the descendants of the ancient Jews, which enriched our Archives with authentic written records, and on which, some of our degrees are founded.

In the years 5304 and 5311, some very exraordinary discoveries were made, and occurrences took place, which renders the Masonic History of that period, of the highest importance. A pe-, riod dear to the Masons heart, who is zealous in the cause of his Order, his Country and his God.

A New York Jewish Mason Haym Saloman (1740-1785) helped finance the American Revolution for the Americans, and was noted to have given financial aid to many of the revolutionary leaders including Jefferson, Madison, and Randolph. Arrested by the British, he somehow got free and escaped to American lines.[54]

While the Jewish Mason Saloman financed the Americans, the Jewish family of the Rothschilds (who participated in secret societies) were making large sums of money from the American Revolution due to their banking arrangements with the Elector of Hesse, who rented German troops to the German British Monarch to fight the Americans.

ONE OF THE EARLY POWERFUL FREEMASONS

A very famous Jewish Mason, born in Boston to descendents of the Puritan tradition is Benjamin Franklin. His father and mother were Josiah and Abiah Franklin. Benjamin Franklin contributed to the Mikveh Israel Jewish congregation in Philadelphia.[55] But Franklin did not practice Judiasm. He did practice the occult, and things that would be weird to Christians. He became the head of the very occultic Grand Orient Freemasons when he was in France. Franklin's life was surrounded by Freemasons. Franklin's role in the establishment and promotion of Freemasonry is overwhelming. His role in the destruction of Christianity is quite unknown.

Franklin's career as a Freemason is shrouded in mystery. This Author has in his library the somewhat rare book Benjamin Franklin as a Freemason by Julius Sachse (J.F. Sachse is the last of a line of Sachses in the World Order.) This leading Masonic scholar writes, "To write the history of Franklin as a Freemason is virtually to chronicle the early Masonic history of America....A great difficulty, however, here confronts us, notwithstanding the prominence of FRANKLIN in Pennslyvannia Freemasonry; strange as it appears, he does not mention a word of his Masonic connections or career in his Autobiography, or in any of his correspondence, with but two exceptions, so far as known. This omission is the more remarkable when we look at his Masonic career while in France during the later years of his life. There, his activity and intimacy with the Brethren was intimate and close, both personal and official, FRANKLIN taking an active part in their proceedings, even advancing to the so-called higher degrees."[56]

In spite of all his many duties, Benjamin Franklin was "never absent from a [Masonic] meeting."[57]

The Masonic Lodge played such a big role in Franklin's life, and yet Franklin never even hints about Freemasonry in his autobiography. The editor of his autobiography points out that Franklin tried to portray an unreal persona in his autobiography, but one that Franklin felt people would want to emulate.[58] If Masonry is so virtuous, one wonders why it plays no role in his autobiography which was written on purpose to create an image worthy of emulation.

Benjamin Franklin was the founder of the American Philosophical Society.[59] He was also a Rosicrucian.[60] In Feb. 1730, it appears he was initiated into St. John's Lodge of Philadelphia.[61] And in 1727, he started the secret revolutionary political society called the Leather Apron Club which changed its name in 1731 to Junto, and took on the appearance of being a literary society.[62] The same year that this "literary" society changed its name, the St. John's Masonic Lodge that Franklin belonged to got in touch with the Grand Lodge of London whose Grand Master the Duke of Norfolk appointed Daniel Coxe. Daniel Coxe advised the Masons when he arrived of a plan for the federation of the colonies.[63] In 1754, while deputy Grand Master, Franklin unveiled at Albany, NY to his brother Masons his plan to unite all the colonies under one government.[64] Albany was the site of one the earliest Scottish Rite's Lodge of Perfection.

Between Jan 21, 1769 and Jan. 21, 1772 a series of inflamatory letters called The Letters of Junius, which were written in England, were circulated through out the American colonies. The letters advanced those causes that the colonists would declare to be the causes of their revolution, human rights, freedom of the press, and taxation without representation. The letters were read by Franklin and many of the Masons who initiated the American Revolution. The man who wrote these letters according to his niece, was the Reverend James Wilmot (1726-1808) a Mason and rector of Barton-on-the-Heath, in Warwickshire in 1785. He also was the first person to publicly name Bacon as the author of Shakespeare's works.[65] He also apparently was in contact with the Lodge of Nine Sisters in France that Franklin would join in 1777.[66]

"Historians have never ceased to wonder at the enormous psychological influence which Franklin exercised in colonial politics. But up to the present day, few indeed are those who have realized that the source of his power lay in the secret societies to which he belonged and which he was the appointed spokesman."[67]

Independence Hall which became the famous center of the Revolution was built by the Masons. It is believed by some that the Mason Benjamin Franklin layed its cornerstone, others say it was another Freemason instead.

(For more on the American Revolution, the Masons, and what the history books are lacking see chapter 3.4)

BENJAMIN FRANKLIN & RELIGION

Some of Franklin's Masonic brothers in France were impressed by the rituals, etc. that he thought up for a new religion.

Turning our attention to a different aspect of Franklin's, in a statement of beliefs Franklin states, "I conceive then, that the INFINITE has created many beings or Gods... It may be that these created Gods are immortal; or it may be that after many Ages, they are changed, and others Supply their Places."[68]

Not only were Franklin's beliefs not Christian, but in the later years of his life all the Christian standards were violated, so that it is really a travesty of honest reporting, that Franklin is held up by so many as a role model for Protestants. The distortions in the popular history books about Franklin are but a microcosm of the distortions that history books in general suffer from.

FRANKLIN'S MOTHER'S CONCERN

His mother was very concerned that he had joined the Freemasons, and strongly objected. In diplomatic double-talk he advised her not to worry about what she didn't know about. "As to the Freemasons, unless she will believe me when I assure her that they are in general a very harmless sort of People; and have no principles or Practices that are inconsistent with Religion or good Manners, I know no Way of giving my Mother a better Opinion of them than she seems to have at present (since it is not allow'd that Women should be admitted into that secret Society)... I must entreat her to suspend Judgment till she is better inform'd,..."[69] To paraphrase--So Mom I can't tell you anything more, but don't judge until you're well informed about us.

THE ROSICRUCIANS

There have been numerous small groups of Rosicrucians of various kinds. (See the diagram) The purpose stated by one of the principal Rosicrucian groups: "The Fraternity is now entirely devoted to philosophical research, spiritual training and Occult Initiation."[70]

The famous Jewish magician Eliphas Levi (self-named Zahed)[71] was the Supreme Grand Master of the Rosicrucians in 1861, when the next Supreme Grand Master, the American Dr. P.B. Randolph was chosen.[72] Eliphas Levi was a deep student of the Kaballah, and wrote many books on magic, including the History of Magic. His 1896 edition of Transcendental Magic carries a big illustration of the "Star of David." One hostile biographer claimed he charged up to 25 Francs to give clients prophecies from Lucifer.[73] Lytton knew Levi. Lytton tried to establish a magic society in London, which Madame Blavatsky became acquainted with.[74] (Magic, the Jewish Cabala, and Freemasonry are connected. A large number of famous magicians have been Jewish Freemasons.)[75]

This Rosicrucian group had an Order which in England was called The Order of the Rose, in France L'Ordre du Lis, and in America The Order of the Lily. During the Civil War, the Rosicrucian Council of Three of the Order of the Lily consisted of Paschal Beverly Randolph, General Ethan Allen Hitchcock (his mother was the Mason Ethan Allen's daughter), and Abraham Lincoln.[76] It is well known that Lincoln and his wife had seances, etc. in the White House. Abraham Lincoln's wife was especially into spiritism. Rev. Cole of the Church of Illumination writes in The Light of Life, "Abraham Lincoln also received his training in the Regeneration, in like manner, under the great Teacher Dr. P.B. Randolph."[77]

This helps solve one "mystery" about Abraham Lincoln. Abraham Lincoln was never a Mason, but many lodges and individual Masons believed he was.[78] Lincoln had been asked to join, but turned down the chance. A French Masonic magazine Monde Maconnique referred to Lincoln as a "member of the Grand Lodge of New York."[79] It appears from various reliable Masonic sources that Lincoln was not a Mason. But he was a Rosicrucian. The close affiliation between the two orders, and the overlapping memberships would naturally tend to cloud the issue. During the Civil War, Randolph and Hitchcock, who were close friends, Dr. Alexander Wilder and Abraham Lincoln formed the nucleus of the Rosicrucians in Wash.D.C.[80] Hitchcock in a compilation of his notes Fifty Years in Camp and Field alludes to their meetings with the President.

(Lincoln was the man the Rothschilds wanted, for his election provoked secession by the South. Their plans were to control Lincoln. He turned out to be a far greater man than people expected.)

THE LEADERSHIP OF ROSICRUCIANS

The leadership consists of a Grand Master and a Council of 3 . Underneath this are a Council of 7, Council of 9, and a Council of 21. Their Priests are called Priests of AEth or Priests of Light. They have Round Table discussions, and an Order of Chivalry, the Knights of the Holy Grail. They are associated with the Martinist Order of Freemasonry.

THE AMORC (The Ancient, Mystical Order Rosae Crucis) GROUP OF ROSICRUCIANS IS A SEPARATE GROUP FROM THE CHURCH OF ILLUMINATION

The AMORC group of Rosicrucians headquartered in San Jose, CA and Sussex, England puts a cartouche on the odd-numbered pages of their Rosicrucian Digest. The three symbols represent the following--the bug (the people of the earth) , the crown (the illuminated one), the circle with its dot (the all-seeing eye).

What then are the major differences between the Masons and this line of Rosicrucians? The Masonic Lodges were known to the public and practice symbolic ritual, the Rosicrucians were secret and were spiritual, "...training is often given secretly even in our day," and "...today there are numerous men... receiving instructions from the Great Order unbeknown to their closest friends."[81] (This does not apply to AMORC which is less secret.) Masonry was a brotherhood introducing the occult but not demanding any religious growth from the initiate, while the Rosicrucians have always linked "spiritual growth" to the progress of their initiates.

At the time of the Revolution, the Council of Three consisted of Benjamin Franklin, George Clymer and Thomas Paine.[82] George Washington received his training in Regeneration from Paul Ardenheim, the Monk of Wissahikon.[83] Thomas Jefferson was also a member of the Order, as well as Lafayette, who was initiated in France prior to helping with the Amer. Revolution.

Later british King Edward belonged to the Order of the Rose.

A GREAT MYSTERY

There is a great man of history whose life was more mystery than it was known. But certain men, especially Alfred F. Dodd, have broken codes, have uncovered ancient overlooked letters and documents, and have analyzed and put multitudes of tiny pieces together so that the evidence is so great as to be incontrovertable about who this man really was. But it is not likely you know who I am writing about, because Alfred Dodd's books with their evidence have been supressed by the system.[84]

I am writing about an extraordinary genius, a great philosopher, a great orator, a great lawyer, and a man of great character. A man who was framed in his old age for a crime he was innocent of, by a ruthless politician.[85] A man who gathered the sciences together under the Royal Society.[86] The man who wrote the greatest works of English literature,[87] and proofread the King James Bible.[88] Many of his incredible works of genius are known under his pen-name of William Shakespeare.[89] He conjectured ahead of his times that heat was energy in motion, and that light travels very fast.[90] He created the modern English language and is responsible for English replacing Latin in the English higher schools.[91] He was of royal blood and proper heir to the throne of England.[92]

He also lived in an age when the shadow of the executioner's block haunted men. It was a day when the heads of those who displeased the Queen were severed and put on public display. He would have lost his head for some of his works written under Shakespeare's name had the Queen been able to identify who wrote the works. Therefore, he wrote much of his works under pseudonyms, and many of his works were published after his death. He concealed his royal identity. He concealed his leadership of secret societies.[93] He concealed the role he played in designing the plans and machinery for the creation of his vision of a New World.[94] His mother the Queen, ruling when half of her people questioned her legitimacy, feared the repercussions if the truth of her secret marriage and two sons were revealed. Indeed his mother, Queen Elizabeth 1, had almost been beheaded by her own sister, and had watched the first man who she had romanced be beheaded by her father for him being to forward. She had watched baby heirs to the throne be killed. Such barbarism is forgotten, and the Elizabethian age seems now to be only full of the glamour of romance. It was difficult and dangerous times, even for the Queen of England.

Who was this great man? Sir Francis Bacon, Viscount St. Alban, for over two decades the leader of the British Parliment's House of Commons, and later in life, on January 30,1621, a member of the House of Lords, the secret first son of the secret marriage between Lord Robert Dudley and Elizabeth Tudor.

IN 1586 FRANCIS BACON PUBLISHED A BOOK CHOICE OF EMBLEMS WITH THIS PICTURE CONTAINING THE MASONIC PILLERS (Joachin and Boaz) & OTHER ESOTERIC SYMBOLS.

A GREAT BIRTHDAY PARTY

On 22 January, 1621 in honor of Sir Francis Bacon's sixteeth birthday, a select group of men assembled without fanfare for a great Masonic banquet. This Masonic banquet was to pay tribute to their leader, Sir Francis Bacon. Only those of the Rosicrosse, the Rosicrucians, and the Masons who were already aware of Bacon's leadership role were invited.

Bacon's favorite perfumes had been used. The meeting was at the Great Hall at York House, England (now known as Whitehall) . The tables were T-tables with gleaming white drapery and silver. Flowers decorated the Great Hall.

A dear longtime friend of Bacon's, the famous English Poet Ben Jonson gave a Masonic ode to Bacon that day.-Jonson once remarked something like, "I love the man (Bacon) and do honor his memory above all others."[95] First, Ben Jonson toasted his friend. Next, one can picture this man with his strong face and long nose, and full, thick, and wavy hair, and short mustache and beard as he read out his ode in English.

On Francis Bacon's Sixteeth Birthday
Hail! Happy Genius of this Ancient Pile!
How comes it all things so about thee Smile?
The Fire? the Wine? The Men? and in the MIDST
Thou STAND' ST as if some MYSTERY thou didst.[96]

This ode goes by most of us today, without being told the double meaning it had for those Masons that day. "Hail" was a masonic sign, a masonic call. The word Pile also meant spear in those days--an illusion to Francis Bacon's role as the Happy genius who was Pallas-Athena the Spear-Shaker. Smiles referred to their fellowship in their brotherhood. The Masons would Fire with their glasses, and the Wine refers to their toasts that vent along with their Firing Glasses. As their gathering was all male it refers to the Men. Because Bacon was like a Christ figure Ben uses the wording "in the MIDST." Finally, the word Mystery is full of Masonic connotation. Sir Francis Bacon had revived the Mysteries which only his genius and deep scholarship could have done so well.[97]

THE MASONS PRINT BACON'S DIARY YEARS LATER

In 1625, Sir Francis Bacon was busy getting his affairs in order. He arranged his private diary of sonnets carefully, and then disarranged them to destroy personal meanings. The private Rosicrosse Press published it for the exclusive use of the heads of the Rosicrosse-Masons. Finally in 1766, the Mason George Steevens reprinted this Masonic secret book.

FRANCIS BACON & THE PRIEURE DE SION

The Grand Masters of the Prieure de Sion during those times were Robert Fludd (1595-1637), J. Valentin Andrea (1637-1654), and Robert Boyle (1654-1691).[98] The driving force behind what became the Royal Society, the British scientific society, were Robert Fludd, Robert Boyle, Wren, Ashmole, Locke, and Sir Thomas Moray.[99] Interestingly, all of these men were both Freemasons and Rosicrucians.[100] When King Charles II raised the Academie (which had gone through various names, the Gresham College, The Invisible College of Scientists) to its present status of the Royal Society, Francis Bacon was honored as the "Moses" who had led the Invisible College through its "wilderness."[101]

Sir Francis Bacon knew the Prieure de Sion. He stayed according to a number of reliable historians,[102] with the Prieure de Sion's Grand-Master-to-be Andrea in Berlin the last years of his life, after faking his death in England.[103]

Sir Francis Bacon is widely known for his Utopian book the New Atlantis. What is not widely known is that it was originally titled The Land of the Rosicrucians. The concept of Atlantis has been preserved by the Mysteries. Sir Francis Bacon and the other leaders of Secret Societies in that day felt the New World held out the best chances to create the New Atlantis.[104] Sir Francis Bacon played a leading role in creating the British colonies, especially in Virginia, the Carolina's and Newfoundland.[105] The British Masons with the British Empire behind them were entrusted with the Plan to create the New Atlantis. Bacon's descendants moved to Virginia in 1635, where his descendant Henry Blount took the name Nathaniel Bacon.[106] Nathaniel Bacon, a Master Mason,[107] led a premature revolution called Bacon's Rebellion that prefigured the American Revolution.[108] It is true that Freemasons served on both sides of the American Revolution. Naive people think that indicates that the Masons could not have had anything to do with the Revolution.[109] On the contrary, the Masons were the primary instigators and leaders of the Revolution, although they allowed others to get involved. The British Masons fighting the rebels actually contributed to eventual independence of the Colonies,[110] as did the secret societies in France and Germany.

The Masons claim to know something about Sir Francis Bacon uncovered by excavations done in Williamsburg, Virginia. A vault left by his descendants supposedly gives information about the founding of the United States.[111]

Some of Sir Francis Bacon's last words known to us, "I have held up a light in the obscurity of Philosophy, which will be seen centuries after I am dead. It will be seen amidst the erection of Tombs, Theaters, Foundations, Temples, of Orders and Fraternities for nobility and obedience,--the establishment of good laws as an example to the World. For I am not raising a Capital or Pyramid to the Pride of men, but laying a foundation in the human Understanding for a holy Temple after the model of the World. For my memory I leave it to Men's charitable speeches, to foreign Nations and the next Ages, and to my own Country after some Time has elapsed."[112]

At another occasion he said, "I go the same way as the Ancients, but I have something better to offer than the Morality Dramas of the Greeks and the Mystery Ceremonials of the Egyptians." True, he gave part of the Masonic ritual[113] and much of it decidedly non-Christian.

TWO NOTABLE OCCULTISTS THAT WERE FREQUENTLY AROUND BACON

The Earl of Leichester, who was Bacon's actual father, had as his physician the magician and Jew Dr. Frederigo Lopez. Christopher Marlowe described Lopez in a dramatization of his career in the book The Jew of Malta. Marlowe was stabbed to death after the book came out.[114] Sir John Dee, who was another magician/doctor, travelled throughout Europe and was the court astrologer for Queen Elizabeth. (See chapter 1.11 about John Dee.)

THE NEW ATLANTIS

Bacon describes the Masons in New Atlantis "...amongst the excellent acts of that king, one above all hath the pre-eminence. It was the erection and institution of an order, or society, which we call Solomon's House; the noblest foundation, as we think, that ever was upon the earth..."[115]

THINGS HAVE CHANGED

The idealism, charity, and integrity that characterized Bacon is notably absent today in the inner circle of the One-World-State power. Bacon was a Philosopher. A man who for much of his life was not wealthy or exceptionally powerful. His life was in jeopardy a great deal of the time, although contrarywise he and those who knew about his secret royal blood were more respectful, never knowing if he might be proclaimed King by his mother the Queen. When James 1 took over the throne from Bacon's mother, to protect his head Bacon wrote a letter to King James 1, delivered through the Secretary of State, renouncing any ambition to the throne, and announcing his decision to marry a commoner.[116] By comparison, those who are as prominant today in the One-World-State as Bacon was then are part of a far greater power, and have been corrupted by that power. Technology has made a One-World-State much more ominous. It is possibe that Bacon would be aghast at what the One-World-State is going to be.

GOING PUBLIC IN 1717

In 1717, four lodges in London went public. To give the reader the frame of mind that the "new" lodges had, a quote from a Masonic book Defense of Masonry, (1730) is informative as to their view of antiquity. "The System, as taught in the regular Lodges, may have some Redundancies or Defects, occasion'd by the Ignorance or Indolance of the old members. And indeed, considering through what Obscurity and Darkness the MYSTERY has been deliver'd down; ...notwithstanding the great Rust it may have contracted, there is much of the OLD FABRICK remaining..."[117]

According to Christian researcher Edith Star Miller,[118] once Masonry was open to the public, it was to serve as the screen behind which a host of secret societies, whether theurgic or political, would operate clandestinely. In other words, organizations like the secret Palladium Rite of Masonry find it easier to function secretly behind the screen of regular Masonry. Masonry acts as a clearing house for many of the occult organizations. The center switchboard for the various types of Masonic lodges is the Alpina Lodge in Switzerland.

The Sufi mysticism, which is masonic theosophy, operates in cooperation with Freemasonry. Sufism has "a species of Masonic or Eleusian initiation from lower to higher degrees."[119] The Sufi leader to be, who is considered the Messiah by the Sufis, is being helped by a select group which includes several Masons to be revealed as Lord Matreya.(See chapter 1.4)

One researcher of Masonry offered his evaluation, "The masonic Order usually draws its members from the leading merchants, and from the professions, bankers, doctors, and lawyers. They come to their meetings, they dabble in some charity work, and in general, they mark time until the day when they are asked to perform some unusual task for a fellow Mason, or for the national or world order. At that time, they finally realize that the blood oath does have significance, but by that time it is usually too late. They may be asked to support a Masonic candidate for political office, to swing a business deal to a fellow Mason, or. even to commit perjury or some other illegal act for a brother Mason. Even then, they are never offered any confidences; they are merely told what they must do, and they obey."[120]

Ex-Masons confirm this. They also indicate that some of the more insignificant members may not be in a position to help, and may not be called upon for favors.

THE PRIEURE DE SION & THE ILLUMINATI

In order to explain the connection let us cover the structure of Masonry.

One of the Modern known groups of the Illuminati is also known as the Ancient Order of Oriental Templars (Ordo Templi Orientis) . However, its own esoteric name is Order of To Ov. It's publication was The Equinox. According to The Equinox, Vol. III No. 1, 1919 the O.T.O. is "a body of initiates in whose hands are concentrated the the wisdom and knowledge of the following bodies:

1. The Gnostic Catholic Church
2. The Order of the Knights of the Holy Ghost
3. The Order of the Illuminati
4. The Order of the Temple (Knights Templar)
5. The Order of the Knights of St. John
6. The Order of the Knights of Malta
7. The Order of the Knights of the Holy Sepulchre
8. The Hidden Church of the Holy Grail
9. The Hermetic Brotherhood of Light
10. The Holy Order of Rose Croix of Heredom
11. The Order of the Holy Royal Arch of Enoch
12. The Antient and Primitive Rite of Masonry (33 degrees)
13. The Rite of Memphis (97 degrees)
14. The Rite of Mizraim (90 degrees)
15. The Antient and Accepted Scottish Rite of Masonry (33 degrees)
16. The Swedenborgian Rite of Masonry [9 degrees]
17. The Order of Martinists [3 degrees]
18. The Order of the Sat Bhai, [14 degrees] and many other orders of equal merit, if of less fame." (End of quote).

It is clear from reading their own publication The Equinox (published from 1909-13) that the O.T.O. has suceeded in placing their people in the leadership positions of those listed Orders and Rites. Aleister Crowley was the leader of the O.T.O. when he was alive. Can the O.T.O.'s literature be taken seriously that it concentrated the esoteric Gnosis of the above groups?

33° Scottish Rite Mason Aleister Crowley appears in his masonic OTO garb. Crowley who called himself "the Beast" is imfamous as one of the world's leading Satanists.

Yes, an examination of the leadership of the above groups shows interlocking directories of power; those interlocking directories also interlock with the O.T.O. To belong to the O.T.O. initiates pledge loyalty to "unseen superiors". The O.T.O. was openly Satanic, worshipping Satan, and the Anti-Christ. The Black Mass is performed by them, and their rituals include blood, sacrifices, excrement, horrible sexual acts, etc.

The Masonic pamphlet "The Grand Mystic Temple" describes how the the Scottish Rite Supreme Grand Council in America, the Rite of Mizraim, and the Rite of Memphis allied themselves together. The Rite of Mizraim and Memphis had already been allied prior to this union.

To illustrate the interlocking directories of various rites and orders--some more openly occultic and Satanic than others let us consider the following men. (The following were compiled from Masonic/ Esotoric sources too numerous to footnote.)

ALEISTER CROWLEY (1875-1947) For Crowley's personal description of his initiation to the 33rd degree of the Scottish Rite read his book Confessions.)

WILLIAM WYNN WESTCOTT (1848-1925)

Master; Grand Lodge of England, Junior Grand Deacon; Societas Rosicruciana in Anglia, secretary-general and Supreme Magus (head); Golden Dawn, head; Rite of Swedenborg, Secretary; Royal Arch, Grand Standard Bearer; OTO, Regent of the Illuminati; supporter of H.P. Blavatsky, friend of Papus, and John Yarker, and Theodore Reuss.

PAPUS (DR. GERALD ENCAUSSE) (1865-1916)

He was the following: Order of Martinism, Grand Master; Rite of Mizraim, Grand Master; Rite of Memphis, Grand Master; Swedenborg Rite, delegate for in France, occult advisor to Russian Czar Nicholas II; friend of the Duchese de Pomar; OTO, member.

THEODORE REUSS

He was the following: Scottish Rite, 33rd degree, Rite of Mizraim, 90th degree; Rite of Memphis, 96th degree; Sovereign Grand Master General of those two Rites, Esoteric Rosicrucians, Supreme Magus; Societas Rosicruciana in Anglia, VIII; OTO, Frater Superior and Outer Head in Mundo; friend of Papus; Sovereign Grand Master General ad Vitam for the German Empire, Swedenborg Rite, founder of six lodges in Germany, and Prov. WHAT WAS THE VALUE OF THE UNION OF THE SCOTTISH, MIZRAIM & MEMPHIS RITES?

What was the value of this union? The Rites of Mizraim and Memphis are far more occultic and gnostic than the Scottish Rite. If a neophyte was obviously interested in the occult, and was lacking finances, this Masonic pamphlet "The Grand Mystic Temple" indicates he could be started at the 18th degree of the Scottish Rite (the Rose Croix of Heredom) and at the 46th degree of Mizraim. From there he could progress in the 3 rites.

There are numerous secret "interoffice memo type" papers that indicate that a Satanist, a Luciferian, a practitioner of black magic, or the like has a easy time in Freemasonry, because the upper degrees are controlled by men who will bend any rules to help them. Having a membership card is of limited value in visiting a foreign Lodge. A dues card is important, showing that one's dues are all paid up. Certain questions will be asked, and certain parts of the rituals need to be quoted by memory to satisfy the Lodge one is visiting. Now, let us, for instance, picture an American Mason visiting an Irish lodge. He can go to the Freemasons' Hall in Dublin or to one of the Provincial Masonic Temples and be examined.

This examination though is a courtesy, and it is up to the Grand Lodge's office whether they bother to interview him. By being interviewed this American will then be vouched to attend any meeting in the Grand Lodge of Ireland. When attending he will have to have been given the password of the First Degree (or other degree) . However, if he has been vouched, he will know the passwords. One can now see the leverage the Luciferian occultists have in Masonry, when the correct dues cards, diplomas, and passwords are given freely to them by the heads of these Rites.

THE RITE OF MIZRAIM & MEMPHIS

These two rites, although separate in some areas are closely allied. The Rite of Mizraim is mainly Jewish.[121] The secret order of the Prieure de Sion is also predominantly Jewish.[122] The B'nai B'rith seems to have taken over some of the Rite of Mizraim influence upon Masonry.[123]

The Rite of Memphis is not just European. Americans, such as 6-term Governor of Wisconsin Lucius Fairchild who was 95°, are Memphis Rite Masons too.

The Rite of Memphis has Ormus in their ritual. What or who is Ormus? Ormus (Ormudz) was the supreme God of Mithraism and Zoroastrian thought. It was also the name by which the Prieure de Sion allegedly went by from the years 1188-1306.[124] In 1188, when the Ordre de Sion became the Prieure de Sion it took the subtitle Ormus, until just before the arrest of the Templar Knights' leaders.

The controversial Protocols of Sion have been traced to the Rite of Mizraim in Paris, to a Mason named Maurice Joly. People have raised a straw man in claiming that the Conspiracy "Theories" are based on the Protocols of Sion. The Protocols, whether they are of any significance or not, are a tiny atom of the mass of evidence. Even so a lot of disinformation has spewed forth from the System against the Protocols, and it continues to be printed, perhaps by agent provocateurs for the System. The book Warrant for Genocide put out by Yale University, supposedly destroying the credibility of the Protocols is such poor thinking and pure nonsense,[125] one wonders if that is the best argumentation against the Protocols, then the Protocols must be valid. Warrant for Genocide makes it appear that all "anti-semitism" comes from crazy people who use the Protocols. The Protocols themselves speak of a Masonic conspiracy, not a Jewish conspiracy, so why have the Jewish people never used that as a defense?

Numerous researchers into the Conspiracy have noticed heavy Jewish involvement. The lack of public response has resulted in some researchers believing that radical problems needed radical solutions. Nesta Webster, who began neutral toward the Jews ended up a die-hard Fascist in the 1920s. She wrote The Need for Fascism in Great Britain. (For the Christian it would be worthwhile to take a fresh look at 1 Cor. 13 which declares that no matter what worthwhile thing we do, if we do not have love, it of no value.)

The religion called Mithra (Babylon), Mithras (Roman), Mitra (India) had spread over the known world during the first centuries A.D. It was very popular. It had cabbalistic thought, astrology, numerology, 'words of power', Greek philosophy, Babylonian myth, and a Gnostic dual theology which Masons like Albert Pike believed in.[126] When Christianity became a recognized religion, it is a valid question to wonder which absorbed which, Mithraism or Christianity? Certain ideas of Mithraism continue to resurface under the label Christian. For instance, in Mithraism (which became known later as Gnosticism) there was the idea that after 6,000 years of man's existence, a Golden Age would come in.[127] Mithraism is so close to Masonry, that those who study Mithraism have often commented that Freemasonry is the continuation of it. Mithraism absorbed occultic thought, and was somewhat eclectic.

It's follower's held rituals (for men only) in caves, or temples. Their rites remind one of the Masonic Rituals. In Israel, Masonic ceremonies are held in the Caves of Hezekiah, which have a chamber about 130 feet underground below the Temple Mount (of where Herod's Temple in Jerusalem was) . The cave will seat about 200. The cave is near the Damascus Gate. The City of Jerusalem gives a special privilege to the Masons to use it. On days of Masonic ceremonies, the caves which are normally open to the public are closed. Manly P. Hall claims the Masonic eye comes from the supreme God Ahura Mazda (or Ormuzd, Ormus). There are many similarities between Mithraism, the Prieure de Sion, and Masonry.

In A Guide To The Gods a reference works on pagan gods the Rite or religion of Mithra is described, "It contained much symbolism. . .all with Masonic overtones."[128] "One can see in the appurtenances of Mithraism the germ of many secret society and occult rite, many an exclusive cabal... and clubs."[129]

In Mithraic Studies, an extensive compilation of studies on Mithraism, it states, "Undoubtedly ancient Mithraism like orthodox Freemasonry today, with which it has so much in common..."

FREEMASONRY HAS LOTS OF SPIN-OFFS

Freemasonry is "directly or indirectly the parent of all modern secret societies, good, bad, or indifferent."--Cyclopedia of Fraternities. One outdated source indicates there are over 600 secret societies in the U.S. utilizing Masonic symbolism, and operating largely under Masonic influence, so that about every third male adult in the U.S. is a member of one or more such societies.[130] The 600 figure is outdated, and the actual number of secret societies has increased by several hundred more secret societies.

See Chap. 2.3 for the Spin-off Chart.

Some of the Masonic spin-offs have become such a part of normal life that the negative reactions of past years toward them are forgotten. Rotary, because of its Masonic control, hostility toward the Catholic Church, and its moral code, "which in almost every particular resembles that of Freemasonry, " was forbidden in some Catholic jurisdictions, and discouraged in others.[131] That was back in the 19th and early 20th century.

THE HIGHER SCOTTISH RITE DEGREES & THE PALLADIUM RITE

In the hard to obtain book, The Hidden Life In Freemasonry, written by 33rd degree C.W. Leadbeater for Masons one learns in Masonic language what the upper degrees of Freemasonry can get into. On page 175 Leadbeater refers to "when a clandestine meeting is held, even though a duly I.M. be present, the inner recognition is not given..."

What? Why are these Masons being so secretive amongst themselves? Because the Theurgical fun (Magical & occult) and politics begin, and the Lodge quits being just a private club for ritual. How this operates will be discussed.

First, we'll discuss the 30-33 Scottish Rite degrees. This is where it is becoming evident that Lucifer is the God of Masonry. Leadbeater says, "It must of course be understood... the conferring of the Higher Degrees puts certain definite powers in the hands of the recipient." Where does such power come from? "The 33 degree links the Sovereign Grand Inspector General with the Spiritual King of the World Himself--that Mightiest of Adepts who stands at the head of the Great White Lodge, in whose strong hands lie the destinies of earth--and awakens the powers of the Triple Spirit as far as they can yet be awakened." (The Hidden Life In Freemasonry, p.302) Other Masons like Manly P. Hall (33°) and Foster Bailey (32°) have said similar things.

Foster Bailey calls the spirits that Masons communicate with the "Illuminati"[132]. These spirits initiate these higher Masons into becoming light-bearers themselves. The Illuminati..."assist at the unfolding of the consciousness of the candidate until the time comes when he can 'enter into light' and, in his turn become a light-bearer, one of the Illuminati who can assist the Lodge on High in bringing humanity to light."[133]

These spirits have various Masons. Masons Harold Waldwin Pecival and Lynn F. Perkins claim their books were inspired by spirits.[134]

Is 33° Mason Leadbeater talking about linking up with the Christian Christ? "The H.O.A.T.F. makes the actual links both with Himself...and also through himself with that Mighty King...This stage combines the wonderful love of Horus the Son with the ineffable life and strength of Osiris the divine Father and Isis the eternal Mother of the world." This initiation connects the Mason with the pagan egyptian trinity? That's what he says. Leadbeater goes on to say how much glory, spiritual power, and worldly power the Mason has after this initiation, (p. 3 04) The next page Leadbeater begins the section telling the Mason "How to Use the Powers". He talks about the Liberal Catholic Church. Yes, men who have left the Liberal Catholic Church have verbally and in writing talked about how Satanic it is.

Leadbeater continues, "Yet when one of these bright Spirits is attached to us by a Masonic ceremony we must not think of him either as a director or as an attendant, but simply as a co-worker and a brother." (p. 309)

The next chapter "Two Wonderful Rituals" describes Egyptian rituals to Amen-Ra, and the Blazing Star. They sing a hymn to "Ra, the Logos, the Sun-God, thanking Him for His response..." They take a sacrement to Osirus.

The next ritual described may possibly refer to part of the secret Palladium Rite, as it refers to THE TRIANGLE OF ADEPTS. The Palladium Rite calls its groups Triangles. He talks about chanting invocations, and then angels appearing. Then the Illuminati salute is given to the Angel, where the left arm is placed above as if shielding one from light. (p. 341) Leadbeater indicates that eventually the Temple of the Angels draws 9 orders of angels, "which are not limited to one solar system." (p. 342)

If the reader is still with me--this Author would like to describe some about the Palladium Rite. This Author has never been in the Palladium Rite, and it is secret, so how would a person find out about such a rite? One expose of the Palladium Rite that appeared to be a hoax in the 19th century, has made people leary that the Rite even exists. When a news conference had been held, they were unable to produce evidence. One ex-Palladist Mason has problems getting people to believe it exists!

Goddess Pallas Athena, the Sign of Prudence and Circumspection, was used especially by Francis Bacon because it had the double meaning from Greek mythology of Spear-shaker, or "Shake-speare" his pen name. Palladian means pertaining to the Goddess Pallas or characterized by wisdom. And palladium means an object that is essential to the safeguarding of a community. Palladium is also the statue of Pallas Athena, upon which the city of Troy depended upon for its safety. Pallas Athena is also called Athena by the Greeks and Minerva by the Romans. Sir Francis Bacon wrote the name AthenA in his Rosicrucian books as A.A. Alfred Dodd goes into details of letters, poems of people to Bacon and writings of Sir Francis Bacon which use Pallas Athena.[135]

A secret Palladium Rite had existed at least from the time of 1730. Perhaps it was itself was from yet another earlier Palladium Rite, or perhaps it drew from some Rosicrucian source. At any rate, it was reactivated in 1884.

At the Public Library was the respectable Encyclopaedia of American Institutional Fraternal Organizations by Schmidt. Under "FREE AND REGENERATED PALLADIUM" it reads "This Masonically linked society... remained dormant until 1884. After this date it was reformed to ' impart new force to the traditions of high grade Masonry.' The society admitted men and women, the former to the grades of Adelphos and Companion of Ulysses and the latter to the grade of Penelope. The society held all its "Councils" in strict secrecy. It never printed any proceedings and very much restricted its membership." (p.119) On page 161 is an article on HOME PALLIDUM, which is a fraternal benefit society, apparently for members of the Palladium Rite.

The Palladium Rite created by Albert Pike is totally Luciferian. It is "androgynous." In the larger cities, activities are carried out in the Masonic Temples, which allows women to slip into the Temples without arousing attention. All of this will be strongly denied by the Masonic Lodges. Members are selected mainly from higher levels of the Scottish Rite, although the members can come from other Rites too. The Palladium Rite has its own budget. Its power over the Masonic Lodge does not derive from being a part of the power structure, but from the careful selection of Masons that participate in the Palladium Rite and their distribution throughout the various Rites of Masonry and their controlling bodies. The Grand Central Directories (and from there to the Supreme Councils, Grand Encampments, Grand Orients, and Grand Lodges) are the nerve centers of Masonry from which orders emanate. The Palladium Rite is popular among those in positions of power. It is said that the leaders of the Palladium Rite are allowed to visit or join the B'nai B'rith lodges.(See chap. 1.7)[136]

William Schnoebelen is presently a Christian author. Prior to becoming a Christian, he had been initiated into the Palladium Lodge in Chicago named Resurrection Lodge #13. He describes some about getting the Palladium Degree of Paladin in his recent book Masonry Beyond The Light. That lodge claimed to be derived from the European chapter of the AISB.(p. 186) Higher Masons become Illuminati-- which go by several names one of which is "Masters of the Temple." A single illumined person is called an Illuminatus.

SUMMARY

This chapter has shown how Freemasonry is the One-World-Religion. Freemasonry has created hundreds of organizations. Freemasonry itself is the pagan mystery religion, which at the highest level becomes Luciferian worship. It has quietly played the dominant political role in the United States even before independence. (For more details on its political role see the Appendix.)

NOTES

1. I have tried to leave these introductory paragraphs without footnotes to help the flow of reading. Alice Bailey is so well known that these things really don't need footnotes. However, the question can be asked, "How much would her husband and her have talked about things, considering Masons do not talk or tell the truth to their wives about the Lodge?" This is a legitimate question, some wives have found out that their honest husbands lied for decades about the lodge. There are some rites which are designed for both sexes like the Palladium Rite and the Order of the Magi which admit women. Also for women is Co-masonry, Order of the Eastern Star, and Daughters of the Nile. The high level of importance that Alice Bailey held indicates she was in communication with whoever in Masonry she needed to cooperate with.
2. The Watchtower June 15, 1963, p. 377 says the Rosicrucians go back to Great White Brotherhood of Egypt.
3. Benjamin Creme, a student of Freemasonry, the occult, and Bailey believes the Hierarchy has assigned him the job of John the Baptist to announce the new messiah named Lord Maitreya. (See chapter 1.4) Benjamin Creme in describing the One-World-Religion that is coming in the Age of Aquarius states, "The Ancient Mysteries [Freemasonry] will be restored, the Mystery Schools reopened, and a great expansion of man's awareness of himself and his purpose and destiny will become possible."(Creme, Benjamin. The Reappearance of the Christ and the Masters of Wisdom. London:Tara Press, 1980, p.182) "The Mystery schools will be reopened and men will go to them as they now go to University, to learn and to take the disciplines that will prepare them for initiation, and so into the Hierarchy."(ibid.,p.190) "The new religion will manifest itself through organizations like Masonry." (ibid.,p. 28) (bold added.)

(emphasis added.)
6. Because parts of Pike's Morals and Dogma are openly Luciferian, Masons are reluctant to admit to profane people that Pike is still important to Masonry. Church going Masons have said that they don't know who Albert Pike is. For the sake of the non-Masonic world the following are a sampling of how important Pike is to Masonry. The New Age Magazine, Official organ of the Supreme Council 33° Scottish Rite, Apr. 1964, pp.13-19 has a eulogy of Albert Pike where the following items are said about Pike, "Although Albert Pike was a master in many lines of endeavor, his brethren recognize him as the world's most renowned Scottish Rite Mason and will be forever grateful for his work in behalf of Freemasonry and the Scottish Rite."(p.19) "Not only Masonry, but all Protestantism is deeply indepted to Albert Pike..."(p.19) "...Albert Pike, the man whose memory we recall with deep reverence..." As an example that Pike's Morals and Dogma are considered valid today The New Age, Nov. 1958, p. 680 quotes Morals and Dogma as an authoritative writing. The New Age Magazine (Sept. 1959) has an article about "six very great men" (p.518) -Lincoln, Darwin, Albert Pike, Holmes, Tennyson, and Jewish Prime Minister of Britain Gladstone. The New Age Magazine (Oct. 1959) carries Pike's picture, and an article on his philosophy. Pike's Morals and Dogma, p. 321 et. al. reveals Masons worship Lucifer, who Pike says is the Light-bearer.

In the book, he describes studying the Power. He "was permitted for two years in the early 1960s" to study the "papers and secret records" of an international anglophile network." (Emphasis mine.) Jacob Frank, a Satanist), Compte de Cagliostro (a.k.a. Joseph Balsamo, started the Egyptian Masonic Rite and leader of the Lodge of Isis with its wild sexual rites.) (1743-1795), Compte de Saint-Germain (aka Daniel Wolff, now heralded by New Agers as a great spiritual leader)(1710-1784), Friedrich Franz (a.k.a. Anton Mesmer, founder of hypnotism then called mesmerism) (1733-1815). SOME OTHER MASONIC MAGICIANS for which this Author is not aware if they have Jewish heritage or not are Dr. Gerald Encausse (aka Papus), Lorenza Feliciana (also in Lodge of Isis), Manly P. Hall, Alexander Herrman (1844-1896), C.W. Leadbeater, S.L. MacGregor Mathers, George Pickingill (warlock), Dr. Theodore Reuss, Philip Samuel Rosa, and Arthur Edward Waite.

76. The membership on this Council comes from quite a number of Rosicrucian sources, and seems to be supported by circumstantial historical evidence. 84. Dodd's research and his books are overwhelming. The One-World-Order has worked hard to keep them out of the United States. Delia Bacon, (no relation to Francis Bacon) was the first profane person to really realize that Sir Francis Bacon was Shakespeare. She was so overwhelmed by this discovery, she went to England and devoted her life to researching the connections. They managed to lock her up in an insane asylum near Stratford, but not before she succeeded to get her book published. Her nephew finally rescued her from the British insane asylum and brought her back to Hartford,Conn, where she died in peace "trusting in the Lord." She was cruelly slandered, rediculed and mocked as if her discovery was an insane idea. Whether true or false, her theory, now substantiated, makes more sense than any other explanation. Interestingly, various Masons, including Mark Twain, and various important men in the One-World-Power like Henry James and Sigmund Freud believed in her research, while the "profane" world almost entirely ignored her.

SECRET RULING BODIES OF THE NEW WORLD ORDER (believe it or not) A diagram of how the United States policy is created is in chapter 3.6. A diagram of how Christian religions are directed is in chapter 2.1.

level 1- Elders of Sion. An inner core of Jewish world rulers numbering 13 who are dedicated to Lucifer, and his alien demons. It can be theorized that there is an inner core to this. This group includes the Rothschilds, and some other "Jews" who believe they are gods and who have worshipped Satan for generations. If we were as rich and powerful as the Rothschilds we might also think we were gods. And in addition to their power of wealth are the witchcraft powers they have attained. The Bilderbergers is an extension of this. This group will make the final decision on who is selected of the various candidates to be the world's King-Priest ruler that the public will worship.

level 2- There is a top circle or Round Table of nine members of the Bilderbergers. Next is a policy committee of 13. The next level are the 3 inner core groups of the Bilderbergers. Each of the 3 inner core groups number 13, and are made up of members of the Prieure de Sion, Illuminated Masons, the "Black" Nobility, leading Satanists, and men of power. Some are in the leadership of the Catholic Church. Their policy committee meets yearly under the polar cap via submarine to give the USSR its yearly directives. (Of course they have thousands of other communication links with their men in the Kremlin.) The names of one powerful group is given in chapter 2.10. Offices for the Bilderberger committees are maintained in Switzerland and at least once a year a general secret meeting is arranged where delegates are invited and prearranged topics are discussed.

level 3- Majesty 12, this is the Inner group that directs the U.S. Other major western nations have an equivalent group of rulers. MJ-12 consists of:
6 members of the executive committee of the JASON Group which is a group of intelligent men that began with the Manhattan project.
6 members of the executive committee of the Council of Foreign Relations (CFR)- these men are known as "the wise men", they are also all members of the Jason Society, which is a branch of the Masonic Order of the Quest.
6 other key people-heads of the FBI, CIA, etc. usually also Masons and CFR people.
(Majesty 12 has been variously named by those in the U.S. government in the know as 5412 Committee or Special Group (Eisenhower & Kennedy Admin.), 303 Committee (Johnson Admin.), 40 Committee (Nixon, Ford, & Carter Admin.), PI-40 (Reagon Admin.). It has been seen in some intelligence messages as MAJIC.)

level 4- Covert groups like the Mafia, and a host of tens of thousands of public organizations. These are directed through a host of channels including the CFR. (It is worthy of note that the CFR ties in with Masonry, particularly the Grand Orient.) The Mafia, which was empowered by Illuminated Masonry, works closely with the CIA, the Vatican, and the Freemasons to militantly control local situations. They are able to deliver local elections. Pres. Kennedy turned on the Mafia, and was attempting to attack their leadership, after they delivered the Presidential election to him.

Recommended for further study:

Occult Theocracy by Edith Star Miller (Lady Queensborough) This book should be in every Christian minister's library. It was the forerunner of this book Be Wise As Serpents. It was Miller's wish that someone would continue where she had left off. Her book covers over 100 secret and occult groups that are coordinating their activities and are offshoots from one another. Her book was printed after she died for private circulation. Had she lived longer she may have been able to guard against a few minor errors that occured when they printed her manuscript. She concludes her book on pg. 665, "The work is far from being completed. It claims, in fact, to be only an attempt in the direction of inexhaustible research work upon the coordination of the aims of all societies whether political or occult. It is hoped that others, and may they be many, will begin work where this book ends for--"The harvest is great indeed but the labourers are few." This book is difficult to obtain, but can be obtain from the publisher of Be Wise As Serpents.

Fire In The Minds of Men by James H. Billington. This great historian was a member of the CFR. I say great because he wrote an expose that the Power let slip through their censorship. After it was published they tried to suppress it, and were successful in limiting its availability and visibility. The book covers the details of how secret occult societies have been behind all the revolutionary forces since the American Revolution. The book is written for scholars by a scholar.

Francis Bacon's Personal Life-Story by Alfred Dodd. This remarkable book is part of Alfred Dodd's intensive life-long research into the person of Francis Bacon. The book is divided into two volumnes--The Age of Elizabeth (Vol. 1) and The Age of James (Vol. 2). Alfred Dodd died before Vol. 2 could be printed. Both parts were finally printed together years later in 1986. The book gives many details concerning Bacon's involvement with the Rosicrucians and the formation of Freemasonry. This excellent book has been suppressed by the Power for some reason.

Chapter 1.3
PROGRESSIVE LIGHT

- You will learn how the World Order gets instant power bases by creating Gnostic religions.
- You will learn how to build a gnostic religion.
- You will be shown information that contrasts Gnosticism with Christ's teachings.

The young SS officer was only 23, but perhaps the most talented in Germany for the Indiana Jones role he was cast into. His quest was a real life search for the sacred cup, the lost key to the ancient germanic legends, known to the Christian world as the Holy Grail. This tall, muscular, and handsome German had studied the Grail legends in detail. He even knew the local dialect.

It was 1931 and southern France. The new Nazi religion needed the Grail to legitimize their new Gnostic religion, which was based on the ancient German gnostism of the German tribes. His name was Otto Rahm. Like many SS officers, he would commit suicide before the allies could capture him.

OTTO RAHM ON HIS MISSION IN THE GROTTOES OF ORNOLAC

Otto Rahm may have suceeded in his quest. Apparently, a German castle was restored with slave labor for the Grail. But like the Nazi religion, the Grail has remained a well-kept secret for many years.

Strange? Yes. But even more so, is the coverup of the Nazi's gnostic religion. One of the first items done at the Nuremburg trials was to forbid mention of the Nazi religion. It was inadmissible.

"One of the best kept secrets of the twentieth century is the occultic roots and nature of the religious philosophy at the heart of the Third Reich."[1]

Because of the disinformation about the Nazis, the public is unable to grasp the connections of Nazism with the modern day New Age movement and the Masonic Lodges.

NAZISM, THE MASONS & W.W.II[2]

W.W. II was staged. The allies were led by three Masons Roosevelt, Stalin, and Churchill. The Germans were led by men who were from an off-shoot of the Masons. II Duce in Italy had also been associated with the occult and the Masons, but like Hitler had broken away and gone in the direction of Fascism. Stalin encouraged Hitler to strike the West. Knowing that Hitler wouldn't attack, Stalin made a pact with Hitler, so that Hitler could rest assured that his rear would be safe. There is a book which goes into detail about the machinations that Stalin went through to get Hitler to attack Poland. Roosevelt knew that the Pearl Harbor attack was coming. Roosevelt was looking for a way to get the U.S. into the war. The war was costly to the world in general, but looking at it from the viewpoint of the one-world-conspiracy it was a brilliant. They were able to profit greatly. Russia was able to conquer half of Europe. They were able to use the threat of Russia to create a de facto united Europe. The U.S. was able to use the W.W. II to allow a massive exchange of material and technology to Russia, including the technology and materials to build the atomic bomb. The United Nations was set up, as a testing ground for the New World Order.

This background information is intended as an introduction for the reader to the multifaceted gnostic religion and the one-world-government conspiracy it is married to. You will now learn that the basic ingredients are the same for the various gnostic hierarchical religions, they just have a different flavor to them. They operate off of the same principles. There is even a book How to Start your own Religion. As you progress through this book Be Wise As Serpents you'll learn how they cooperate and function together. What we have been viewing as separate independent religious groups are actually at the very top working together.

This chapter is meant to be a tool to enable the reader to see that those basic ingredients of gnosticism make up all the gnostic religions, and that the Jehovah's Witnesses, the Nazi's, the Mormons, the Masons, Wicca, etc. are simply different flavors of the same thing. If you want Moslem flavor be a Sufi, if you want a Jewish flavor join a Jewish New Age synagogue, if you want a Buddhist flavor join Nichiren Shoshu or Lamaism, if you want American Indian flavor join the Earth Circle or the Bear Tribe Medicene Circle, if you want a Christian flavor join the Moravians, or Jehovah's Witnesses, or the LDS church, or the I AM. The Gnostic New Age movement has other flavors too, Egyptian, Aryan, Witchcraft, Sun Worship, Satan Worship, and New Thought. This Author has drawn a diagram to show the reader his choice of Gnostic poisons. What flavor do you want?

Let's say your religious tastes are like the Neopalitan Icecream (a combination of three) lover. There are groups to accomodate you. For example, Annalee Skarin has an offshoot from Mormonism which is a small metaphysical religion. In 1948 she published Ye are Gods. Another of the many Mormon offshoots called the Aryan Christian Church combines the philosophies of Mormonism and Nazism. They use the Hitler salute and the swastika.

Basic ingredients to create a gnostic religion.

1. Hidden knowledge.
2. A heirarchy, generally divided in 3 basic tiers, the general initiates, the elect, the enlightened top 1,2 or 3 leaders
3. The higher one goes up the hierarchy the more hidden knowledge is dished out.

Let's pause and define esoteric. Esoteric means- intended to be understood by only a select small group. Exoteric means- intended for general consumption.

Ingredient 1. The knowledge given is mystical and esoteric knowledge. A great emphasis is placed on secrecy. It's salvation rests on man controling himself and working out his own destiny. Only initiates at special occult centers learn the power and symbols. The word Gnosis means the ultimate knowledge transmitted by an elite hierarchy of initiates. Another trademark is that there are recurrent cycles of cataclysisms and an earthly paradise, often called the Golden Age.

Ingredient 2. The hierarchy has a ternary classification system. The Theosophical Society informs

GNOSTIC RELIGIOUS BODIES RULED BY HIERARCHIES

TYPE OF GNOSIS (TYPE OF MYSTERY KNOWLEDGE)
Examples of Organisations

Some of these classifications are rough placements, because most of these groups overlap into other placements. Not only are they similar to one another, many of their leadership are in contact with one another.

This is the New Age Movement's Religious buffet. It's like going to Baskin & Robins where there are 32 flavors of ice cream. This is by no means a comprehensive list, but it provides a feel for the different "flavors" of gnosticism a person can get into.

the reader of The Gnosis And Christianity, "the practice common to all the genuine Gnostic cults was followed in having at least three degrees of membership or initiation. It was only in the highest degree that the deepest 'mysteries' were orally communicated;..."[3] Remember that last tip they gave us, that the deepest mysteries are only orally communicated to the very top leader(s). In terms of their use of the ternary system, consider the following gnostic religions.

Catharism: 1. pure ones, 2. the initiates, 3. the masses.
Jehovah's Witnesses: 3. the Great Crowd, 2. the Annointed, 1. the Faithful and Wise Servant(s) those actually leading/the President or Governing Body.
The Mormons: 3. the Aaronic priesthood, 2. the Melchizedek Priesthood, 1. the Top prophet and his presidency.
The Nazis: 3. The Aryan race 2. the Nazi Party 1. the very top of the Nazi religion the high priest Hitler (who was considered their god by some devoted Nazis).
Lamaism: 1.the Dalai-Lama (considered god, a reincarnated Buddha) 2. the Lama priests (aka tulkous), 3. the mass of Tibetan believers.
The Essenes: 1. The Perfect, 2. the Brethren, 3. the Neophytes.
Church Universal & Triumphant: l.The Messenger 2a. Permanent Staff 2b. Temporary Staff 3a. Community Member 3b. Keeper of the Flame 3c. Pearl's Reader.

[Place FIG. 2 -chart of gnostic religious flavors]

Many have asked this author, do the leaders of the cults know what is going on? Yes, they have been orally, emphasis on that word orally told exactly what is happening. The leaders of the New Age, the Jehovah's Witnesses, and the LDS church know what they are up to, and what their roles are in creating a one-world government. That is the method that Gnosticism uses. The very top Prophet or Illuminated Master is informed orally.

Illumination for any Gnostic group comes from superhuman knowledge. New Age leaders almost always claim they are channeling. There is an evolving dualistic fight of lightness and darkness found in the Hindu Vedas, the old Germanic legends, the Nordic sagas, and the Jehovah's Witnesses myth that Jehovah is struggling to vindicate himself to Satan. Like C.T. Russell, founder of the Watchtower Society, the gnostics often see the sun as a primary sacred symbol. The Hakenkreuz (swastika) of the Nazis was a sun wheel. The swastika was a frequently used Masonic symbol, until Hitler. Since Hitler, the Masons haven't been using it. It is also called the gamma cross and has been used for many centuries. The Jewish gnostic groups have tended to exalt the moon, (also the planets and stars) while Aryan groups from India, Iran, and Germany tend to exalt the Sun.

One of the better summaries of Gnosticism, and how Gnostic religion has come down the ages to us today is given by the Theosophical Society,

"From the time of the closing of the Neo-Platonic and Gnostic Schools to the last quarter of the Nineteenth Century, save for the few alchemists, Kabalists, Rosicrucians, occultly instructed Masons and Christian mystics, Theosophy was unknown in the Western world. Before then it was known and studied in various forms by the Platonists, the Pythagoreans, the Egyptians, and the Chaldeans, whilst in India and China it has been preserved down the ages in unbroken continuity. It is the wisdom of the Upanishads and the Vedas, the very heart of Hinduism, Taoism and Islam."[4]

To realize what is being said here is eye opening. The Rosicrucians and occult Masons have preserved Gnostic Theosophy which is the very heart of Hinduism, Taoism and Islam.

The Gnostic religions are often called pagan. This pagan worship is often the exoteric cover that the first levels are initiated into. The highest level is often the real esoteric worship, and often involves direct Luciferian or Satanic worship. In other words, the Sun worship of the Masons and other groups is a fig leaf for the worship by the highest levels of the Divine Serpent Satan.

Gnostic religions use symbols and rituals. The Jehovah's Witnesses have formed their own new rituals, and their own new symbols. But they have retained the magical use of the word Jehovah which has been in use for centuries. The WT Society has followed the very popular school of Gnosticism which follows the ideas of Valentius. This school teaches that matter is more evil than good, and that all matter will be destroyed by fire. For instance, this pattern of thought is seen in the refusal of the WT Society to accept sex as a natural process and to view it as an evil to be tolerated.

Listen to a professed Gnostic, "Humanity reaches forward to a spiritual consummation when the whole Earth will be peopled with a Race of men fully conscious of their god-like nature and powers; and sin, sickness, and death will have been banished for the remaining period of the Earth's cosmic cycle."[5] It almost sounds like something out of the Watchtower magazine. The WT magazine has even used the phraseolgy that a new race was to inhabit the New System.[6]

The Gnostics believe they have a deeper form of Christianity. Then they generally take this further contending that they have the root teaching for the ancient scriptures of the other religions. They indeed have the root teaching of religion, but not of the Christian faith.

In the first book of the Hebrew scriptures is the story of the perfect Garden of Eden. This perfect garden environment shows that originally God had established order.

(Some readers may not believe the Genesis account, even so by continuing to read this chapter you will understand an alternative to the New World Order's Gnosticism and why many Christians contend their faith in God is the opposite of religion. This is important not only for those seeking answers but also to understand why the Christianity that Christ taught is being singled out for destruction.)

From the time man left that Garden environment of order, he has been trying to create a New World Order. By the use of religion he has tried to patch up the wild world, and to rearrange, to repair, to reform this polluted disordered world. The condition of the world testifies that religion has failed. But religion was never meant to be the tool to reorder the world. In the Garden of Eden, Jesus Christ was promised to Adam and Eve as God's own method of reconciling Himself back to mankind. Christ was the hope of the Hebrew prophets, and the center of their faith in God. The mystery of God, Jesus Christ, was sent to man as God's way of allowing those people searching for Him to get to know Him. Religion is supposedly a search for God, but in reality the priesthoods are not honestly looking for God to reveal Himself (how often do they speak of a need for an atonement?), but they are looking for techniques they can develop to sell to the masses. Religion continues for various reasons, many of them selfish.

In reality, they have misunderstood the Christian message. They reinterpret in the view of their religious message. All religions are seeking God(s) in their own strength, and becoming proud of their findings.

To seek for God is a claimed goal of religion. This seems to be a fine goal. If one wants to search for and study a rock, there is no objection on the part of the rock. If one wants to search for and study a man without his consent, he may run into big trouble. If one searches for God, he finds out that unless God reveals Himself to the searcher the finite man cannot find an infinite and Holy God.

Christ came with the object of showing man how man doesn't need to seek God by himself, that God is willing to reveal Himself to mankind. Rather than relying on religion, man can allow God to reconcile Himself to mankind. Jesus Christ was not very complimentary to the religious leaders of the day. He called them "ye fools and blind; woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites." (Mt 23:13)

Those Pharisees had picked up the entire Babylonian gnostic religious system. After Jerusalem fell to the Romans the Jewish religious leaders returned to Babylonia, which became the Jewish religious center until they began moving into Europe in the middle ages. The Universal Jewish Encyclopedia states on pages 13 through 17,

"...in the second century C.E.[A.D.] Babylonia had become a bulwark of Judaism.... The former land of exile had become a land of refuge... The 7th century found the importance of Babylonian Jewry considerably increased. During the preceding 300 years, Palestine had been merely a place of veneration, while Babylonia became the center of Jewish life and learning. Babylonian Jews no longer looked to Palestine for instruction; even the heads of the schools at Tiberius were Babylonian Jews....Babylonia was the spiritual center of Judaism, and its influence brought many Babylonian customs into general use..." (bold added)

The early groups called gnostics in Egypt and the Middle East were primarily Jews. From the preceeding information one begins to realize how indepted the world is to the Jews who served as a vehicle to spread gnosticism throughout the world.

(The Cause celebre of this book will be to show how the Jehovah's Witnesses' Watchtower Society ties into the New World Order in chapters 1.5 to 1.17. Anyone at all familiar with how the Watchtower Society claims to have nothing to do with any political, religious, or fraternal group, will realize that if the Watchtower Society is part of this New World Order then our minds can adjust to accepting about anybody else could be involved too. Unit 2 will tell us who else.)

EXAMINING JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES GNOSTIC TEACHINGS

Let us examine for a while the Gnostic teachings of the Jehovah's Witnesses. Rutherford in Preservation (1932) p. 153, "God has made known to his people the meaning of much that has heretofore been hidden, and may not those things be taken as proof that Armageddon is near,..."

The Jehovah's Witnesses credentials are based on revealing hidden knowledge.

Let us narrow our examination to their book The Harp of God.

"Jehovah had a great plan before the foundation of the world; but no one knew about it. During the first four thousand years of man's history God's plan was kept a secret. He began to reveal it to man nearly nineteen hundred years ago, and then only to those who are consecrated to do his will. Promise was made that greater light should come at the end of the age, and this promise has been kept. We ARE AT THAT TIME, as clearly proven by the contents herein...

People generally have not been thoroughly instructed in the Bible. Even those who have attended the Sunday schools have merely learned the text and not the meaning of the text. Like the prophets of old, they have heard but understood not. The real reason for these conditions is that God's plan could not be understood until his due time to reveal it. HIS DUE TIME IS HERE. (Preface to The Harp of God, 1921)

"The mystery of God has been a stumbling block to both Jews and Christians, so-called; but in God's due time he WILL MAKE KNOWN to all the secret of his mystery and then all rightly exercised by this will rejoice with exceeding joy." (Harp of God, p. 182)

"The mystery is THE CHRIST...(ibid. ,p.l82) The Christ is the instrument or channel for the blessing of mankind. THE CHRIST IS COMPOSED OF JESUS, THE GREAT AND MIGHTY HEAD, AND 144,000 MEMBERS. (ibid, p.187)

"Jehovah has so arranged that only those who have their minds illuminated...can understand and appreciate the mystery of God. These are the ones designated by the prophet Joel as the servants and handmaidens of God..." (ibid., p.190)

ANALYSIS

Concerning the revelation of the "mystery" Col. 1:24-27 says,

"...the mystery which hath been hid for ages and from generations, but NOW is made manifest to his saints..." When Paul wrote "this mystery is NOW made manifest" it was 19 centuries ago.

This is just one of several scriptures that say the same thing. Rom. 16:25-26 and I Cor. 2:7-10 were both written by Paul and both declare that the "mystery" which had been "hid" was revealed to all the nations in Paul's day.

The Gnostic Rutherford would have us believe that he is revealing to the world the mystery knowledge for the first time.

However Jude in his epistle in verse three says, "contend for the faith which was once delivered (the ASV "once for all") unto the saints.

Were Christians to receive a better new message at some future point? Paul warns the Christians that "the faith" that was once delivered is the one and only gospel, and that if an angel (spirit being) or man brings another gospel, whether better or worse which Paul had not preached then let him be cursed. See Gal. 1:8,9.

Don't let anyone fool you. The church of the first century knew this Mystery and proclaimed it to the world. Mt. 28:18-20, Mk. 16:15,16. Yes, the Mystery had been on the mind of God since the beginning of the world, and had been only partially revealed in the Old Testament and the prophets. Read Eph. 3:1-2 and we find that

1. the mystery was revealed to him-verse 3,
2. when the Christians read Paul's letter they could perceive his understanding of the mystery. They understood it then.
3. We see in verse 5 that the "mystery" was revealed to the apostles and the prophets by the Spirit.
4. Paul's mission was to MAKE ALL MEN see what was the dispensation of the mystery for ages which had been hid in God.

We are told that "in God's good time he will pour out his spirit upon all mankind, so that all can understand his wonderful plan." (The Harp of God, p. 190) Yet, the Bible verse that this is quoting and the reference to this on p. 190 which is Joel 2:28,29 is applied by Peter in the New Testament to what was happening back on the day of Pentecost, "This is THAT spoken through the prophet Joel." They misunderstand the meaning Joel gives to " all flesh"- he doesn't mean every person that has ever lived, but rather all kinds of people Jew and Gentile, Greek and Egyptian, and they were all there at Pentecost.

It is clear from II Tim. 2:15 that the day when the mystery was revealed partially by inspired men and women is over. The revelation of God's will is complete; and now we should study the written Revelation. This only makes sense.

Rutherford says, "Those who are thus anointed have the spirit of the Lord and by virtue of his spirit are ABLE TO UNDERSTAND THE MYSTERY OF GOD..."

The Holy Spirit inspired the writers. He does not have to inspire the readers. If so, there was no point in inspiring the writers. It does not require an inspired man to interpret an inspired man. If so, the first inspired man's book is not a REVELATION, but still a MYSTERY. If we can not understand the first inspired man, how can we understand the second inspired man. Especially if they are inspired by the same Holy Spirit.

Gnostic leaders like the power that comes from people having to come to them for enlightment. Even if the Bible is not understood by a man, because he is so carnal that he can't think straight, he doesn't need to go to a man like Rutherford. (Read more about Joseph Rutherford in especially chapters 1.12 & 1.14.) The reason Christ went away, according to Christ was so that the Holy Spirit would be sent to teach us all things.

A further study of Christ and his relationship to the despised common masses of people, would show that he was advocating the opposite of Gnosticism. His wisdom was not hid under a bushel basket, but set on a hill, so to speak, for all to learn and profit from. Also Christ ministered and befriended those of every social class, including government officials and gentiles. God wants to reconcile himself to everyone, not just to some inner clique.

Jesus Christ also taught the limitations of knowledge (gnosis).

MAN-MADE NEW ORDERS

Christ's atoning work is totally overlooked by popular "theology" that the New World Order is trying to get people hooked on. One of these is called "Liberation Theology". Naturally, they are going to give it a good label. Liberation Theology has as its goal the creation of a man-made Kingdom of God on earth, a millenium. This Millenial kingdom is to be a One-World socialist (Marxist) government such as Cuba and Russia's communist regime. The use of a promised Millenium by the New World Order will be discussed in Chapter 2.5. For now, we will touch on LT here simply to point it out as another religious scam. People are told if they through violent revolution create a Marxist socialist One-World government, then they will have the classless Utopian society Jesus supposedly tried to set up. People today are killing in the name of Liberation Theology, blindly fighting for their own enslavement. The plans of the New Order over a century ago were to make us demand what they wanted to do to us. Under the religious trappings of "Liberation Theology" many people are helping create what is planned already to be the worst slave state in mankind's history.

Even if Liberation Theology through communism could satify man's material needs, Jesus said "Man does not live by bread alone." "Take heed and beware of covetousness, for a man's life consisteth not in the abundance of the things which he possesseth."Lk 12:15 Why? Because man is an organic unity of body, spirit, and soul. To neglect the spiritual side is to ignore part of man's nature. Further their program will fail even on the material needs, for those administering communism are full of greed, lust for power, pride and selfishness. Christ said, "out of the heart of man proceed evil thoughts—all evil comes from within and defiles the man."Mk 7:21-23 The Bible's age old wisdom was that unless God builds the house, they labor in vain who build it. That can equally be applied to theology. Men are building religions, God builds men's faith in Him.

In any case, being religious or not being religious, will not solve the basic problem of man. The action of a pig rolling in the mud does not make him a pig. He won't become a lamb if stops rolling in the mud. Likewise, man and creation are disordered and sinful by nature. Whether man "rolls" in religion or doesn't roll, doesn't change man's nature either, and so knowledge doesn't reconcile man to God. God reconciles man to God.

Man has been working hard to create a New World Order without the new heart God has offered him. (Ezekiel 18:31, 36:26, Jeremiah 31:33b, Deut. 30:6)

FINAL WRAP UP

Gnostic Religions create instant power bases for their administrators—whatever those administrators are called Priests, Rabbis, Swamis, Guru's, etc. The gnostic religions follow a pattern. The various leaders at the very top of these various authority pyramids are collaborating. (You'll learn much more on this further on in this book.) The bottom line is that what appears as perhaps fifty or one hundred religious "scams" are components of one single conspiracy for ultimate world power.

Judaism comes from Babylon. For those who like the ancient mystery religions you will want to thank the Jews. Jews have been one of the best instruments for spreading gnosticism in its various forms.

Christ's teachings and mission was the opposite of gnosticism. Christ was the predicted method that God had for revealing Himself to those who were seeking Him. Faith in God through Christ Jesus is not a power religion. Rather than trying to hide knowledge, Christ tried to spread his good message by calling on his disciples to "go into the whole world teaching", and to do good to all even those who despitefully would abuse them.

It was appropriate to give some background information at this point for the general readership. 1 didn't want to bog the reader down in footnotes and details of events at this point, because this information about W.W. II is not vital to the discussion at hand. Readers are encouraged to investigate several of the books now available that cover the Conspiracy's role in W.W. II. The whole story from how it looked at the top has never been told, but hopefully this summary will be helpful.

Chapter 1.4
A RAINBOW OF DRAGONS

You will learn in this chapter:

- some of the stock tools of the conspiracy
- the history of the Church Universal & Triumphant, John Birch Society, & the Theosophical Society
- the connections between the CUT, the JBS, & the TS with Freemasonry.

No wise person would knowingly choose to fight their opponent blind and deaf, yet that seems to be the choice which many nominal Christians are choosing. They would like to characterize this book as doomsdayer stuff and then dismiss and ignore this material. They want to eat, drink and be happy. This book has nothing to do with a dooms day, if Christians suffer for Truth that can only be a wonderful testimony of love for their Lord Jesus, who is the Way, the Truth, and the real Life. (Christians are not seeking martrydom, but the chance to stand for the Truth revealed in Christ is a chance to honor their creator for his love.)

This book has to do with recording what people involved with the Power have planned, and why they can carry out their plans. Further it will give you things you can do to counter the Power. While you may perhaps shudder at the thought of World War III, you should be aware that many people have been deceived to look forward to an Armageddon. Not only are these people planning and looking forward to it, but they have been blaming its assumed arrival on Christians for several years.<#1. Various New Age leaders preach the power of collective consciousness (which belief is a type of belief in magic). Some of these New Agers speak and write that Christianity's belief in Armageddon is the reason it will occur, that Christians are Willing it to happen.> If people think that by putting their heads in the sand they can escape the future, or even the present difficulties, they may be in for a rude surprise.

So how is the adversary of freedom building a One-World-Religion? Several items are stock tools,

a. What they call Blinds- these are deliberate deceptions placed within their own writings to confuse the uninitiated. H.P.B. gives a good description of the use of these, so do Masonic writers like Albert Pike.<#2. H.P.B. writing describes the use of Blinds in The Secret Doctrine, (Vol. 5 Adyar edition), p. 435.>

b. They use Deflection to redirect the power of truth which is opposed to them. Healthy foods, benevolence, ecology, love, acceptance, etc. are all part of the Creator's Christian walk. These truths and other are deflected from their original purpose of glorifying the Creator to glorifying their own programs. Rather than publicly opposing Christianity, they rename their own movements Christian, and then proceed to do very little for Christ, and everything for Lucifer. They are even deflecting worship of Jesus Christ onto worship of a demon named Jesus.<#3. Kurt Billings, an ex-New Age leader now a sincere Christian has been giving his testimony around the United States, he was a New Ager who infiltrated churches and as a church leader channeled a demon named Jesus.>

c. They use Hegelian Dialectics. This dialectic process doesn't happen on its own so it often has to be forced into happening. The idea is that each idea ("ism") called a "thesis", like say Capitalism, naturally by definition has an opposite, an "antithesis". In Capitalism the antithesis is Communism. The conflict between the two produces a synthesis. By controlling both ends of the conflict, one controls the end product, the synthesis. More than not, the One-World-Power can be seen working behind both sides of many conflicts. Indeed, the Secret Societies have been historically shown to be behind all the revolutions and wars in Modern Europe since the American Revolution. In religious conflict, both sides are often being manipulated. Some of the various groups openly admit their strategy is designed to create a synthesis. You will find Hegelian Dialectics has been introduced into the U.S. educational system by the Skull & Bones Order (considered an Illuminati group). It was adopted in Russia by the Slavophiles in the 19th century. Communism, Nazism, Fabians, most New Age groups, Liberation Theology, and other parts of the Power use Hegelian Dialectics. Hegel in turn based his system on the ancient Greek atomists especially Democritus.

d. The New World Order's One-World-Religion is organized on the SPIN principle.

WHAT IS THE SPIN PRINCIPLE?

This concept is to be the topic of this section.

S-P-I-N = Segmented Polycentric Integrated Networks

If one were to diagram a SPIN organizational chart it would not be a conventional box type configuration such as an army company organization chart. Rather, it would resemble a fish-net with interlocking nodes with groups linked to many other groups and cluster around nodes. There is no center to the network. It is like the brain's electrical connections, with an overlap of functions, so that good cells can take over from damaged sections. A network (one of their buzzwords) is many times more greater than the sum of its parts.

The New Age author Marilyn Ferguson does an excellent job in describing how the Conspiracy's SPIN network functions.

"This is a source of power never before tapped in history: multiple self-sufficient social movements linked for a whole array of goals whose accomplishment would transform every aspect of contemporary life.

"Because SPINs are so qualitatively different in organization and impact from bureaucracies...most people don't see them—or think they are conspiracies. Often networks take similar action without conferring with each other simply because they share so many assumptions. It might also be said that the shared assumptions are the collusion.

"The Aquarian Conspiracy is, in effect, a SPIN of SPINs, a network of many networks aimed at social transformation. The Aquarian Conspiracy is indeed loose, segmented, evolutionary, redundant. Its center is everywhere. Although many social movements and mutual-help groups are represented in its alliances, its life does not hinge on any of them."<#4. Ferguson, Marilyn. The Aquarian Conspiracy. Los Angeles, CA: J.P. Tarcher. Inc, 1980, p. 217.>

Organisationally, the SPIN principle has worked wonders for the Illuminati, who are the Illumined Ones who are directed by an angel of light variously called Venus, Lucifer, Satan, or Sanat (a scrambling of Satan). Different groups have their own preferred name for this Master. Almost without fail their literature and art provide enough in each case to positively identify this Being of Light Lucifer as the Ascended Master of every Illuminated group. Sources that have been near the top of the hierarchies of these various groups reveal that the "alliances" are not as loose as the public pictures them. The top leaders are actually in contact and collusion together. Further, the New Age movement is producing all kinds of organizational charts, Yellow Pages, coordinating councils between groups such as the Unity in Diversity Council, etc. The movement is not as leaderless as the New Age Movement likes to pretend.

Further, while their SPIN network is powerful, it is much more manmade and artificial than people can imagine. Groups that supposedly just materialize out of nothing, are actually funded and promoted from the start by an outside source.

While the New Agers pride themselves on their SPIN strategy, the followers of Christ have been configured the same way for centuries.

It must be admitted that several interlocking Secret Cults, the Freemasons, the CIA (the Company), and MI6 (the Firm) control much of the world. Through allied groups such as the B'ai B'rith (the Order), the Skull and Bones Order (the Order), the KGB, the Triads, the Mafia, the Order of Jesuits (the Company), and the MOUSSAD their control extends even further. Finally, there are a plethora of religious groups interwoven into the whole SPIN network. Some like the Universal Aquarian Church, the Metaphysical Church in America, Light of Christ Community Church, the Institutes for the Enhancement of Life Energy and Creativity (IELEC) in NY, Children of God's ashram, and the Church Universal & Triumphant are openly New Age religious bodies. Unity School of Christianity in Unity Villiage, MO is a training center for the New Age where Luciferian initiations have been conducted for years. Lucis Trust functions as part of the brain of the New Age movement, and the Findhorn Foundation in Scotland is comparable to the Vatican City of the New Age movement. Today the Illuminati are also known by the esoteric (inside) name of Royal Ipsimus (Ipsimus is Latin for "Master of the Household.")

It is not impossible to draw diagrams showing the seed, producing its rotten fruit, producing seed, producing fruit, producing a host of seed, etc. The Spin diagrams in this book are an attempt to begin showing the development of their SPIN of SPINs.

THE DEVELOPMENT OF PSYC & EDUCATION SPINs

Let us take for instance, Karl Kasimir Wundt (1744-84), a German professor and member of the Bavarian Illuminati. His son was Maximilian (1787-1846), whose son was William Maximilian Wundt (1832-1920). Wilhelm Maximilian Wundt was influenced by Johann Herbart who was a student of Hegelian Dialectics. Herbart's mentors were Illuminati. Wilhelm Mazimilian Wundt then influenced Daniel Coit Gilman and G. Stanley Hall, who were Americans who went to Germany to study. Daniel Coit Gilman and G. Stanley Hall were very influential to introduce Hegelian ideas into American education. John Dewey was influenced by Gilman and in turn influenced many other in the American Educational System.<#5. Researchers have available the documents confiscated from the Bavarian Illuminati and published by the Bavarian government. These are in German entitled Originalschriften des Illuminaten Ordens, Zweite Abteilung, see p.65. Also see Klass, Lance J. and Paoli Lionni. The Leipzig Connection. Sheridan, OR: The Delphian Press, 1967. This book traces the Wundt link to Amer. Education. Anthony C. Sutton, America's Secret Establishment. Boring, OR: CPA Book Pub., 1986, pp. 81-111 (and other pages) does an excellent job of tracing how Hegelian ideas were propogated throughout the American Educational System and Psyc. departments by the Order.>

This is just a single line of influence. When one considers some of the other important U.S. educators that learned Hegelian ideas from Wundt it is easy to picture how a vast network of interlocking schools of education and departments of psychology were established. Other Americans taught by Wundt and the number of doctorates they awarded up to 1948 are:<#6. Sutton, America's Secret Establishment, p. 91.>

THE DEVELOPMENT OF THE CHURCH UNIVERSAL & TRIUMPHANT NODE

Another line of influence by the Illuminati can be seen in the illumination of the leaders of the Continental Masons in the 18th century. Illuminated puppets like the Portugese Jew Martinez de Pasqualis went from Germany to France and initiated various people and started various Secret illuminated groups. As a result Grand Orient Masonry was illuminated, and so was Co-Masonry on the continent. The illuminatus Giuseppe (Joseph) Mazzini (1805-1872), who belonged to several Secret Societies, the Scottish Rite, the Grand Orient, Carbonari, Young Italy, Young Ireland, the 1st Communist International, initiated Helena Petrovna Blavatsky into Carbonarism (a type of Masonry) in 1856. Helena Petrovna Blavatsky (she went by the initials H.P.B.) had already met the magician mentor of Mazzini in 1848 in Asia Minor. After her initiation by Mazzini, H.P.B. claimed she was illumined by the Hierarchy of the Great White Lodge in 1856. George Felt of the Hermetic Brotherhood of Luxor also was a big influence on H.P.B.

After 1866, she was also under the influence of the Mason hypnotist and spiritist Victor Michal.<#7. Que'non, Rene'. Le Theosophisme, 1921, p. 14.>

H.P.Blavatsky was also initiated into the Order of Druses, the Adoptive branch of the Ancient and Primitive rite of Masonry (1877), and the Rites of Memphis and Mizraim. In the Grand Orient Adoptive Masonry she held the highest rank, a Crowned Princess 12. With the help of the Rosicrucian Masters, H.P.B started the Theosophical Society. The socialist and occultist Herbert Burrows, a member of the Stella Matutina (a Masonic occult spinoff from the Golden Dawn), introduced the Co-Mason Annie Besant to H.P.B. in 1889. In 1887, H.P.B. started a Theosophical magazine called Lucifer the light-bringer.

Annie Besant took over the illuminated Theosophical Society. Annie Besant bungled her job in creating a Christ in the early 1920s, so her job was given to Alice Ann Bailey. Alice Ann Bailey decided (or rubber-stamped) revised secret plans to keep the work low key until 1975. 1975 would be the big year. Meanwhile, she wrote numerous influential books, and in 1922 established Lucifer Publishing, and Lucifer Trust, later changed to Lucis.

Early in the 1930s, a couple named Edna and Guy Ballard received illumination, and started the I AM movement. The St. Germain Press publishes items such as the monthy periodical The Voice of the I AM. Guy borrows much of his ideas from Alice Bailey, the Rosicrucians, and the Masons. Two of his books Unveiled Mysteries and The Magic Presence sound masonic. His messages he received from the Great White Brotherhood seem like a regurgitation of what others had also received.

Mark and Elizabeth Clare Prophet began as a spin-off of the I AM movement in the late 1950s. In 1958, they started Summit University to train initiates of their Church Universal and Triumphant (CUT).

The I AM movement feels that CUT stole their picture of St. Germain, and have started using a different picture in order to assert their separateness. Even though they don't cooperate officially, the I AM movement and the Church Universal and Triumphant are nearly identical in beliefs.

What has been covered is how the lineage of Illumination has been passed down from generation to generation in a series of spin-offs. Although there is no publicly known connection between the Church Universal and Triumphant and the Masons, it will be worthwhile to examine this movement. Although the lineal descent is a direct one between CUT and the Masons, few people would on their own see any connection between the two.

THE CHURCH UNIVERSAL & TRIUMPHANT

It was the spring of 1990 and the Montanans in Paradise Valley were showing concern toward their new neighbors who had bought 33,000 acres near Yellowstone National Park.<#8. Wilhelm, Maria, "An angry publisher fights to save the valley called Paradise." People Weekly Dec. 24, '90, p.38. See also Reid, T.R., "Montanans feel 'invaded' by survivalist church; tensions rise over "Guru Ma', followers." The Washington Post (April 22, 1990), p. A3 col. 1.> The National Park people were getting upset too at these new neighbors, who called themselves Church Universal & Triumphant. Problems, like the sect's fuel tanks leaking, had the park people unhappy.<#9. The National Parks, a Periodical put out by the U.S. National Parks, discusses in short articles in the Jan-Feb., the Jul-Aug, and the Sept-Oct. issues problems the Yellowstone National Park was having with the CUT.> An ex-member Kenneth Polini, who had served as the sect's security chief, was telling the newspapers that the sect could end up to be another Jonestown.<#10. Texe Marrs gives as his source for this in his New Age Cults & Religions, p. 171 an article in the Spokane Chronicle however an examination of the last few years of the Spokane Chronicle didn't reveal any such article. He did get the information from some source apparently. This is one quote that I am not able to verify.> The Prophet's oldest daughter Moira Lewis had to be thrown out of the CUT, when it became apparent that she didn't believe in it. Now Moira Lewis was talking, and talking to the anti-cult ministries.

The Booklet has a Christmas Message and is accompanied with a record. Malibu, CA: CUT, 1969, p.7.> El Morya is identified in CUT literature as Chohan of the First Ray, Master of the Lodges of Perfection.<#12. CUT Broshure with a mountain scene with El Morya's words "The trek upwards is worth the inconvenience" on back and "the Messenger" E. C. Prophet on the front. p.2.> Those familiar with Masonry know what the Lodges of Perfection are.

Elizabeth Clare Prophet is now running CUT. She claims that El Morya, Chief of the Darjeeling Council of the Great White Brotherhood is using her to channel messages so that the earth can be raised once again into a Golden Age.

Elizabeth tells her followers, "If you would like to be counted among the avant-garde who are advancing the cause of this Revolution, read and meditate upon El Morya's words."<#13. ibid., Quote is from the 6th paragraph on front.>

Elizabeth Clare Prophet not only has the name Prophet, but she claims to be one. Not only does she look divine (at least in the photos released to the public), but she claims to be divine. Not only does she have weekly handouts called "Pearls of Wisdom", but her 3rd ex-husband Randall King reports she is getting wealthy from her followers. And that's not all.

One of the first items that struck me about Elizabeth Clare Prophet's Theology is how Masonic it sounded. Since Elizabeth Prophet states she is continueing the Ballard's work--not with Mrs. Ballard's approval though—it is not surprising the two groups are alike. But the CUT doesn't talk about any Masonic connections. Sure they sell Masonic books, and they do use the Masonic Temples for their meetings, but they make clear to her followers that even though Masonry is O.K., her church is a big advancement over Masonic believes. The truth is, her teachings and the Ballard's are just a rehash of Masonic beliefs. They even invoke (pray to) the Masonic All-Seeing-Eye as the Elohim Cyclopea. Their Knight Commander is St. Germain.<#14. The title Knight Commander has been used at various times by CUT in the "Knight Commander St. Germain." Knight Commander St. Germain supposedly addressed CUT on May 3,1981, and this is referred to in a letter by James W. McCaffrey, CUT Board of Directors.> (Since they do not see St. Germain, but accept that their prophet channels his messages, it means that their Knight Commander is in reality the person supposedly channeling him.) People in the I AM movement also study Masonic and Theosophical books for spiritual knowledge.<#15. Interviews and visits with ex-I AM members and members of the I AM movements by Author.>

IS CUT PART OF AN ILLUMINED NETWORK?

It is not inconceivable that this Illumined Religion is part of the Illuminati network. Interestingly, the winged-globe which is the symbol of the Illuminati and Rosicrucians is on the cover of Elizabeth Prophet's book Teachings of the Ascended Masters. The Rosicrucian belief is that the Winged Sun Disk represents the Elysian Fields. CUT also believes in the Elysian Fields. Another link to the Illuminati is CUT's use of Enochian Magic and its 7 planes. Repeatedly, references to these 7 planes of existence crop up in CUT inner teachings given to the Fraternity of the Keepers of the Flame.<#16. 1969 Christmas Message, p.4.>

ALL UNDER THE AUTHORITY OF THE GREAT WHITE BROTHERHOOD

Elizabeth Clare Prophet has emphatically made a big issue that she is following orders from the Great White Brotherhood. The Great White Brotherhood is the same group that Bailey, H.P.B., the Rosicrucians and the Esoteric Masons follow. Note, they are following the same authority. The Masonic Book Ancient Mystic Oriental Masonry, (1907) written based on information from the highest Masonic authorities, states on pg. 79, "THE UNDERLYING PRINCIPLE. 114 "The Ancient Wisdom Religion is the Thread-soul' on which are strung all the various incarnations and encasements of the religious life,...Begotten by that Spiritual Hierarchy—the Great White Brotherhood—in whose guardianship is the evolution of the human race..." The next page tells how the "Great White Brotherhood" is known in Ancient Mystic Oriental Masonry as the 11th degree. (Is this a Blind?) Students of the Supreme Initiation will see "The Beautiful Philosophy of Initiation," by the Count M. de St. Vincent.

An Illumined Chief of one of the occult branches of the English Masonic Lodge of Rosicruciana in Anglia— called Stella Matutina— left it, became a Christian. This ex-Chief's book Light-bearers of Darkness clearly details how the Illuminati (Illumined ones) are lead by the Great White Lodge and that the Illumined ones in that day (1930) were far more powerful than people imagined, and that they were in all kinds of groups. "These secret societies, formed when needed, are detached into groups distinct and apparently opposed, professing respectively and in turn the most contrary opinions of the day, so as to direct, apart and with confidence, all parties, political, religious, economic, and literary." (Light-Bearers of Darkness, p.2)

Another follower of the occult, Tal Brooke, who was the top Western disciple of India's miracle-working god-man Sai Baba, also like the Stella Matutina chief, became a Christian and also wrote a book When The World Will Be As One warning people about Elizabeth Clare Prophet, the Fabians, the New Age agenda and the Masons who are promoting it.

The highest Masonic authorities teach that illumination like Elizabeth Clare Prophet practices was part of the Mystery Religions. Elizabeth Clare Prophet often uses the Illuminati 3-dot symbol when she signs her initial. How ironic that her teachings are being passed off as so fresh and new, yet are the very ancient superstitions that men practiced long ago.

In the Secret Teachings of All Ages, "The Mysteries taught that spiritual illumination was attained only by bringing the lower nature up to a certain standard of efficiency and purity. The Mysteries were therefore established for the purpose of unfolding the nature of man according to certain fixed rules which, when faithfully followed, elevated the human consciousness to a point where it was capable of cognizing its own constitution and the true purpose of existence. This knowledge...of spiritual illumination constituted the secret, or esoteric doctrine of antiquity. Certain apparently physical organs and centers are in reality the veils or sheaths of spiritual center."<#17. Hall, The Secret Teachings of All Ages, p. LXXVI.>

This is the issue at stake here. Is CUT a manmade or demonic authority, and therefore a false authority or is it the Almighty God's authority?

Although CUT claims to be Christian and use the Bible, it advocates and teaches Magic. For instance, "We seek to raise the veil upon the wonderful world of Cosmic Magic, the Magic of believing in the Power of the original Intent which may then be blazed as the all-consuming Love of God..." (Pearls of Wisdom, 3/26/67, p. 3)<#18. Another example is Pearls of Wisdom, 6/25/67, front page aka p.53.>

It is not the job of this book to enlist the reader to champion this Author's religious doctrinal understandings. The issue is more important than that. A world-wide authority is being created through the actions of separate nodes of a SPIN of SPINs. This authority plans to someday be absolute. They will cleanse the world like Hitler's Final Solution of the Jews. Hundreds of people who have come out of CUT or had family members in it, are warning that this is a deception that has destroyed people's lives and families. Judging on the basis of where CUT came from, who they are friends with, and what Masonic and Illuminati tactics are, it is a safe bet that there is some kind of colloboration at the top by Elizabeth Clare Prophet with Secret Societies. Indications are that it is part of a vast scheme to establish a One-World-Government.

Elizabeth Clare Prophet has no problem getting on the radio, and getting publicity. Obviously, she has connections. Although she heralds her own group as the Church, she has appeared with other New Age leaders on radio talk shows. She does seem to work with them on some level. Her Summit University, started in 1958<#19. Pearls of Wisdom, on the back pages of for example July, 31,1977 Vol. 20, No.31, Malibu, CA: CUT, p.148.> is not shabby. Her "Fraternity of Keepers of the Flame" as she calls her initiates learn such things as astrology, crystals, white magic, Hinduism (reincarnation, karma, meditation, chakra points), how to decree, how to dress, and how to become divine at Summit University. Her religion itself is quite organized with several presses, computer operators, Montessori Preschool Elementary and High School people, cooks, accountants, planning and development people, purchasing, and the whole nine yards.<#20. Notes, Summit University Student.>

How does she finance all her expensive advertising and constant travelling? How did her husband and her finance things in the beginning when they established Summit University, and their headquarters in Colorado Springs, and their house in Santa Barbara? Details about Elizabeth Clare Prophet and her Organization are hard to come by.

If she can keep recruiting new people, her finances may do all right. If a person gets serious about being part of her organization, they are expected to make a once in a lifetime gift of everything they have to the CUT controlled by Elizabeth Clare Prophet.<#21. Notes, Summit University Student and Confidential Interviews After that they are expected to tithe (one-tenth).<#22. Church Universal and Triumphant Tenets, Colorado Springs, CO: 1975, p.12 under Art. XII Law of the Tithe.> In return, they are initiated into what I call "the supreme Grand Flattery", "You shall become an enlightened God."

The Keepers of the Flame were told "We don't have any dollars to increase our staff until we have more dollars coming in from person in the world. Your love and service here should draw in enough supplies to cover all your needs."<#23. Notes, Summit University Student.>

When students are invited onto staff it is a commitment. They are told, "Your life will never be your own again, but was it ever your own?" They have already been taught "Ascension Keys". Elizabeth Clare Prophet tells her students that to Ascend to Godhead is their birthright,<#24. Pearls of Wisdom, Vol. X, No. 23, (June 4, 1967), The Summit Lighthouse, p. 41 -"...has robbed men of the birthright of their Ascension..."> the divine right of everyperson.<#25. Pearls of Wisdom, Vol. X, No. 19, (May 7,1967), The Summit Lighthouse, p. 24 - "The Divine Right is the Immortal Plan...Inherent pattern of unique Christ manifestation..."> In the Ascension Dossier of Serapis Bey they are told "The capacity of the externalized self must be given in toto." Also- "You must abandone your past to God." In Lanello's Message(a channeled message), 4/20/73 the students are told, "You do not have to wait for the carnal mind to evolve, for the carnal mind will never evolve. It must be put off and cast into the Flame."<#26. Lanello 4/20/73 in the Pearls of Wisdom, Vol. 16, #32, 8/12/1973.>

In Serapis, Ascension Class they are told, "The Ascension Flame is the Flame of Mother."

"Men prove the Law by doing the Law. They see Truth by becoming Truth."<#27. Serapis, Dossier 6/4/67.> "All things are relative except the Absolute."<#28. El Morya, Ascension Class, covering the Ascension Keys.>

There are many interesting parallels between CUT and the WT Society. Both make a big show of being against the system, the United Nations and the people uniting the world. However, neither group ever mentions the Masons in connection with plans to bring in a one-world-state. The religious side of the One-World-Power can not be understood with out an awareness of Freemasonry. While supposedly warning their adherents of those men who control the world, both CUT and the WT Society carry out a systematic program to condition their people to believe in a soon-to-come Golden Age, and training people how to act in it. It's this writer's conviction that it is not so criticaly dangerous to the One-World-State for these people to know something of what is happening, because their leadership, who they blindly follow, are part of the One-World-Religion. According to CUT, Jesus was Chohan of the age that ended, now a new cycle is starting with Sanat in charge.<#29. Pearls of Wisdom, (Mar. 26, 1967), Summit Lighthouse, p. 1. Another reference is Prophet, E.C.. Prophecy for the 1980s, p. 10.>

Elizabeth Prophet writes about the coming Armageddon, "There's a certain sense in America that it can't happen here, that somehow we are a favorite or chosen people, that we will not go the way of a Rome or an Atlantis or a Lemuria—that somehow it will be different. And yet collectively, as far as the entire consciousness of the earth goes, we are Lemuria, Atlantis, Babylon, Assyria, Rome come again. We are the melting pot and the descendants of all of these movements..."

"We speak of the age of Pisces as the two-thousand cycle of Jesus Christ that is coming to its conclusion, and we feel the winds of a new age that is called Aquarius."

"The state of the world is perilous....The coming, then, of the Four Horsemen is actually the prophecy of a planetary initiation. Those horsemen could not ride except by the flow of events, by the karma of the people. They are bringing to our very doorstep the forces that we have set in motion as a planet, as mankind, for centuries."<#30. Prophet, Elizabeth Clare. Prophecy for the 1980's. Los Angeles, CA: Summit University Press, 1982, paragraphs quoted from p. 24,10, and 12 respectively.> "And so the Great Initiator of life stands before us and says, These are the causes (cause of Disaster and Armageddon) you have set in motion, humanity."<#31. ibid., p. 13.>

What Elizabeth Clare Prophet has just said is that the people of the world are creating the forces to bring about Armaggeddon. It is their karma. A great Initiator is waiting for the time of planetary initiation. Jesus Christ's time is passed, the leadership has passed to another Chohan.

In spite of all the time CUT spends teaching its people about the Conspiracy of the Communists, the International Financiers, the CFR, etc. when Elizabeth Prophet makes statements like this above she is shifting the blame for wars and W.W. Ill from those who control the world to the common people. If she only succeeds in this propaganda ploy, she will have accomplished a great favor for the One-World-State.

The common people of the world are not directing world events. For instance, it was not the common people of either Iraq, Kuwait nor the U.S. that had anything to do with Operation Desert Storm and Desert Shield. In fact, months before Kuwait was invaded the Trilateral Commission had decided at the White House that Iraq was to be the focus of a disarmament program. As nothing was attempted politically, it is clear that they had planned a military disarmament program.

CUT initiates received a letter, "Keeper of the Flame: the need for harmony and love between all the masters servants united in a common effort cannot be overemphasized. Working and serving together, we form a mandala of light through which the masters of the Great White Brotherhood will awaken humanity."<#32. Letter by CUT Chairman of the Outreach Committee Michael Veys to the Fraternity of the Keepers of the Flame, c. 1980.>

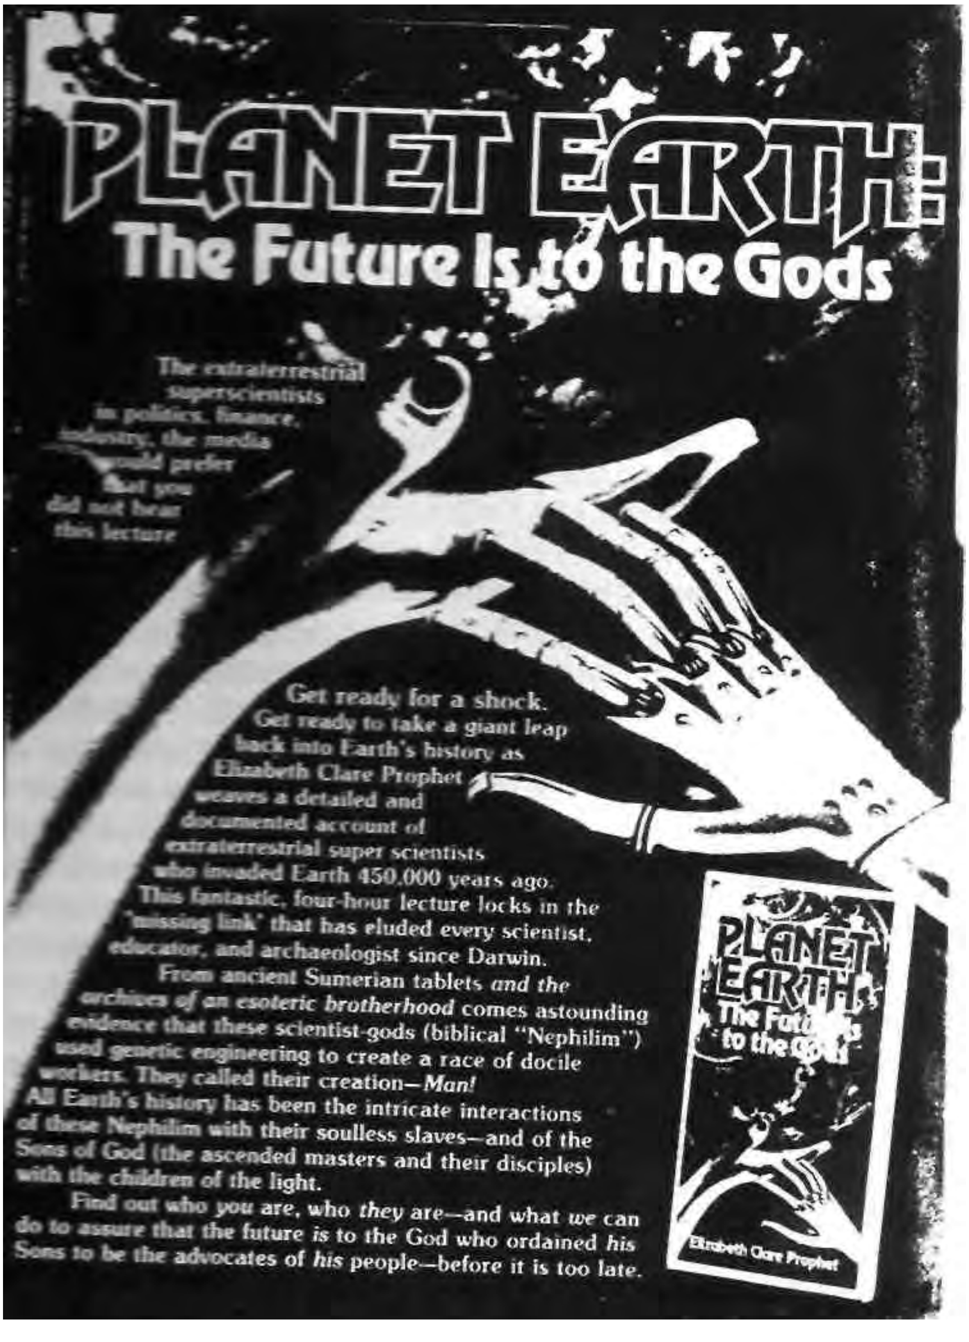
CAPTURING BY USING FEAR

CUT is a New Age Religion designed to catch the conservative elements, that would shun most New Age groups. CUT preaches against Communism, the Feminist Movement, Abortion, Drugs, the Trilateral Commission, the Bankers, and uncontrolled immigration from Mexico. It is in favor of survivalist tactics, political activism, wearing business suits, and looking clean cut. If one looks at where they have concentrated their activities one notices they have worked in some very conservative western areas, Colorado, Montana, Idaho, Washington, and Arizona. (California is also an important center of activity but hardly a bastion of conservatism.)

When I contemplated the hoax that Church Universal and Triumphant is apparently carrying out among the conservatives in Western United States, I was reminded of a fishing trip years ago. In 1969, several Germans and I went out to a small German island in the North Sea. We strung a net across a river, went downstream and entered into the river. We walked upstream toward the net. The fish were afraid of being caught by us. They swam into the net. We reached the net, pulled the net to shore and filled two large baskets full of big good tasting flounder. It's one of my favorite fishing trips.

The people in the Western U.S. are like these flounder. They are aware that big powers are trying to control their lives. They are trying to get away from the One-World-State Power. And so what do they do? They swim right into the very conservative CUT, and are easy pickings for the One-World-Religion.

To gain the great advantages of Hegelian Philosophy— the One-World-Power has been behind both extremes. But this can only work if the people being deceived and manipulated, don't realize that the same people are behind different groups.



PLANET EARTH:
The Future Is to the Gods

The extraterrestrial superscientists in politics, finance, industry, the media would prefer that you did not hear this lecture

Get ready for a shock. Get ready to take a giant leap back into Earth's history as Elizabeth Clare Prophet weaves a detailed and documented account of extraterrestrial super scientists who invaded Earth 450,000 years ago. This fantastic, four-hour lecture locks in the 'missing link' that has eluded every scientist, educator, and archaeologist since Darwin.

From ancient Sumerian tablets and the archives of an esoteric brotherhood comes astounding evidence that these scientist-gods (biblical "Nephilim") used genetic engineering to create a race of docile workers. They called their creation—Man! All Earth's history has been the intricate interactions of these Nephilim with their soulless slaves—and of the Sons of God (the ascended masters and their disciples) with the children of the light.

Find out who you are, who they are—and what we can do to assure that the future is to the God who ordained his Sons to be the advocates of his people—before it is too late.

One thing that Elizabeth Clare Prophet may be commended upon, it is her willingness to give some of the best occult knowledge to her followers. In her catalog she sells Raymond Bernard's The Hollow Earth. An ex-high level New Age disciple Troy Lawrence tells us that the masses are told Shamballa the home of the Spirit Masters is in Tibet but, "The initiated know something different. They know that Shamballah is the region of the hollow earth. The spiritual region where the King of the World and his Master dwell." The Spirit Masters have told the highest level occultists who are sold out to them that the earth is hollow. For instance, Pam Davis was told by a spirit, "Do you not know that the center of your Earth, it is not that which has been spoken by your scientists, the bubbling of the molten rocks, it is beauteous. It is home for thousands upon thousands of Beings that have lived there in totality of harmony and understanding of love." ("The Power of One," Life Times (Winter 86/87), p. 84.)

Elizabeth Clare Prophet is infatuated with the Great Pyramid like H.P.B. and C.T. Russell. She has produced an illustrated program with 8 cassettes entitled A Retreat on the Ascension, which includes lectures on the inner mysteries of the Great Pyramid. The Great Pyramid has long been held by esoteric groups as an initiation center. Some confidential sources speak of gaining godlike power from the pyramid. The occult leaders of the One World Power have held that the Great Pyramid's King's chamber is an initiation center for godhood.

CUT teachings are heralded as 'Spiritual wisdom uniting east and west."<#33. Quote from the banner of Pearls of Wisdom. The idea of being the religion of unity between east and west is heralded by CUT In other places too

The teachings (supposedly from the Ascended Masters) are a brew of Hinduism with Buddhist thought and Christian terminology. Add a heavy dose of Mariology from the Catholics with Fatima, and sprinkle in bits and pieces of other things from other sources and stir this brew, and you will come up with CUT 's beliefs. They basically are another Gnostic Mystery Cult Whether one identifies CUT as having the I AM movement's beliefs, or Masonry's, or the Gnostic Mysteries is perhaps moot, they are all about the same. Let's look at some of the similarity of CUT with Masonry before CUT was even thought of.

ITEMS OF SIMILARITY- THE TRIBE OF MANASSEH IS THE USA

The first item of similarity between Elizabeth Clare Prophets teachings and Masonry is the belief that the Tribe of Ephraim is Great Britian and the Tribe of Manasseh is America.<#34. Notes from a local CUT meetings.>

In the Masonic book, Mystic Americanism we are told The theme of the entire Bible centers around a hope of a glorious country afar off, in an age that was to come. The crowning event of the allegory of the Twelve Tribes of Israel—the one and one-half tribe of Jewish and the rest Christian origin—culminates in Manasseh (America) and Ephraim (Christ's Kingdom) as sons of Joseph (Great Britian). Most important of all is the story of the Woman (Revelation: 12) who fled into the wilderness (secrecy)' but who is to return and, in a glorious nation, defeat the Dragon by reopening the ancient teachings of the Holy Grail (Illumination of the Soul)."<#35. Mystic Americanism. Quakertown, PA: The Philosophical Pub. Co.> Parentheses are part of the quote.

This and other beliefs of various groups are lumped together under the label British—Israelism. A strain of British-Israelism appears in Masonry from its inception.<#36.

Hodson, John Milton, William H. Upton, et. al. Masonic History of the Northwest. San Francisco, CA: the History Pub. Co., 1902, p. 71. In the Royal Arch degree in England "the presiding officer is the Prince and heir to the Jewish throne, ZERUBBABEL (being descended in the direct line from King Solomon), and as such represents the King..." In America, after the Amer. Revol. the heir to the Jewish throne JERUBBABEL was replaced in the American Lodges with the High Priest. And the Prophet in the third chair was replaced with a scribe. In England, in the Royal Arch degree ritual mention is made in regards to the Messiah, but no in America. Apparently, the mission was to keep safeguarded the Royal Blood, and apparently that Royal Blood stayed in England. The mission of the Royal Arch degree changed, "it became the ally of the English Government and Church." The British exert power over the Americans.> Considering that Masonry began in the British Isles, and that Masonry has had universal goals from its earliest times, this is not surprising. However, it is not clear to this author why the various Masonic groups work so closely with the Askinazim Jews, and haven't elevated the Sephardic Jews. For instance, the British Royal Family which has been prominant in Freemasonry and believes in British-Israelism,<#37. Numerous Masonic sources parade the lists of Kings, Princes, etc. that are Masons. The Kings themselves have made public comments publicly endorsing the belief they are the decendants of the House of David.> has been very congenial with Jews. Cecil Rhodes, who believed the One-World-State would be British, included Lord Rothschild on his roundtable. The Mormon leaders, who believe in British-Israelism, have had close relations with the Jews, and although they should know better, have totally ignored the fact that the Askenazim Jews are not genetically related to the Childen of Israel. They apply prophecy to those Jews because they are supposedly the right seed, and then ignore the historical evidence they never were genetically that seed.<#38. LDS McConkie's writings on prophecy.> Even the Mormon leaders who have access to the world's genealogical records, are pro-Askinazim Jew. Elizabeth Clare Prophet's teachings have been a welter of contradictions. While condeming the Bavarian Illuminati in talks, she also has taught about how great Sir Francis Bacon, who she believes started Masonry, is. She points out to her people how the Masonic Temples have the words I AM on them, to support her I AM beliefs.<#39. Notes from a CUT class.>

In 1723, Dr. Abadie, a protestant apologist, put forth the view that the lost ten tribes were the people of the British Isles.<#40. Gaebelein, Dr. A.C. World Prospects, cf. Gaebelein's art. in Our Hope, Jan. 1932 issue.> However the idea predated Abadie by half a century. Oliver Cromwell was convinced that the British were Israelites. He was not only active in Masonry, but was the person who brought the Jews back to England in 1655, after their expulsion. Some contend it was money that motivated Cromwell to bring the Jews to England. Interestingly, it was the discovery of Jews in China by the Jesuits that allowed Cromwell to justify allowing Jews into England. Rabbi ben Israel who lived across the street from Rembrandt in Amsterdam corresponded with Cromwell. (The Rabbi was also responsible for the philosopher Spinoza's education. Spinoza made his own contribution to the moral demise of Western Civilization.) The Rabbi brought out the phamplet "Spes Israelis" (latin for "The Hope of Israel" or in Heb. "Mikveh Israel"). Using a Biblical passage that the Jews were to be found at two ends of the earth, and declaring the recently found Chinese Jews as one end, he argued that Biblically the other end of the earth was...Portugal (well, at first it was Portugal—but then the Rabbi realized England had more commercial profit potential so he reworded his tract to say...)England. Yes, the Rabbi declared that Biblically the Jews were at both ends of the earth, and since England had no Jews then the British must be Jewish. If Jewish, then how could they forbid other Jews from coming in. Since then, others have built on the Rabbi's idea.

The dual marriage of Jacob with his wives Leah and Rachel was referred to as "two bands" (Gen. 32:10). These are the "two sticks" that the Mormons,<#41. The LDS Mormons appeal to the Book of Mormon. 1 Ne. 5:5 and Alma 46:23-24 are used to explain that the America's are for the Tribe of Joseph.> and various Masons believe in. If Britain is Ephraim and the United States is Manasseh,<#42. Edward Hine in 1871 published his theory that Great Britain was Ephraim and America was Manasseh.> how did the United States become Manasseh? The United States began with such settlers as the Pilgrims who were British, therefore Ephraimites. This particular version seems illogical. Another version is that that the sons of Joseph (Great Britian) culminate in Manasseh (America) and Ephraim (Christ's Kingdom). This last idea carries an eerie aura about it to this Author. The symbology of the Tribe of Manasseh is the Olive Branch and the Arrows (associated with Joseph's bow).<#43. Scriptures that are used to illustrate the tie-ins between Manassah's heraldry and scripture are Gen. 4:22-24 (bow and arrows) and Rm 11:24 (which were always pictured as Olive Branches.)> (One common symbol of the Tribe of Dan is the eagle<#44. The best British-Israelism examination of the heraldry of the Tribes of Israel and British Heraldry is W.H. Bennett, Symbols fo Our Celto-Saxon Heritage. Stanhope Press, Kent, Eng., 1976.> the other is the serpent or snake. The American eagle- that would be Dan- controls the other two tribes' symbols. The best book in showing archeological evidence concerning the fate of the ten tribes of Israel is Missing Links Discovered by E. Raymond Capt. Critics of British-Israelism owe it to themselves to read this.) One of the symbols of the Tribe of Ephraim is the Unicorn. But the Unicorn according to Alice Bailey stands for the God-man, the Christ-man, the Illumined New Race coming in the New Order. The horn of the Unicorn on the third-eye chakra point indicating illumination by Lucifer. This Author hasn't seen Ephraim's symbols matched with their New Age meaning in the context of the idea that Ephraim is Christ's Kingdom soon-to-be established, but when it is, the "two-sticks"-belief matches itself to the New Agers Millenial belief.

SPECIAL COLORS

Another interesting parallel is that in some areas Masons wear a special color of clothes on certain days.<#45. Confidential interview with a Christian who the Masons had intended to recruit.> The Church Universal and Triumphant also assigns certain colors to be worn on different days.<#46. Confidential interviews with ex-I AM & ex-CUT members, and class materials of Summit Univ. Due to the large influx of new converts, it has been difficult for CUT to keep up the teachings on wearing different colored clothing during different times of the day, and for different days. Newer converts may be unaware of this teachings The colors of purple and white are especially esteemed.

ASTROLOGY

A perusal of Summit University course material shows that the astrology information that CUT teaches its Fraternity of Keepers of the Flame is the same type of astrological items that others have taught before. The extra meanings assigned the various 12 signs can also be found in the Mason Manly P. Hall's book The Secret Teachings of All Ages. Both CUT and Masonry use Astrology as a way to get people interested in their teachings. The first three degrees of Masonry are called the Blue Lodge because the color blue is associated with the skies and astrology.

RAYS & VIBRATIONS

As a matter of fact, the real reason is scientific to the last analysis; scientific to a degree beyond the penetration, up to the present time, of the 'radiant matter' of the Roentgen Ray of Modern Science. THE SOUL IS AN EMANATION OF DEITY

Masonic Source that matches CUT teachings- "That the Soul is an emanation of Deity, and in its original essence is all purity, truth, and wisdom, is an axiom which the disembodied learn,...These sparks of heavenly fire become Souls, and as the effect must share in the nature of the cause, the fire which warms into life, also illuminates into Light, hence the Soul emanations from the Divine are all Love and Heat, whilst the illumination of Light, which streams ever from the great Central Sun of Being, irradiates all Souls with corresponding beams of Light." "Says Bro. Buck again: "Humanity in toto is the only Personal God; the Christos is the realization, or perfection of this Divine Persona, in Individual conscious experience. HEALING BY CORRECT VIBRATIONS

Masonic Source that matches CUT teachings- "The second method of healing was by vibration. The inharmonies of the bodies were neutralized by chanting spells and intoning the sacred names or by playing upon musical instruments and singing. THE IMPORTANCE OF "I AM"

Masonic Source that matches CUT teachings- "By these 'rites and benefits,' the Freemason is, above all men, in our so-called Modern Civilization, the nearest to the Ancient Wisdom. He has possession of the territory in which lie concealed the Crown Jewels of Wisdom. He may content himself, if he will, by merely turning over the sod...he may rise untrammeled by the rubbish of the temple, and, meeting Elohim face to face, learn also to say 'I am that I am!'" MYSTICAL FLAME

Masonic Source that matches CUT teachings- "The mysteries have now, as throughout the long ages past, for their foundation, the existence of God, as Jehovah Adonai— the Father of Light— and the Immortality of the Soul, which Soul, in the language of the Initiates, is and always must be, an ever-burning Fire, a Light that must be brought into close relationship with the Father of all Light from which it originally came." The Mysticism of Masonry, p. 19

" "Cast not thy seed upon the ground"..."Lest it become a serpent and rend thee") and the search for its recovery (the retention or exchange, the raising and transmutation of the seed into the Fire or Light of the Soul); the tradition of the Ineffable Name in connection with the Lost Word (finding the Soul's Light and through the Fire being able to come face to face with the Soul's Creator, the Father of Light..." The Mysticism of Masonry, p.46

NEED FOR MAN TO BE A GOD

Masonic Source that matches CUT teachings- "As the earth groans for the lordship of superior beings to rule over them, the spirits of distant Edens hear the whispers of the tempting Serpent (desire, longing), the animal principle, the urgent intellect, which appealing to the blest Souls in their distant paradises, fill them with indescibable longings for change, for broader vistas of knowledge, for mightier powers; they would be as the gods and know good and evil." The Mysticism of Masonry, p.12

An example of this from Elizabeth Clare Prophet's teachings is this quote, "The challenge of all the great revolutionaries of all time, East and West, has been to subdue that sacred fire, to channel it, to make contact with it, to interact with it, to integrate with it. The 1980s are a decade of reintegration with the sacred fire that all of the world's great revolutionaries—for good, for God—have contacted.

"A lack of self-knowledge and knowledge of the Self in and as this God-potential has set the limits of our social and technological progress." Prophecy for the 1980s, p.17. (Bold added.)

Her description of this fire corresponds perfectly with the occult masonic groups who started communism from the 1840s the 1870s. An excellent history of the Masonic belief in this "fire" which started so many revolutions is found in the well researched book Fire In the Minds of Men by James Billington.

HUMANITY IN TOTAL IS GOD

Masonic Source that matches CUT teachings- "Humanity in toto is the only personal God; the Christos is the realization or the perfection of this divine Persona, in (through) individual conscious experience. When this perfection is realized, the state is called Christos..." The Mysticism of Masonry, p. 14

VARIOUS LEVELS OF INITIATION

As this is common knowledge concerning Masons, the first quote will be from CUT's Pearls of Wisdom (The Ascended Master's Weekly Newsletter) Apr. 9,1967, p.10. "...where are the staunch ones applying to Us today for Initiation into the highest steps here at Luxor?" CUT doesn't have the multitude of levels like Masonry though.

Some of the other beliefs that the two share in common are a. the idea of invocations b. the old order must be destroyed so that a Golden Age of Illumined Ones can be established, c. the hierarchy is the mediator, not Christ d. Satan is the animal nature in man preventing him from becoming a God, e. the Ancient of Days in scripture is Sanat (the scrambling of Satan). These concepts are taught until one get high up in Masonry or goes into one of the more occultic masonic rites. Similar to the Jehovah's Witnesses she believes in a literal 144,000.

C.U.T. FITS A PATTERN

There are some people who will be disatisfied with this chapter. They will want harder proof. Yet, these same people very likely accept many things without any proof. If they didn't they wouldn't be part of mainstream America.

For instance, you are told that this country is a democracy. Democracy means the people vote and decide everything. Everything in a real democracy is decided by what is called a referemdum today. Very little is decided by referemdum today. Has anyone shown you proof this is a democracy? Have you ever asked?

I have found that those who object to this information are those who have not studied the subjects at all. CUT. fits a pattern that has been repeated over and over. Either it is part of the pattern which can be shown to be Masonic or it's an exception to the rule. If CUT. is really against the New World Order (it depends what part of their literature you read, because they do want a Global Interdependence of Spiritual Ones, they only claim to be against a Global Political Union), it is interesting that the system cooperates with them so much.

On the surface they appear to some to be against the CFR/International Bankers, etc. They teach their members the dangers that these men pose in conjunction with international communism. On the otherhand in their tract "What is The Summit Lighthouse?" they end the tract saying "The Summit Lighthouse sheds its beams o'er the earth and releases into manifestation the symbol for the coming Golden Age—"Destiny, not dust!" Unless a person is aware of the connections between the Rockefellers and the Masons and the New Age movement, the common person will not be able to see Hegelian dialectics being used.

While conservatives join CUT., it is not likely very many of them caught a little clause that CUT. put into its Christmas Day, 1981 Declaration of International Interpendence. Line 8 from the bottom states, "Therefore, as divinely blessed individuals...the citizens of planet Earth have the right...to call for a constitutional convention to found their nation under God;..." Elizabeth Prophet has repeatedly stated Sanat Kumara was the leader of the Great White Lodge Hierarchy and God.<#48 Just one example of many where Sanat (Satan) is identified as a God by Elizabeth Clare Prophet is her 1979 Christmas message, p. 2. "Yes, my chelas have sung for you and for me the message of Sanat Kumara, the Great Bodhisattva, known to Daniel and the prophets of Israel as the Ancient of Days. In his name we say, "Arise, shine; for thy light is come, and the glory of the LORD is risen upon thee!...This great bodhisattva who revealed himself to Moses in the person of Jehovah and to Ezekiel as the fire infolding itself, to the soul of Gautama as the Buddha, to Zarathustra as Ahura Mazda, and to the Hindus as the "Eternal Youth" has appeared to humanity in every epoch of earth's changes, signaling the beginning and the ending of cycles..." Not only does she identify Sanat with Jehovah, but also Buddha and Ahura Mazda of the Mazdians. Another example is Pearls of Wisdom, Vol. X No. 13, (Mar. 26, 1967), p. 1 "The name, Ancient of Days, refers to Sanat Kumara, Hierarch of Venus, Who came to earth millions of years ago...">. Here in effect is a call for a constitutional convention to establish either the U.S. or world government under Sanat. (It is not exactly clear which nation is being spoken about that is to call this constitutional convention.) Who are the forces calling for a Constitutional Convention? William Still links these forces to the CFR, the Rockefeller Foundation, the Brookings Institute and the World Federalists in his expose.<#49. Still, William T. New World Order The Ancient Plan of Secret Societies. Lafayette, LA, Huntington House, 1990. Chapter 15 covers the Constitutional assult.>

An example of an organization that has been created by the One-World-Power, that functions in much the same capacity as the C.U.T. is the John Birch Society. Both groups are so conservative that they stick out as extreme. Elizabeth Clare Prophet likes the John Birch Society and speaks good things about it. The John Birch Society was created as the Anti-thesis of communism, much in the same way that C.U.T. siphons off the conservative element that dislikes long hair and dirty clothes, etc. but theologically is attracted to the New Age. A 32 degree Mason named Robert Welch<#50. Braddock, James E. The John Birch Society An Enigma. Bumsville, MN: Weisman Publications, p.13 states "Welch, being a well proven 32nd degree Mason, jumped at the chance to aide and abet in the furtherance of the destruction of Christianity." CPA has access to a Masonic document showing Welch's membership. Perhaps the first to claim Robert Welch was a Mason was Dr. Stuart Crane. Eustice Mullins also received information that Welch was a Mason from confidential sources. Braddock's research has been well-received by a number of prominent ex-John Birchers.> started the John Birch Society in 1958. For the Board of Directors for the John Birch Society he chose men from the Council of Foreign Relations (CFR). As JBS policy, he had an Anti-communist but pro-Jewish stance. After Welch had the JBS started, he received a large sum of money from the Rockefellers. Braddock states, "Robert Welch...heir to, the Welch Candy Company... Nelson [Rockefeller] purchased the company for a price that was three times the asking price but with the condition that Robert would head the new John Birch Society."<#51. Braddock, op. cit.p. 13.>

So the American people got more Hegelian Dialectics. And many conservative people who sincerely wanted to save and defend the United States gave their money, time and allegiance to this Society. Many rich conservative Americans gave their money to the John Birch Society to fight the Anti-American forces. The John Birch Society was able to siphon off much resistance that could have been really damaging to the One-World-Power, and waste that concern and money of resistance into a make-believe battle against communism.

Many of the highly knowledgeable people who joined the John Birch Society, such as Dr. R.P. Oliver, Dr. Draskovich, Brig. Gen. G. Mohr, along with the three Directors of Public Relations and others realized they were be taken for a ride, and got off. The comments by these ex-John Birchers are a good testimony about the manufacture of an Antithesis by the New World Order. Some of their comments are<#52. Braddock, op. cit. various pages.>:

"The John Birch Society is a complete and deadly mirage in a vast desert of confusion that was purposefully designed and augmented to aid in that confusion..."— James E. Braddock

"Unlike other groups and organizations which International Zionism has gradually taken over, the John Birch Society was their own creation, to fulfill their own purposes—one world order and control."—Charles A. Weisman

"When you see the Jewish influence in the top echelon of the Society in the organizing Council of the JBS' and the Jewish money that is poured into the Society, you understand that, here again, is an organization that is set up by International Judaism as a neutralizing force for patriotic Americans."—Gen. Mohr

"I have resigned from the Council of the John Birch Society (and from the Society itself) because I can no longer in conscience remain a member. I have also resigned as Associate Editor of American Opinion and I will no longer contribute to that magazine." --Dr. Oliver

THE THEOSOPHICAL SOCIETY

Our modern rainbow of dragons was the direct result of the Theosophical Society. Helena P. Blavatsky (or H.P.B. as she called herself)(1831-1891) was sponsored by several occult groups to get the Theosophical Society started. A small group of Rosicrucian adepts were the primary sponsors of hers. The Great White Brotherhood was lurking in her background too. The Theosophical Society is also called Co-Masonry. Many of the leaders of the Theosophical Society have been women involved in the occult Masonic groups that admit women, and men who have been part of Masonry. (See the Appendix.)

In the book On The Watch-Tower by Sri Ram we are told that the Theosophical Society was working to unite Europe into one United States of Europe (p.570) and that eventually the only solution for mankind was a Federation of all the nations.(p. 571) The Primer of Theosophy states that the T. Society was started for two reasons a. to study Occultism and b. to spread Universal Brotherhood.<#53. American Section of the Theosophical Society. A Primer of Theosophy. Chicago, IL: The Rajput Press, 1911, p.110.>

The theosophical book A Primer of Theosophy tells us that "There are two presentations of the divine wisdom which are rounded and satisfying; that given by Theosophy and that of Masonry. No religion or exoteric philosophy can equal them in fullness or clearness."<#54. ibid., p. 61.>

WHO SHALL HEAD THE WOLRD GOVERNMENT THAT THE THEOSOPHICAL SOCIETY WANTS?

Interestingly, the Theosophical Society feels that Freemasonry and itself teach the clear divine wisdom. H.P. Blavatsky, founder of the Theosophical Society tells us that the God of the Bible is "a tribal God and no more"<#55 Blavatsky, H.P. Collected Writings, Vol. 8. Theosophical Publishing House, p. 277> who is "capricious and unjust."<#56 Blavatsky, H.P. The Key to Theosophy. Chicago: Theosophical Publishing House, 1930, p.111.>

H.P.B. felt that Lucifer was the Savior of mankind and that the God of the Bible was really the adversary of man, hence the name Satan described God better than Lucifer.

"The appellation Sa'tan, in Hebrew Satan, and Adversary...belongs by right to the first and cruelest "Adversary" of all other Gods—Jehovah; not to the serpent which spoke only words of sympathy and wisdom."—Blavatsky, The Secret Doctrine, Vol. 3. Los Angeles: Theosophy Co., 1925, p. 386.

H.P. Blavatsky, a Jewess, tells us, "Once the key to Genesis is in our hands, the scientific and symbolical Kabbala unveils the secret. The Great Serpent of the Garden of Eden and the "Lord God" are identical."— The Secret Doctrine, Vol. 2, p. 132.

"Satan, the Serpent of Genesis is the real creator and benefactor, the Father of Spiritual mankind. For it is he...who opened the eyes [of Adam]...And he who was the first to whisper, "in the day ye eat thereof, ye shall be as Elohim, knowing good and evil." can only be regarded in the light of a savior....he still remains in Esoteric Truth the ever loving messenger...who conferred on us spiritual instead of physical immortality."—The Secret Doctrine, Vol.3, p.246.

H.P.B. and her Society hate the Christians who they see as "fighting against divine truth, when repudiating and slandering the Dragon of Esoteric Divine Wisdom."—The Secret Doctrine, Vol. 3, p.376.

When we study further we discover that the global initiation spoken of by the T.S. is a Luciferian initiation, and the Second Coming of Christ means that a "Christ consciousness" of man's divinity returns to the human race.

Although people who follow the Theosophical Society initially may join for personal development or enlightment and do not realize the ultimate goal, the ultimate goal of the Theosophical Society is a One-World-Government with H.P.B.'s "Lord God" ruling. Christians refer to her God as Satan, the Devil.

MASONS & THE T.S.

Manly P. Hall, 33° Mason, was an important Theosophical leader. He could really pack the audiances in when he spoke to their groups. Many Anglo-American Masons study Theosophy. Theosophic books are placed into the Masonic Libraries. Theosophy is another way to describe Hinduism, or the New Age teachings. A visit to a Theosophic Library will reveal that they carry books on witchcraft, Judaism, as well as all the various topics of the New Age movement.

T.S.'S INNER CIRCLE & DIVISIONS

The E.S. or Esoteric Section, also known as the Eastern School of Theosophy is the inner secret circle. This inner circle has itself several levels.

The Theosophical Society divided into two competing groups. The major group has its international headquarter in Madras, India with its American headquarters in Wheaton, Il. The other group had its headquarters in Covina, CA and also in San Diego, CA.

The American Theosophical Society has its Quest Publishing house at Wheaton. Interestingly, the name Manly P. Hall gives the to the Order whose job is to preserve the plans for the take over of the world is called by him the Order of the Quest. The Theosophical library at Wheaton called the Olcott Library and Research Center is one of the best occultic collections anywhere.

The two Theosophical Societies have made their greatest impacts in the British nations U.K/Can./Aust./N.Z./India and the United States. They have also been very popular in the Scandinavian countries and Germany.

Episcopalian clergymen have been active in both Theosophical groups. Alice Ann Bailey who took over the leadership in the 1920s, had taught in the Episcopalian church and was married to an Episcopal rector. Alice Bailey did as much for Theosophy as did H.P.B. Bailey is still influencing our culture today. She felt the number 666 was sacred. One of the Theosophical Society's publications is Lucifer. Bailey started Lucifer Trust now called Lucis Trust. She helped create the vast network of New Age groups. Lucis Trust has continued promoting the number 666.

THE THEOSOPHICAL SOCIETY LOGO SHOWS US THE BLEND OF THE OCCULT MASONIC ELEMENTS (circle of snake), MARRIED TO JUDAISM (Star of David), ALONG WITH THE MYSTERY RELIGIONS (Egyptian ankh), and HINDUISM (the Devanagari letters) AND ITS RELATIONSHIP TO ITS GRANDDAUGHTER SPIN-OFF NAZISM (the Swastika).

The Watchtower Society has a number of teachings, symbols, etc. that match up with the Theosophical Society's. More about these later.

PROMINENT THEOSOPHICAL LEADERS

Two prominent leaders that were involved with the Theosophical Society were Mahatma Gandhi and Adolf Hitler. Mahatma Gandhi was interested in learning about Christianity until H.P.B., who pretended to be a Christian convinced him Hinduism had more to offer. Gandhi joined the Theosophical Society. The impetus for India's independence to a large degree came from the Theosophical Society. Ann Besant the second Theosophical President was instrumental in changing British attitudes. India's political leadership has been closely connected with the Theosophical Society ever since independence, including several Gandhis and Jawaharlal Nehru.

Hitler learned much of his occult knowledge from the Theosophical Society, although credit needs to be given to his occult mentors at the Benedictine monastery school who got him off onto the occult trail. Hitler spent much of his time in occult bookstores learning metaphysics. He also had several adepts in white and black magic instruct him. In Vienna, Hitler joined a modern German version of the Knights Templars, a German Masonic group called "The Order of the New Templars." The swastika was their emblem. The Theosophical Society even today continues to use the swastika as one of their emblems.

The Theosophical Society has also included such genius inventors as the co-workers Thomas Edison and Nichola Tesla. It has included such writers as George Bernard Shaw and William Butler Yeats.

It is possible that the Dalai Lama is also associated with them.

Elvis Presley was a Theosophist. For a discussion on how the New World Order has promoted the New Age religion through musicians see chapter 2.10.

THEOSOPHICAL SOC
LOGO

Theosophist John H. Dewey wrote, "It is not proposed, be it observed, to replace Christianity by Buddhism, nor Buddhism by Mohammedism, nor both by Judaism, nor yet all three by Spiritism, but to bring each of the old religions back to its esoteric origin, meaning and purity, and if they are found to be in essence one, shall we not have found the TRUE RELIGION OF HUMANITY?"<#57. Dewey, John H., The Way The Truth and The Life. Buffalo, NY: 1888, pp.11-12.>

RECAPPING THE CHAPTER

One of the ways this chapter can be recapped is to quote part a letter written in 1822 by a Jewish Mason Piccolo Tigre to the Italian Piedmontese lodges of the Carbonari (forest Masons).

"...it has been judged good and useful to propogate the light everywhere, and to set in motion all that aspires to move. For this reason we do not cease to recommend to you, to affiliate persons of every class to every manner of association, no matter of what kind, only provided that mystery and secrecy should be the dominant characteristics. All Italy is covered with religious confraternities, and with penitents of divers colours. Do not fear to slip in some of your people into the very midst of these flocks, led as they are by stupid devotion. Let our agents study with care the personnel of these..."<#58. Dillon, George E. Grand Orient Freemasonry Unmasked. London: Britons Pub. Society, 1950, p. 58.>

The letter goes on to show how to create societies and associations, how to separate men from their families, and to use secrets as bait to lead men where you want them. Masons continue even today creating new societies and associations and infiltrating those that they haven't created.

Lafayette, LA: Huntington House, 1991. This book was written under an assumed name by someone who became a Christian while working for the Tara Center. After much secret work, and access to much confidential information, the book's author was able to identify who Lord Maitreya is.>

1991-George Bush, Mikael Gorbechov meet with Lord Maitreya off of Malta.

YET TO COME- "The Day of Declaration" when Rahmat Ahmad is presented to the world as Lord Maitreya.

Rahmat Ahmad is to be the next leader of the Sufi Moslems. The Sufis have secret societies around the world and rule in most of the Arab states. There are now about 14 million Ahmadis who give total allegience to whoever holds the position that Rahmat Ahmad is to inherit. His title translates "Successor of Messiah." Why might the New World Order pick Rahmat Ahmad to be their King/Priest? The Sufi Moslems are tied to Freemasonry, the Knights Templars, and the Theosophic Society. A visit to a Theosophical Society Library will allow the reader to see that they have a good selection of books on Sufism. Sufism is a mysticism that holds that man can become illuminated and divine. Although it is called Moslem, it has no more to do with the Moslem religion than the Rosicrucians have to do with Christianity. Sufism is New Age mysticism, similar to Hinduism.

It is reported that Col. Quaddafi of Libya is a Sufi or a Sufi supporter. When Quaddafi when came to power, he repressed the Moslem clergy, even shut down a few mosques and made the moslem clergy subservient to him. This may help explain why CIA agents with ties to Freemasonry would help him. Although he puts out loud speeches threatening the United States, he appears to be working in close cooperation with the New World Order; at the least he is unwittingly helping carry out some of their goals. It further explains why when travel to Libya was supposedly prohibited to all Americans, Knight of Malta and U.S. diplomat to the Vatican William Wilson was visiting Sufi Quaddafi. One of the American oil companies that continued operating quietly in Libya during all the big press releases of tensions and the U.S. air attack, was headed by J. Peter Grace, who is the head of the Knights of Malta in the United States.<#60 Cooper, William. Behold A Pale Horse. Sedona, AZ: Light Technology Pub., 1991, pp. 87-88.> Quaddafi proposes in his Green Book a synthesis of Communism and Capitalism.

The Buddhists are looking for a Lord Maitreya (the fifth Buddha) to return. Some of the Jews are looking for a Messiah, and the Shiite Muslims are looking for Imman Madhi. The Hindus are expecting the Bodhisattva (Kalki) or Krishna. The Tara Center, which promotes the Lord Maitreya, hopes to play upon all these various expectations.

Great expense and great plans are to be used to convince the world of his divinity. The Establishment media is ready to be used for promoting Lord Maitreya. A number of indicators seemed to indicated that the new messiah would have a Jewish Lineage of the House of David. If Rhamat Ahmad is not of the House of David, and it appears he isn't, then it may well be that Ahmad is not the prized leader that they plan to set up as a King/Priest.

The Tara Center often uses the pyramid with the all-seeing eye which is a masonic symbol. The Tara Center has ties to Freemasonry. Tara worship is linked to Freemasonry, and has been practiced by the Druids and the Hindus. Tara Hill in Ireland is a worship center for Druid worship.

The Tara center believes in a One-World-Socialist government with revitalized Freemasonry as the world's religion. People are being told man will become divine under this New World Order. (Sadly, the truth is they will become slaves. And slaves of Satanists have been the most pitilessly abused slaves of all.)

SUMMARY

The New World Order has a Pakistani man named Rhamat Ahmad ready to be revealed as the Lord Maitreya. His identity has been a secret only known to a handful of men. The New Agers, the Masons, and the Sufi, and some of the Buddhists can be counted on to worship him, if the Power decides to go ahead and use him. He may be the bridge between East and West that the Power is hoping to create for his One-World-government.

Chapter 1.5
Mysteries of the Watchtower Society

You will learn in this chapter:

- You will be informed that the winged-sun-disk used by H.P.B and C.T. Russell was an Illuminati symbol and a symbol for the Church of Illumination.
- You will learn about three mysteries of the Watchtower Society, pyramids, the Golden Age, and the winged-sun-disk.
- You will examine Charles T. Russell and his sun worship.

I remember the first time I came in contact with Jehovah's Witness literature. I was in high school, and as the caretaker of our family library I puzzled over the symbolic meaning to the cover. Two tiny snakes with protruding gold tongues encircled a Winged globe on the book's reddish-brown cover. The book was part of a series "Studies in the Scriptures". What the symbolic meaning of this strange Winged-Sun-Disk with snakes was not explained. Obviously, the meaning was for those "in the know" and not the casual reader.

The author of "Studies in the Scripture" spoke of a Golden Age to come. He capitalized in bold underlined letters on each volume's title page THE GOLDEN AGE OF

Russell had a fold out chart in the front of Vol. 1 about the Great Pyramid. | was unaware of who Russell was, and unable to realize the implications of all this. I do, however, remember those first impressions as a Christian in high school "this is weird."

Where did all these strange beliefs come from? It doesn't take much to pique the curiosity of my research oriented mind. My teenage mind was always from early on searching in an effort to learn, checking out Plato, John Dewey, Will Durant, Mahatma Gandhi, and many other philosophers and religious leaders. As a youngster, I was always asking why?

The curious can have a field day with the Jehovah's Witnesses. For instance, why call one's meeting place a hall? why not Kingdom meeting, or Kingdom assembly, or Kingdom study, or church, or chapel, or tabernacle, or temple, or something else? why hall?

Why all the secrecy? Why are the writers and leaders of the Watchtower Society clouded in secrecy? Why have no membership records been kept? The answer given, that it was a security measure in case of persecution didn't satisfy me. Why? Because other groups equally persecuted made other choices, choices that are not secretive. Others said, we trust God and are willing to suffer for Him, so why be secretive? What have we to hide?

The choice to be secretive is just that, a choice, a decision. And it was made at the top of the Watchtower pyramid, by the Watchtower President, and now by the Governing body. And this secretive attitude permeates down the pyramid to the rank and file Jehovah's Witnesses.

"I was interested in possibly joining the Jehovah's Witnesses," a stranger related to this author in a chance conversation, "but when I arrived at the Kingdom Hall, the meeting had begun. They had locked the door, there were no windows, and I didn't want anything to do with a secretive religion like that."

The answer to where Jehovah's Witnesses receive their strange beliefs, strange doctrines, and attitudes comes primarily from two men. Because primarily only two men, Charles Taze Russell and Joseph F. Rutherford made all the decisions of the Watchtower Society for the beginning sixty years.

Ray Franz who was an important Governing Body member stated that the first two Watchtower Bible and Tract Society Presidents "acted according to his own perogatives in exercising his presidential authority, with no hint of a governing body."[2]

Since these two WT leaders, two other Presidents have served, Knorr and Franz. But while Knorr administrated, Frederick Franz was the real religious leader. Governing Body member Klein referred to Fred Franz as their "oracle." But today their oracle is 97 years old, blind, and only a figurehead.

How does the researcher attempt to understand these problems and men?

Some of this Author's conclusions after years of research, is that there are certainly many pitfalls to investigating secretive organizations.

Material written by secretive organizations for the public's consumption are often loaded with fictictious information. Modern Masonic writers are quite frank that the early Masonic writers when writing about the lodge are not to be trusted.[3] Not every Mason author identifies himself as a Mason. The Masons have lied to show their legitimacy and antiquity. The Jehovah's Witnesses have done similar things, but have also deceived to gloss over doctrinal controversies, embarrassing scandals, anything that doesn't square with the image of being God's selfless, pristine perfect organization. Periodically they rewrite their history to match "present truth." The WT Society has been taken to task numerous times for scholastic dishonesty. Anyone familiar with the Mormon murders has a chance to know the elaborate deception the LDS (Mormon) church leaders have gone to, to preserve their power.[4] As the reader will discover, Masons and Mormons are given latitude to explore religious thought, within the limits given them, but the power and integrity of the leadership is an off-limits subject. Two insiders close to the top of LDS pyramid of power, Frank J. Cannon and John C. Bennett, revealed in their books some of the high-level working of the LDS church.[5] LDS members were forbidden to quote their sensitive material.

Both Masonic and non-Masonic writers often have an incorrect view that all Freemasons have a common purpose, common beliefs, and common methods. The higher Masonic leadership has goals which will be exposed in this book. The lower levels of Masonry are a cover, and for that purpose are permitted to have many ideas. Most Freemasons are limited in their knowledge of Freemasonry. The Freemason next door may regard his own personal experience, as universal of all Freemasonry. He may have only experienced the lodge in terms of a philanthropic fraternity, and has not bothered to study what Freemasonry has done historically, or what the higher levels reveal. Like army-grunts in the field, they have no knowledge of the high-level planning.

The Masons have clouded their activities. The higher degrees are called "side degrees" and they claim the higher degree aren't higher, but simply on the side. The truth seeker has to work his way through these ruses.

How does one investigate the strange masonic connections of the Watchtower Society, the Mormons, and other religious groups?

It's like being a policeman who comes upon a suspicious car accident. If he rules it "an accident", rather than a homicide, he will limit his approach in gathering clues. On the other hand, if he assumes the worst and views it as a homicide, he will collect all the evidence he can. This book is an attempt to gather evidence. Yes, the fact that the policeman gathers facts means he's suspicious. It doesn't mean anyone is guilty. For instance, just because C.T. Russell was a Mason, doesn't mean Jehovah's Witnesses today join Masonic Orders.

Now this Author can not actually take the reader through all the hoops of research he has jumped through to get to his conclusions. But he can pass some of it along in this book, along with his conclusions. This Author has concluded that the following statement of Manly P. Hall, a powerful Mason who was on the secret world council of thirteen,[6] is an accurate reflection of the power that the Masonic mystery religions feel they have.

"Under new names and, to a measure, with new interpretation, the old wisdom which guided the destinies of ancient peoples is being reconsidered and restored. It becomes increasingly more evident that wisdom and understanding alone can can bestow the security and happiness which all men still seek as the foundation of a useful life. The shadowy forms of the venerated sages and prophets of the Golden Age rise again, inviting our appreciation. Though long exiled from the sphere of mortal purposes, these noblest of men are being re-established as the great teachers of the human race. The mystery religions of antiquity, which flourished long before the rise of the modern way of life, have been brought into clear focus by progressive leaders in the fields of psychology and comparitive religion."[7]

Manly P. Hall is correct in that Hinduism is presented today under a new name "New Age Movement." And true, the Hindu forms of prayer, Yoga and Transcendental Meditation have a new interpretation, they are exercises to practice. And the venerated sages of Hinduism and Witchcraft have risen (and fallen like the "Bhagwan Shree" Rajneesh and Krishnamurti, and like New Age leaders Jim Jones and Adolf Hitler). However, progressive leaders have not brought the New Age movement into focus. That is why this book is needed.

The author's experiences in New Delhi, India were a real picture of the end result of the New Age beliefs. There are many clues around. For instance, this Author's stamp collection contained Indian Nationalist postage stamps printed by Nazi Germany, just a glimpse of the connection between the Hitler's promised thousand year Millenium, and the New Age New Order. The more clues a researcher finds the worse the story gets worse, much worse. No, progressive leaders have not brought the issues into clear focus. For those readers who are interested in stories of power, for those who do not want to be compliant servants of a New World Order, this book is written for you. Dedicated to those whose love of truth and freedom led them to pay the ultimate sacrifice, death.

Let's start by an examination of those three mysterious items of the founder of the Watchtower Society, Charles Taze Russell. Those were the winged-sun-disk, pyramids and the Golden Age to come. It is disconcerting to find that these items are three notable things discussed in Manly P. Half's classic reference book on esoteric Masonic knowledge, The Secret Teachings of All Ages. As we flip through Manly P. Hall's book page after page refer to a coming future Golden Age. We also stumble upon the winged-sun-disk (on page XLIX) which is explained as a solar trinity, and represents the various sun Gods of the ages. At least eight pages discuss pyramids in detail, especially the Great Pyramid that Pastor C.T. Russell wrote so much about. On page XLIII appears a Great Pyramid drawing from Piazzi Smyth, C.T. Russell's mentor. It is well established that Smyth was the mentor of the Watchtower Society's experts on the meaning of the Great Pyramid. Smyth was the source of both Manly P. Hall's esoteric Great Pyramid knowledge and C.T. Russell and the Edgar brothers' (well known WT lecturers on the Great Pyramid) knowledge.

IDEAS DON'T COME OUT OF A VACUUM

When something new appears it is good for us to remember there is nothing new under the sun.

I illustrated that point with a personal anecdote in my previous book The Watchtower & The Masons. (This book Be Wise As Serpents is going to go over some of the same material on the Watchtower Society as my previous book, but this time more details and better explanations will be brought to bear on the subject.)

Perhaps the reader can think of his or her own experience that taught him how we derive our ideas from sources, and not from out of a vacuum.

I marvel at how much continuity a modern people have with their ancestors. This point was highlighted one day. I was studying some ancient Egyptian cursive handwriting from the 19th Dynasty while waiting for my meal in a restaurant. My sample of cursive called hieratic was about 3,300 years old.

An arab approached me and started a conversation, because he thought I was reading Arabic. That caused me to reflect. The Egyptians had been conquered by the Assyrians, Persians, Greeks, and Romans, and had gone through using various scripts, yet they choose in relatively modern times to use the Arabic script which resembles hieratic. The word choose here is used on the premise people are responsible for their own actions. People tend to build, to adapt old ideas. People tend to borrow rather than create new. (As I did with this paragraph from from my earlier book.) When we see something "new" arrive in history, such as the alphabet, then it is valid to question where "new" ideas have come from. In the case of an alphabet, one looks for clues as to when it was introduced. "New" ideas rarely come from a vacuum.

If the researcher tracks down where Charles T. Russell's ideas come from he is led to a source that was a common source of other religions too. The researcher begins to see patterns, and to realize that religions stemming from the source of Russell all have a common goal. The rank and file of these groups are of course unaware of much of this, and are unwittingly contributing to a master plan.

RUSSELL & THE WINGED SUN DISK

In 1910, Russell made his second trip to the Egyptian pyramids. He went inside the Great Pyramid. When he returned, he informed the readers of the Watchtower magazine about the Pyramid's hidden message. He also instituted some big changes to the binding of his books. His Studies in the Scriptures received the Egyptian trinity Winged-Sun-Disk on their covers, and the other Watchtower books also received it. He also at the same time made an effort to look international stamping the binding of the covers either "London and Brooklyn" or "Brooklyn and London".

Another religious leader, Helena Petrovna Blavatsky, leader of the Theosophical Society, also used the Winged-Sun-Disk. She by coincidence also started putting it on her magazines Theosophy in 1912. She had also made a pilgrimage to the Great Pyramid, and like Russell had to go in and explore the passageways and chambers herself. She spent an entire night alone in the heart of the Great Pyramid in the King's chamber.

The Theosophical Society had a branch in Pittsburgh when Russell lived there, and also in Brooklyn where Russell reestablished. It would be hard to conceive that Russell never came into contact with this group. Especially since he writes about them, and mentions contact with Theosophists. Interestingly the man who was famous in the Irish Lodge of Theosophy was George W. Russell, who wrote for The Irish Theosophist. The Golden Dawn was a Society and the name of that Society's magazine that was started by a Mason in 1887. The Irish, especially George Russell, were attracted to this order and its Temple of Isis. The Temple of Isis used the Winged-Sun-Disk over its portals.

The tie-in with Masonry, the New Age, and the Theosophical Society is a close one. The Scottish Rite started the modern Rosicrucians who started HP. Blavatsky off with the Theosophical Society.[8] They financed her and her constant travels. The Grand Master of the Brotherhood of Luxor recommended H.P.B to Olcott with a letter written in gold ink on green paper.[9] Olcott, himself an active Mason, suggested to H.P.B. that they start the Theosophical Society using their group of Masons, Rosicrucians, Cabalists, and Spiritualists that were meeting in a NY apartment.[10] The Scottish Rite also has published for over 100 years the New Age magazine, and has promoted the New Age Movement from the Masonic Lodges. The publications of the Theosophical Society are stocked in the Masonic libraries and read by them. Most of the leaders of the modern Rosicrucians have been Masons. The leaders of the Theosophical Society have generally been women who were in co-Masonry. And the T.S. has also been called co-Masonry.[11] The Theosophical Society has openly promoted the New Age movement, in contrast with the Scottish Rite's quieter methods. The leaders of the Theosophical Society have been channelers,[12] which is interesting because so have the leaders of the Watchtower Society.[13] One of the books put out by a later president of the Theosophical Society is titled On the Watchtower.[14] It is a regular part of the Masonic Knights Templar's libraries, and is a selection of Theosophist articles. More on the meaning of Watchtowers and the parallels between the W.S. and the T.S. later.

WHERE THE SYMBOL CAME FROM

The investigator will find similar winged-globes in the pagan mystery religions of the Middle East, but this representation of the Winged-Sun-Disk originates in ancient Egypt. The meaning is derived from Ancient Egypt, and stands for Osirus (the Sun God), Horus, and Isis.

Those who study Egyptian Magic and practice it today use the symbol for its purported magical properties. "Emblematic of the element of air, this consists of a circle or solar-type disk enclosed by a pair of wings. In ritual magic it is suspended over the altar in an easterly direction and used when invoking the protection and co-operation of the sylphs." So says an expert on such magic in his book Practical Egyptian Magic.[15]

According to a book used by the Church of Illumination (Rosicrucian) to instruct on their teachings, "The Winged Globe is pre-eminently a Rosicrucian symbol, although the Illuminati may lay some claim to it, and it may be admitted that it is of Egyptian origin. The Winged Globe is the symbol of the perfected soul making its flight back to the source of its creation in Elysian fields beyond."[16]

It is also said to be the "house of many mansions", that is the God-like reasoning that man supposedly has.[17]

If one investigates further back into Rosicrucian thought one finds that the German Illuminati used the Winged-Sun-Disk. The use of the magic symbol goes back to the Kabbalah. The Kabbalists use it to portray Jehovah. However, their full explanation of who Jehovah is, is that Jehovah is the sun-god. He is to the Kabbalists the same as the Gnostic sun-god Demiurgus or the Greek almighty God Zeus, which name at times is used interchangably with Jehovah. The Jewish mystical thought that pervades Rosicrucian thinking then is seen in an illustration of a secret 16th Century Rosicrucian book Die Goldene Zeit (The Golden Age) which portrays the Winged disk with the magical Tetragrammaton in the sun globe's center.

From the sources quoted, the reader has learned that the Illuminati and Rosicrucians use the Winged-Sun-Disk. What about the Masons?

MASONIC USE OF THE WINGED-SUN-DISK

Upon achieving the 32 degree, the Mason is given Albert Pike's Morals and Dogma. It is now from the Pope of Masonry, Albert Pike, that the Mason learns that Phallic worship is the true worship of Masonry. However, an examination of Phallic worship, which is the worship of the regenerative parts is the same as sun worship, the sun being the symbol of regeneration.[18] The worship of the sun has often been sexual in its ritual. The Elysian fields that the Sun Trinity-the Winged Solar Disk represents are sexual rituals. Masonry itself claims to perpetuate the ancient mysteries of Isis and Osiris, Tammuz and Baal[19] which are Sun religions that ultimately are derived from a single common origin.

In Albert Churchward's (30° Mason) book Signs and Symbols of Primordal Man, The Evolution of Religious Doctrines from the Eschatology of the Ancient Egyptians, he states that the Winged-Sun-Disk is used by 33 degree Masons.

The 33rd degree is the highest public level of the Scottish Rite Masons. There are both honorary and actual operative 33 degree Masons. Notable persons, such as Presidents and leading clergymen are initiated into the 33rd degree. According to Churchward they alone know its meaning. However, exposure to the symbol is almost unavoidable to those Masons reading Theosophic literature.

"That's the sun disk Ra," exclaimed an active 32 degree Mason when this Author flashed Russell's cover of the Studies in the Scriptures.

"It's a Masonic symbol," this Author chimed in.

"No, it's not a Masonic symbol," came the reply.

"How did you know what it was?"

Complete silence. He had immediately recognized the symbol but refused to talk about it, or his knowledge about it. According to the Masonic oath they aren't to talk about Masonic knowledge.

QUESTIONS & OBJECTIONS

Some will object that if Russell went to Egypt he may have got the symbol from Egypt, and not from esoteric Masonic-connected groups.

It is true that it is found displayed over Egyptian temples. For instance, one of the most spetacular exhibits ever, was the King Tut artifacts, discovered seven years after

C.T. Russell died. Four oak house-like structures, called shrines, contained the body of this minor boy Pharoah. The inside of these large oak shrines were laid of gold, giving us an idea of the splendor the other Pharoahs likewise received. Visitors to the exhibit can view the Winged-Sun-Disk at the top above each door and on the far side or rear panals.

However, in drawing representations of this over their temples the Egyptians employed a variety of styles. The snakes may look like vipers or cobras, and may even be dropping down rather than looking out from the sun disk. In researching what books were available to Russell, and what live Egyptian drawings Russell could have studied of the Osirus, Isis, and Horus trinity, it is this Author's conclusion that he would have seen a variety of representations. None of which he used. However, he did follow basically the way the esoteric Masonic groups drew it, so consequently his source was most likely an esoteric source.

Illustrations from references of C.T. Russell's day showing the Winged-Sun-Disk are provided to document the variety of choice.

Some have speculated that the Winged-Sun-Disk is an angel's wing like a Cherub. This is an uninformed guess. A close look at copies of Russell's books in excellent condition will reveal that there are snakes on each side of the disk. Further, Russell passes up ways to use it as an angel. It is undoubtedly the Winged-Sun-Disk on his books.

WHAT DOES C.T. RUSSELL & THE WT SOCIETY HAVE TO DO WITH THE SUN-GOD?

Surprisingly, there are a number of clues that show C.T. Russell did believe in a Sun deity. Russell spoke about Zorastor as a true prophet (WT '06, p. 14). Zoroaster, was considered to be the Sun God by his followers. Cyrus the Great, who name meant the Sun, was considered by his gnostic followers to be the Sun-God. Russell thought Cyrus the Great was a prefiguring of Jesus Christ. Russell in fact believed the Resurrected Jesus was at the center of the Sun.

Russell never left himself without a scripture to explain whatever he decided to believe.

Mal. 4;2 refers to "But to you who fear My name, The Sun of Righteousness shall arise With healing in His wings; and you shall go out And grow fat like stall-fed calves."

Russell at various times gave various interpretations to Mal. 4:2. A comprehensive examination shows he said the Sun of Righteousness is

1) Jesus and his church

SYMBOLOGY OF THE MYSTERY RELIGIONS

After reading thousands of pages on the Mystery religions, dozens of Masonic books on their religious symbology, various books on the mythic images of mankind globally, and the Christian scriptures it was clear that 5 concepts repeatedly have been interlinked with each other on a worldwide basis and that each of these 5 interlinked ideas has also been represented by the concept of a serpent, a snake.

[place diagram here]

It is understandable how man in various areas could see the stars, the closest star the Sun, and fire and worship these items. It is also easy to see how two internal fires within man, sexual passion and curiosity could be integrated into the worship of the Sun, stars, and fire. If one were worthy of worship, then all the rest were too. It is easy to understand how a priesthood could persuade people to give them authority in order that these items might be properly worshipped. An examination of the related Sun worships from the classical world shows that the priests reserved an esoteric worship for themselves that was hidden behind the worship of fire, sex, snakes and the sun. The Egyptian priests that taught the people sun worship in Moses' day were monotheistic. This monotheistic god was the Light-bearer.

To understand the significance of pyramids to Masons (and New Agers in general) we can show how pyramids, especially in particular the Great Pyramid of Giza, relates to these 5 interlocked concepts.

The Great Pyramid is important to Masons according to Masonic sources because:

a. An initiate (then and now) after entering the Great Pyramid leaves as a god. (light—bearer/godhood on chart)
b. The Great Pyramid is said to be prophetic when its passageways are measured. (wisdom)
c. Sun worshippers built the Great Pyramid.(sun worship)
d. All pyramids are said to emit special energy.
e. Pyramids are an architectural picture of an ascended flame to heaven.(fire)
f. The pyramid's upward triangle shape stands for the male generative principle.

When the Masons Charles T. Russell and H.P. Blavatsky made their pilgrimages to the Great Pyramid and went into the King's chamber it is possible the significance of their visits included the above a through f items.

The philosophy behind the mystery religions, Freemasonry, Theosophy, Gnosticism and the New Age movement continue the idea that man should seek out the fruit of the tree of good and evil for it shall make him a god. These religious philosophies also declare that "true" Christianity (cosmic or New Age Christianity) is also this gnostic quest for enlightenment.[20]

Many Gnostic religions hate traditional Christianity. They have also over the years criticized biblical Christianity for holding mankind back from finding his quest for godhood.

For several upcoming paragraphs we will contrast Christianity with the gnostic quest for enlightment. We will refer to the head adversary of the Creator, what the scriptures call "...the dragon, that serpent of old, the devil, or Satan." Rv 20:1

Some readers will hold the view that Satan and demons don't exist. They are free to speculate that, but there is no way to prove their speculation. On the other hand, it is easy to substantiate an objective belief in demons by examining the countless testimonies, etc. about them. J.W. Montgomery in Principalities and Powers, written after years of research into the existence of demons, concluded, "The problem involved in determining whether demon possession occurs and whether witchcraft works is absurdly simple. The documentation is overwhelming."[21]

Whatever our view of demons and their reality, there is the visible behavior of humans who are so brutal that we label their behavior as "inhuman" because they exhibit a cruelty that surpasses all the animal kingdom and surpasses any purposeful depraved needs. So why are these men so "demonically" destructive? How do we explain a man like Pol Pot who cruely killed half the people (many killed were of the better half) in his beautiful country of Cambodia. These were his own people. Rational answers fall short of explaining such irrational behavior for destruction. This destructive force may be labeled demonic, whether we view demons as real or as a psychological phenomena.

"Be wise as serpents...," What were the issues at stake in the Garden of Eden? If we are to be as wise as serpents, what was it that the serpent knew that Eve didn't know?

The story of the Garden of Eden sets forth the Biblical view of this issue right from the first part of scriptures.

The serpent knew that man was man, and that it was a delusion for man to try to become god. The only way since then for man to think he has reached godhead is if he deludes himself. And the serpent is there to help him try. But why does the Serpent want man to seek godhead through taking in the fruit of good and evil?

The biblical view of God was that man should not try to determine good from evil by taking in knowledge—that is eating of the fruit of the tree of good and evil. For man to determine for himself right from wrong is called situational ethics. Rather than man pretending to be a god by declaring what is wrong by his own wisdom of situational ethics, man was to allow God to decide. The creator had laid down physical, spiritual, and moral laws. But the gift of choice was given to man. That was God's will. God's will allows for bad choices on man's part, including the option by man to reject his loving Creator and make up his own rules in contradiction to truth.

Today, we are seeing that many young people do not want the responsibility of making their own choices about what is right and wrong. They are running to Guru's, and laying their freedom of choice at the feet of these New Age "Godmen". "Tell me what to do," they ask. And then men like Jim Jones, who thought he was God,[22] make their choices for these youth, often with disasterous consequences.

Why does Satan encourage man to seek divinity? Even today people are as naive as Eve concerning the issue. Satan and the demons really hate the Creator and would like to destroy his Creation. But how does seeking one's divinity aid in mankind's destruction?

The Theosophical Society tells us that "...all philosophy is an effort to apprehend Reality; but it is an effort of the intellect merely, and as such it is, and must always be a fruitless effort."[23]

The inability for man to find godhead by reason and logic has been repeatedly discovered by all the great minds. Man has always failed. For instance, William James the philosopher tell us in A Pluralistic Universe, p. 212, "For my own part I have finally found myself compelled to give up the logic, fairly, squarely, and irrevocably. It has an imperishable use in human life, but that use is not to make us theoretically acquainted with the essential nature of reality."

To apprehend reality as a truth seeker by using only logic and reason is a dead end street. God reveals truth to man according to the Scriptures, and man obeys.

If man chooses not to obey, and insists on seeking truth on his own, he invariably must discard logic and reason and turns to mysticism, the occult and the mystery religions including Hinduism. In order to achieve his delusion of godhead, the initiate is encouraged to leave reality by using drugs, self-hypnosis, ectastic activity such as rigorous physical and sexual activity, psycotic states of the mind and trances.

The Theosophical Society states, "Some of our modern philosophers are beginning to apprehend this fact: notably Henri Bergson, who speaks of a higher faculty which he calls intuition, and which he says must replace intellect if we would contact Reality."[24] The Theosophical Society believes the world is but an illusion, Maya, an idea they have learned from Hinduism.

The reasoning that these people use is a form of reasoning not under God's authority and is consequently according to scripture not under his protection from demonic control. To step out from underneath God's authority is like stepping out from underneath an umbrella during the rain, the protection offered is lost. Although these people use reason, it is a distorted version. The dying words of atheists who exalted reason, shows that they often discovered their philosophy turned out to be a cruel hoax.

Does Satan benefit by watching men pursueing altered states of consciousness and tripping out and leaving reality? Yes. A life centered on deluding oneself is a destructive life.

Satan's Kingdom, often called the Kingdom of the World is taking advantage of man's ignorant groping for godhood. Satan is out to destroy God's creation made in his own image.

Get in touch with reality and stay there. Quit trying to "cop out" of reality. Christians are to test the spirits to see if they are of God. That means elements of logic, science, and reason must be tested to see if they are under God's authority. If they are, then embrace them. Christianity and the Scriptures are not against science, logic, and reason. No those items are powerful tools for Christianity. But when those items are used in a distorted way that must be avoided. Science and intellect are not to be used to create gods nor is their purpose to invent systems of morality.

Evolution is an example of a powerful warped way of thinking. Because it was developed intentionally as a tool to destroy belief in God, it has not been protected from demonic powers. All kinds of demonic influences have directed the evolutionists, and the list of frauds perpetrated by evolutionists is long. It is also used to teach us morality, such as, only the fit (the best) survive. This means one is superior if he survives by any means.

To use reason, science and reality to become gods is in itself a distortion of reality—a contradiction, for man is but man. In order to delude himself into thinking he is a god, mankind is turning to drugs and other escapes from reality.

The Christian NT book of Ephesians chap. 4 deals with sins of the flesh in the context of the old man (verse 22) and the new man (verse 24). In this context, suddenly Paul warns us, "Neither give place to the devil." (verse 27). By committing fleshly sins, the demons are given a place (lit. ground) for their activity in the believer's life.

But the Christian idea of God establishing right and wrong for us, is rediculed as simplistic by all the various Gnostic groups.

" 'Christianity,' so-called, lulls its devotees into a false sense of security, or "salvation"; whereas the whole history of humanity, and of religion itself, shows us that:

" The path by which to Deity we climb
Is arduous, rough, ineffable, sublime.'"[25]

The poem is right. The path to divinity is an arduous path, because it is a path man is not to accomplish on his own. It is a cruel hoax which Lucifer as an angel of light assists.

The Masonic lodges which continue the ancient mystery religion (one religion with various names) teaches the initiate that he needs light. Masonic authority Mackey in his Encyclopaedia states, "Light. Light is an important word in the Masonic system. It conveys a far more recondite meaning than it is believed to possess by the generality of readers. It is in fact the first of all the symbols presented to the neophyte, and continues to be presented to him in various modifications throughout all his future progress in his Masonic career."

As a candidate for various degrees the Mason Will declare his need for light. For instance, the Entered Apprentice, or first degree is asked by the Worshipful Master, "In your present condition, what do you most desire?"

And C.T. Russell, Joseph Smith, Jr., Billy Graham, and Robert Schuler all answered, "Light."[26]

"Light is the first demand of a candidate at his initiation; and the material light is succeeded by an intellectual illumination."—Historical Landmarks, Vol. 1, p.135.

This search for light continues up through the degrees. When the candidate receives his lecture for the 32nd degree he is told, "You are here to learn, if you can learn, and to remember what you have been taught. In the Scottish Rite you will be taught that our ancient ancestors who knew all the Mysteries left enough traces so that we today with diligant labor and teaching may renew them and bring them to light for your enlightment. We now come to the great symbol of Pythagoras. Our symbols have descended to us from the Aryans, and many were invented by Pythagoras, who studied in Egypt and Babylon. In order to preserve the great truths learned from the profane, there were invented some of our symbols that represent the profoundest of truths descended to us from our white ancestors...The ancient Masters invented some of these symbols to express the result of deity. They did not attempt to name him, but rather tried to express their reverence by describing him as Ahura-Mazda, spirit of light."[27]

Ahura-Mazda was the god of the Mazdean religion which worshipped five types of fire. The five fires were the internal fire of the earth, the Kundalini aka as Sex-force or serpent power, the fire of lightning, the fire of vegitation, and the fire of Ahura-Mazda.

The ritual quoted above of the 32 degree lecture introduces us to two concepts worthy of note at this point. First, that symbols are used to conceal truth from the profane, and second that Masonry involves the worship of the various 5 elements of the serpent.

In Ez. 8:16, Sun worshippers are described facing the east. Generally, sun worshippers have faced east, as the Masonic rituals connected to sun worship do. Because of a number of items, it appears that Lucifer may be playing a larger role within the Masonic lodges than one is led to believe. The symbology of the lodge includes frequent use of the Sun, the serpent, and the eagle representing the sun.

In order to bait mankind into continuing to self-destruct, Lucifer and his demons have been appearing and providing enlightment for those who are on the New Age road. It should be obvious that a real angel of light (by Bible standards) is not going to appear to help men become gods. The Bible is clear from the beginning Yahweh the God of the Bible doesn't want situational ethics and man-made gods.

It seems that the phrase "First liar doesn't stand a chance," may apply in some ways to masonic historians. Morey himself isn't honest with the facts. The smokescreens of false information have helped cloud the Masonic Lodge, but it is possible to get to the bottom of it all. Honest men who have left Masonry like Charles Finney have been reliable witnesses about the Masonic Lodge.

Chapter 1.6
The Emerald Island

You will learn:

- the importance of bloodlines in relation to the Power.
- about the bloodline of Charles T. Russell, founder of the Watchtower Society.

BLOODLINES

Bloodlines, they can mean authority (such as royal lineages), they can mean mean power (occult wisdom and power is generationally passed down in Satanists), they can mean likemindedness (world views are learned to a great extent from our parents, similar physical brains are genetically inherited; for instance, identical twins separated at birth, and rejoined at adulthood are found to have surprising similarities in modes of behavior.) Today the principles of racial heredity are not popular at the public educational institutions controlled by the Power. Also supposedly, royalty is a thing of the past and aristocracy is fading with it.

After thousands of hours of research on the Power, one thing is blatantly clear— the Power recides in bloodlines that pass authority, occult power and knowledge, and likeminded worldviews from generation to generation. Bloodlines have not ceased to be important.

THE PROCESS TO IDENTIFYING THE POWER

In researching the Power behind hundreds of individuals and groups, it has been like peeling the layers of a onion. Which men and women are front men, lackeys, and hirelings, and which ones are really running the show and making decisions?

For instance, men like Anton LaVey, George Bush, William Buckley, the major networks' news anchormen, although powerful in their own right are in the overall picture front men.

There is an elite, not only in the United States, or Great Britian, or Russia but an elite over the entire globe. Surprising? When the astute observor begins to realize that an oligarchy is running the world, then there are lackeys in academia to tell us we should not have been surprised. Robert Michels concluded that elitism is a natural thing of society, because society required organization and all organizations are oligarchies even socialist societies.[1] That elites are inevitable is debatable (the elites are actually unproductive parasites on society), but this is not likely to be debated in today's population, which have been conditioned by the elite's media to be sheep. It was debated by the U.S.'s founding fathers, who set up an alternative to an oligarchy or a democracy, by establishing a Republic. Although there are societies, even somewhat modern ones without oligarchies, which prove that a community can function without some self-perpetuating power elite, these societies are not in control of the world.

The Power that is in control of the world is not the benevolent wise and spiritual group some of the masses have been conditioned by behavior modification to believe. This book intends to expose that world Power, and that means attempting to expose the bloodlines that have savagely maintained their parasitic power.

IMPORTANT BLOODLINES

Important bloodlines for the Power include:

- •The Jewish bloodline of the Prieure de Sion which starts with the tribe of Dan, extends through the Merovingian Dynasty and into the Hapsburg royalty. This bloodline has kept a close association with all branches of the occult, often providing the leadership for the occult.
- •The bloodlines of the leaders of the LDS and RLDS churches which go back to the bloodline of the Prieure de Sion, the Merovingians. A secret society of Danites was created by the LDS church.
- •The bloodlines of the 13 Illuminati families, which include several Jewish and Maranos Jewish families.
- •The bloodlines of the petty Hasidic Jewish messiahs that began their religious reigns in Poland among the Askinazim.
- •The bloodlines of the Babylonish Talmudic Jews. Historical evidence shows these bloodlines were of mixed blood even in Christ's time, in disregard for the Scriptures commandments not to mix blood.[2]
- •The bloodlines of the "Successors of the Messiah", that is the bloodline of the Sufi leadership.
- •The bloodlines of the Knights of Malta. The aristocratic/royal bloodlines carry titles, wealth and power.
- •The bloodlines of the descendents of William of Orange and those who helped him conquer England. They have been in powerful positions since, especially in England. Part of William of Orange's help was derived from those of Jewish descent.
- • The bloodlines of the thirteen Illuminati families (which have tie ins to the blood lines above). These thirteen are not a fixed set, but because of their power change in who are the thirteen doesn't often occur. A tentative list of these thirteen families includes Astor, Bundy, Collins, DuPont, Freeman, Lee, Onnasis, Rockefeller, Rothschild, and Van Dyne.

Besides those families there are a host of other families that are important within the Illuminati. The list includes:
(those of German Jewish Heritage): Adler, Geisenheimer, Goldschmidt, Guggenheim, Lazard, Oppenheim, Oppenheimer, Seligman, Sichel, Speyer, Stern, Russell, Wolf(e)
(and those of British or Scottish Heritage): Acheson, Bell, Billings, Brown, Buckland, Clinton, Eddy, Frost, Gardner, Hall, Hopkins, Hooker, Kennedy, Leek, Lord, Morgan, Sinclair (St. Clair), Smith, Tolkein, Lewwellyn
(and others such as): Hapsburgs, Sassoons

What makes this study of vital and timely importance is that members of these bloodlines intend within the 7-year period of 1992-1999 to launch a sequence of events to lead the world into a one world slave-state ruled by a man controlled by the god which the elites worship. Should the reader allow, I will quote from the Power's own statements plus other proof to show that this god, the god of the world, is Lucifer (aka Satan, Sanat, Venus, etc.) For thousands of years, The Plan for world domination has been passed down from occult generation to occult generation. Spaced every 20 years plus is a Feast of the Beast, a year-long holiday during which Satanists receive new instructions from Satan on how to carry out The Plan.[3] We read of the great holiday and its Great Councils in Externalization of the Hierarchy, when Satan's instrument Alice Bailey writes, "The past year...has, however, been the year in which the greatest spiritual Approach of all time has shown itself to be possible - an Approach for which the initiates and Masters have for centuries been preparing, and for which all the Wesak Festivals since the meeting of the Great Council in 1925 have been preparatory. I have, in past instructions, referred to the great meetings held at intervals by Those to Whom is entrusted the spiritual guidance of the planet and particularly of man." (Externalisation of the Hierarchy, p. 389.)

ONE SAMPLE OF THEIR PLANS

As example of how ingenius these plans are to create a One-World-Government consider the following part of it.

The Drug War is not what it seems. It is a very ingenious scheme to enslave the American people, and destroy all their civil rights.[4]

The first rumblings of the Drug War part of The Plan seem to stir from the occult, so it is highly possible the Drug War originally was first developed by Satanists, perhaps even given during one of the Feasts of the Beast.

The Drug War seems like the perfect plan, with no way for the Power to lose. First, the Power creates a drug culture in America. The Drug Culture would and did give many their first step into the Aquarian (New Age) conspiracy.[5] The Power would make billions of dollars by running drugs, to further finance other nefarious schemes, and could use their world-wide power to crush all their competitors. When the Power crushed and arrested their competitors in drug running, they would be hailed as heros by the majority of people.(And they have.) The introduction of drugs into society does several things. It taxes the Christian church's ability to oppose immorality. It gets the public indignent about drugs, and the public's moral outcry allows the Power to pass "drug" laws that remove the last vestiges of legal civil rights. In fact, the beguiled public demands the laws which abolish their rights, and applauds these laws in ignorance unknowing what the laws actually say and mean. If the public somehow gets a complete picture that their government has been smuggling drugs to create a drug war in spite of the controlled media, or perhaps through the media at the right time, then they can create a scandal involving several U.S. Presidents to eliminate the U.S. government and switch the public's alligience to a world government. (See chapter 3.9 for more details and a chronology of the secretly planned escalation of today's designed Drug War.)

As an ex-Mason, who is very aware of their plans, said to this Author, "These people are in it for the long-term."

THE BLOODLINE OF THE RUSSELLS

The purpose of this next subsection may be misunderstood, unless I make myself clear at this point. This Author has not established any link between the various famous Russells. (Although I have been doing genealogy work, I have not had the chance to do the long term Geneology work required to clarify the issue, if the reader is dissatisfied with the extent of this information, he is encouraged that rather than criticize to research it himself.) The reader will observe by the time he finishes this book, that this Author has done extensive research into many groups. One item that has popped up consistently is that people with the surname Russell repeatedly appear as important figures in the various elements of the World Order as it has developed.

Before becoming aware of the One World Order, this Author had no inkling how important blood lines have been for the elite that controls the world. Friendships have also played a role, for instance, Eleanor Roosevelt (who was involved in numerous communist organizations[6]) was a close friend and confidant to Ronald Reagon's mother. This seems trivial, but the reoccurance of blood lines and the reoccurant discovery of connections of friendships between what have been thought of as unrelated personages, compels one to believe the elite is more compact than appears.(More on that later)

The mysterious Watchtower Society and its founder Charles Taze Russell will serve as perhaps the most used example in this book of an organization that is secretly serving the New World Order. (The reader will be presented with the history of all this throughout the book, especially in chapters 5-17 of the first section.)

Let's comment about the type of Russells that keep appearing throughout the course of the history of the New World Order as this Author went about his research. To summarize, these various Russells (who until the genealogy work is done to show the connections should be viewed as individuals—not a group) have been prominent members of the Illuminati, the Masons, the Fabians, the Mormons, the Jehovah's Witnesses, the Jesuits, the Royal Society, and the Media controlled by those of the New World Order, and a deputy chairman of the Federal Reserve. Typically they have been merchants and lawyers, with a fair share of them also as Christian heretics. It will be easier perhaps to illustrate how the Russells keep popping up in the New World Order story line by listing a good sampling of them.

SAMPLE OF RUSSELLS OF INTEREST

RUSSELLS WHO FOUNDED FRATERNAL SOCIETIES

William Huntington Russell- founder of what is believed to be an american chapter of the llluminati (Skull & Bones Order).[7] More on this in chapter 2.3. It's legal name is Russell Trust.

Before going to our next section would be worthwhile to cover the family that Bertrand Russell came from. They hold the title of Dukes of Bedford. Ordo W. Russell served in Lord Palmerston's office from 1850-52. He served as unofficial ambassador for Great Britian to the Vatican from 1857-70. His son Baron Ampthill was Grand Master of the English Masons 1908-1935. He joined the English equivalent of the Knights of Malta--that is the Order of St. John of Jerusalem, and served as the Grand Master of the lodge formed at the Bank of England! He was appointed head of the Indian Masons of Madras, India (home of the Theosophical Society). Ordo Russell's son also served in some high political positions.

Captian Joseph H. Russell- original investor in stock in the Mormon Deseret Manufacturing Co. which was intended to be an umbrella company for many early Mormon enterprises.[34]

The Russell who opened a store with Mormon blessings in the newly created Salt Lake city. The store was called Miller, Russell & Co., a branch of Russell, Majors, & Waddell, and was a primary source of goods in the area of Utah.[35]

QUESTIONING OLD ASSUMPTIONS

There was enough circumstantial evidence to lead one to question several assumptions. I began to question the assumption that the W.T. presidents were unconnected to each other. Another supposition that was questionable was that the WT Society did not have a hidden agenda.

C.T. RUSSELL'S STORY

Once there was a Jewish family whose name was Roessel. They lived in early 17th century Germany. They moved to a country called Scotland. There they re-spelled the name Russell. They took on the ways of their new homeland. The English tried to settle Protestants from Scotland in Ireland in order to control the Irish. When the opportunity opened up to go to the Emerald Island (Ireland) with the Scottish settlers who went to the plantation Ulster they went. It is possible, but not known for sure that they learned to know the Rutherfords either in Scotland or Ireland.

Scotland repeatedly appears as the source of much of the religious heresy connected with the Power. That C.T. Russell's family were in Scotland for a period, and also from the German states which seem to be a hot bed for Jewish Satanism may be only a coincidence and then again it might be a clue to understanding the origins of the Watchtower Society.

This Author's previous book The Watchtower and the Masons tells the story how the Arian heresy began at the University of Edinburgh, Scotland and spread to the the Presbyterians of the Synod of Ulster. The book gives this Author's reasons for believing that the C.T. Russell's family in northern Ireland were Arian in belief before coming to the U.S. and chances are they were involved with Freemasonry also.

THE ACKLEY CONNECTION

In The Watchtower and the Masons the early history of C.T. Russell is given. Charles and his father married two Ackley sisters a number of years after Charles' mother died.

What is an intriguing item is that C.T. Russell's mother's will indicates she owned land in Iowa. A description of that land shows it was north of the town of Ackley, Iowa. It turns out that a man named William Ackley had purchased the land in that area, and had sold it in large part to Scot-Irish settlers of the Presbyterian faith as they were coming to America. At the time C.T. Russell's mother died a town named Ackley had been staked out in 1857, but the Civil War had interferred with construction plans. A Presbyterian congregation had been formed in the area during the early 1860s in the Ackley area, which indicates some settlers had arrived. What connection did the Russells have with the Ackleys years before Charles T. and his father married Ackley sisters?

Who are the Ackleys? Maria Ackley, who was Charles T. Russell's wife, was well-educated and an excellent writer. Interestingly, in the 19th century she believed a socialist revolution was coming. She wrote, "This great revolution has not yet come, but where is the statesman or the intelligent citizen that does not see it coming?" (Russell, Maria. This Gospel of The Kingdom, p. 26.) She was the ghost writer and ghost editor for much of her husband Charles Taze's work. Her family was well-off. William Ackley, the land speculator/seller in Iowa, traces his ancestry back to Prence Doane and Elizabeth Godfrey. Elizabeth Godfrey in turn was the great-granddaughter of William Brewster of the Mayflower fame. The Ackleys were Puritans to begin with and seem to have been concentrated in the Connecticut area, and from there their family members moved out into NY and PA. Another Ackley (1832-1881) at that time was Richard Thomas Ackley, a Freemason who worked for the Miller, Russell and Company store in Salt Lake City in 1858 soon after the Mormons built Salt Lake City.

LEADS

Of course, these are all simply tantalizing leads for the investigator but nothing solid. There seems to be much more to Charles Taze Russell than the little that the public has been told. In the next few chapters we will attempt to dispel some of the mystery surrounding the man.

Times were gloomy in the Emerald Island during the 1840s. A potatoe famine drove many to immigrate to a new ~~world~~ land named the New World. The Russell family and the other Scottish families did not have the deep roots ~~that~~ the native Irish had for the land. Earlier in the 1820's, Alexander G. Chapter 1.7
God's "Annointed Seed"

In 1852, the Joseph Lyttle Russell family had a baby who they gave the same name to as his uncle had. This baby, named Charles Taze Russell had a brother Frank who was two years older, but Charles ended up the favorite of his father. Later Charles would get a sister Margaret M.

Both Charles T. and his sister Margaret spoke on various occasions that his had been chosen before his birth for the work that he was to carry out.[1] Margaret referred to her brother as the greatest man alive "a giant unmatched." She stated that he had been choosen for his religious work before his birth. Perhaps, Charles' Russell family, and his father Joseph L., (like Joseph Kennedy who had goals for his son to be president) had goals for Charles. If Charles had been encouraged to meet such expectations and had gone forward, then that could account for his sister's great admiration for him. He had fulfilled her father's wishes.

At the Put-In-Bay Convention his sister Margaret had outlined how God planned and chose her brother. First God had planted a seed with the early church. But the seed had laid dormant for centuries. "In due time", she says, the seed of truth grew and was watered according to God's plan. During the Dark Ages the seed of truth was barely kept alive waiting for God's Chosen One to bring it to fruition. When it was time, God "annointed the eyes" of her brother at age 17, and "God's smile of favor rested upon him." Margaret said her brother was the one, the faithful one who God could depend upon, the "one despite the burden and heat of the day" would remain faithful to God.[2]

NOTES

[1] C.T. Russell is noted to have privately admitted his belief that he was chosen for his great work before his birth. The Finished Mystery. The Watchtower Bible & Tract Soc. 1917, p. 53. A testimony speech given by his sister at the Put-In-Bay Convention where she said similar things is commented on the The Laodicean Messenger, pp. 179-180.

Chapter 1.8
"To have my throat cut"

The following stories, statistics and facts are revolting and are not something we particularly want to dwell on. However, for the minute it takes to read through the next few paragraphs, this Author wants to point out how prevalent yet secret Satanism is. Whether you the reader are or aren't aware of evil spirits, the facts remain there are countless people down through the ages who have worshipped evil spirits.

On Friday and Saturday nights across the United States members of Satanic Covens are secretly meeting.[1] They also meet on the many Satanic special days. (See the list of their sacred days and the blood sacrifices that they carry out on those days.) An ex-Illuminati member estimates that over 300,000 covens exist in the United States each having 13 or more members. A Black Prince (Black Satanic Magician) estimated 40,000 to 60,000 satanic human sacrifices occur in the U.S. yearly.[2]

This Author had the privilege to talk to someone who had an accidental rare encounter with Satanists in Kansas City and managed to successfully flee to live and tell about it.

Having been a West Point cadet, it especially caught my attention when the West Point Day Care Center was accused of being involved in the ritual abuse of 30 children. The officer requesting an investigation into his 2 1/2 year old daughter's abuse was told to resign his commission. (This is no surprise in several ways.)

Many dozens of day care centers in California are investigated each year for subjecting the children left in their care to Satanic Ritual Abuse. In Los Angeles County 800 allegations of ritual abuse involving 64 schools and preschools and 27 neighborhoods were reported.

The newmen and newspapers are repeatedly coming upon news stories involving Satanism. Most of these stories never get printed, and many stories which do, do not draw conclusions from the obvious clues indicating Satanic activity. An example of this is a news story describing the desecration of a grave by some young people. Certain bones are listed as having been taken, and the story writes the incident off as youngsters playing games. If more were known about Satanism the fact that the left hand was taken would have clued people that Satanism was involved. The left hand, the femur, the Skull, and a particular rib bone are especially important parts of the body. Left hands are associated with Satan-right hands with God. Human sacrifices are always done with knifes in the left hand, except when the Priestesses battle to the death for power.[4]

Many criminal cases showing clues of Masonic involvement have the Masonic clues ignored by the police and the press. Examples abound such as Jack the Ripper's case.

This Author knows personally from when he did farm work that occassionally cattle would be found obviously killed from some type of Satanic ritual. The newspapers often did not report such stories by farmers.

The Chicago Tribune, Sunday, Apr. 27,1986 carried a story "Satan Worship Called Dangerous, Growing" by Eric Zorn. The story told how youth in the area had been involved in attempts to sacrifice humans to Satan, and about a series of mutilation killings in Cook and Du Page Counties in 1981-82 in which 4 men abducted and murdered up to 18 women. The parts of the dead women's bodies were used in Satanic rituals involving cannibalism and sexuality.

The sabbath, from sunset Friday to sunset Saturday is also observed. Astrological events like full moons and eclipses are also causes for "celebration."

This is a compilation of 6 different versions of SRA calendars. It is highly unlikely that any one SRA survivor would have been abused on all the above dates. However, most SRA survivors, irregardless of the group they belonged to, were abused on the following dates: April 26-May 1, June 21, October 31, and December 22 & 24. Many survivors are also affected one to two weeks prior to the celebration of any major ritual as this is the time for preparation rituals leading up to a major event.

In Mexico across the Texas border a Satanic group which sacrificed people recently managed to splash across the headlines and television screens. Even though the news media is careful not to give the full ramifications in such stories, and is reluctant to carry these stories, the stories still can't be totally suppressed.

Two points have been introduced, that Satanism is widespread, and that our awareness of its activity is very slim due to its extreme secrecy and poor news coverage.

DEMONIC DEPRAVITY

The Satanic Skull and Bones Order has initiation rites which include the candidate lying in a coffin and relating their sexual exploits. Another part of the ceremony involves wrestling in a manure pile.[5] This is the type of degenerate activity Satanism is well known to draw people into. One of the top Christian researchers in demons, and author of two excellent books on Satanism and demons Merrill F. Unger writes, "People who deal in the occult are often found to be immoral. Men and women who abandon themselves to immorality reach a point where God gives them up, in the sense of restraining Satan and demonic power from them, so that they are abandoned to the degrading depths of immorality and are shamelessly reduced to actions that even animals avoid (Romans 1:26-32; cf. Revelation 9:20, 21)."[6]

ROLE OF DEMONS IN STARTING RELIGIONS

Hinduism is replete with many gods and many superstitions. It has a deep-rooted tendency toward mysticism, and derives much of its power from demonic activity. Some of the Holiest men of Hinduism are deranged men who run around on all fours like animals. This Author has personally seen the total demonic degradation of the human by Hinduism all in the disguise of making the person spiritual.

Primitive religions are as a rule full of magic and the worship of evil spirits. These evil spirits are feared, ceaselessly placated, and slavishly worshipped.[7]

The polytheism of the Mesopotameans, the Sumerians, Assyrians, the Persians, the Babylonians are full of demons from the earliest of historical records. Demonism is the dynamic behind the magic and spiritual powers of these groups' religion.[8] The Caananite, Egyptian, Greek, and Roman gods relate to the Babylonian gods in character and nature, and are also demonic. All kinds of magic, immorality, human sacrifice, astrology, etc. came to be practiced

the SATANIC HIERARCHY

BASIS FOR CHART: This chart has been developed from charts by Ex-Satanists, it also is colloborated by information received from many historical sources. Historical information describing the hierarchies and power structure of demonology are worldwide. Although differing in details, it is clear that multiple levels of demonic authority have been experienced by people.

LEVEL A. SATAN AND RULING SPIRIT PRINCES- The ruling spirit princes are widely known among Satanists. Many of the ruling princes go by several names, as do many of the Satanists. Some of the ruling princes are still referred to by names they used in ancient Babylon and ancient Egypt.

LEVEL B. DEMONS- The highest ranking Satanists teach their children that the demons are aliens from other planets. Within the Satanic covens one variety of demons looks like E.T. (but also can have more hair) are common and they serve as guardians. Also a grey type of demon with almond eyes associated with UFOs is also working closely with the high ranking Satanic Illuminati. The first rumblings of Satanic plans to use a mock alien invasion from outer space to unite the world under Satan's rule were given to the Satanists in the 19th century, perhaps at a Feast of the Beast in possibly 1868. After the next Feast of the Beast 28 years later, UFOs began appearing in large numbers in the USA esp. Calif. H.G. Wells novel War of the Worlds was published in serial form the following year too. By 1917, the secret occult fraternities show signs of working toward creating this artificial alien invasion. The UFO phenomena is accompanied with a. repeated accounts by abductees and contactees that man has failed to advance morally as rapidly as he has technologically, and that these aliens will give mankind or the elite of mankind both advanced technology and advanced morality. The secrets of the galaxies- not just ancient mysteries but the mysteries of the ages- will be given to our elite free by these aliens (actually demons), b. mankind is on the verge of a great evolutionary leap forward, but also faces an Armageddon. Demons which appear manage to come in all sizes and shapes. There is a munchkin variety called elves, lepricans, or menihunis. There is a large giant variety too. The spirits are assigned various tasks, and are often grouped in 4's, 7's, or 13's.

LEVEL C. PRINCIPALITIES & POWERS- These forces are akin to "school spirit" or the power that a rampaging crowd has within itself. These powers of synergy are carefully manipulated by the Satanic forces. These energies produce a Zeitgeist -a spirit or fad of the times. Peer pressure is a form of such power. These power structures are known and manipulated by the Satanic forces.

LEVEL D. GUARDIANS - These Nephalim (half men - half demon) are to be found distributed throughout all the levels. They are the goon squads, the enforcers, the Sargeant-at-arms, and have rank according to the level they operate on.

LEVEL E. ILLUMINATI - Illuminati members depending upon their groups have various levels themselves. Their knowledge of Satan's organization depends upon which group they are in and which level they are at, most usually they may have only that knowledge needed to function at their level. Illuminati members have their name written in blood by a quill pen into a book. The various factions of Illuminati rule the world as the Kingpins in politics, finance, porn, drugs, communications, and religion in preparation for the Anti-Christ (Kashema) to take his throne, and rule with rest of the Satanic trinity of the Beast, and the False Prophet. This level includes the Grande Druid Council, and the 13 highest Satanic families. Various branches have their own terminology and rules for their lower levels which are the following pattern.

LEVEL F. BRIGADES- SISTERS OF LIGHT/ ASMODEUS -These are the Mothers of light, the overseers of power. Training for these Illuminati begins at age 11. Coronations for a Queen in the Mother of Light is at 14 years old.

LEVEL G. REGIMENT- This level is led by a Grande Master/Matriarch. Regiments are divided up into various levels of groupings of covens into companies and sub-regiments led by captain and major-types. Rings are worn by various levels.

LEVEL H. COVENS- Basic low level group (similar to an Army platoon) containing 13+ witches with a Priest or Priestess as an officer. Most covens are extremely well kept secrets. A few show temples like Anton LeVey's Temple of Satan are put on for the public's consumption.

NOTES:

Alan K. Russell put together The Collector's Book of Science Fiction by H.G. Wells which gives the information about the Pearson's Magazine serial publication of H.G. Well's War of the Worlds.

Interestingly not only do Masonic publications indicate a Satanic trinity, and Occult and Magic publications describe this, but the Christian Scripture's book of Revelation 20:10 (et. al.) also refers to the Satanic trinity of the Beast, False Prophet, and Satan.

According to the Masonic book An Interpretation of Freemasonry by Mason Martin Wagner, p. 97, the name Solomon which is used by Masons so frequently is actually a Sun-God trinity, "This name Solomon is not the Israelitish king. It is name in form, but different in its meaning. It is a substitute which is externally like the royal name. This name is a composite. Sol-om-on, the names of the sun in Latin, Indian, and Egyptian, and is designed to show the unity of several god-ideas in the ancient religions, as well as with those of Freemasonry." If Wagner, and ex-Mason McQuaig who also claims this is the case are accurate, and this view was known in Elizabethan England, then Solomon's temple that the Masons are building ends up to be nothing other than Lucifer, the light-bearer's temple. [end of Satanic Hierarchy Chart] under these systems. Another example from another angle, the cloven hoofed Greek god Pan from who was derived the English word "panic" is a carbon copy of what ex-Satanists claim Satan looks like.

In Shintoism all kinds of deities and spirits are conjured up, and all kinds of occult practices including divination, fortune-telling, spiritism, magic, and conjuring are practiced.

In Taoism, which is polytheistic, all kinds of magic, divination, charms, dealings with demons, geomancy, and fortune-telling are practiced.

Buddhism exists in many forms. This Author lived in Nepal and can personally testify that Buddhists in Nepal and Tibet as well as other Asian lands have many superstitions, do practice all the occult practices, and they live in fear of demons which are placated.

Confucianism was started strictly as a philosophy, not as a religion and does not concern itself with the spirit realm. By default then most Confucists must learn of the supernatural from Taoism which most of them practice. Taoism is very demonic.

Rabbinic Judaism is based on the religions of Babylon, not the Old Testament as most people especially Christians incorrectly assume. The Kabballa and the Zohar of the Jews are the fundamental books that most occult, magic, and Satanic groups base their actities on. One of the leading well-known Satanists and a magician E. Levi wrote in his book Transcendental Magic, "All truly dogmatic religions have issued from the Kabalah and return therein. Whatsoever is grand or scientific in the religious dreams of the illuminated, of Jacob Bohme, Swedenborg, Saint-Martin and the rest, is borrowed from the Kabalah; all Masonic Associations owe to it their secrets and their symbols."[9] (Bold added)

A BIZZARE DISCOVERY

One of the strangest things for this Author was to continue running into evidence that seems to indicate Charles Taze Russell, the man who started the Jehovah's Witnesses' Watchtower Society, was secretly an important Satanist. Lest the reader devalue the evidence, permit this Author to state that the evidence came in first before I came up with my theory that Russell was an important Satanist, and not vice-versa.

Some of the outstanding clues are:

a.) C.T. Russell was definitely a Mason, yet he puts up some great smokescreens in his writing concerning his membership.

b.) C.T. Russell's Bethel staff became concerned about his occultic activities and required him to take an oath forswearing any further occultic activities.

c.) In my previous book The Watchtower and the Masons, I study 35 parallel beliefs that Russell had with Masonry. I spent a page per parallel. These 35 are not in any way inclusive, Russell had many other identical ideas to what the Masonic lodges propogate.

d.) Various items from magic were part of Russell's religious beliefs including healing handkerchiefs, phrenology, the Winged-Sun-Disk, Enochian Magical planes, etc.

e.) Russell's family's possible Illuminati links, and his wife's possible connections with a family line of Satanists.

f.) Russell's apparent secret Rosicrucian membership with the Quakertown, PA group of Rosicrucians, as revealed by the pyramid he ordered erected, his use of the Winged-Sun-Disk, and his cremation three days after his death.

g.) Russell owned a cemetary in Pittsburgh. Leading Satanists try to own cemetaries for several reasons. First, it facilitates the disposal of human sacrifices which are buried in pieces below the fresh holes dug for someone else's burial. When the casket is placed in the hole, it would be rare for anyone to dig below the casket level ever again. Second, magic power is associated with cemetaries. The spiritual power of the dead is pulled up by making a circle of light over them then within the circle a naked Satanist lays. Third, specific bones are sought such as the skulls and left hands. Left hands are preserved in order to hold candles for certain ceremonies.

h.) Contacts from various places today indicate that the modern Watchtower Society is working with the New World Order. This implies that at some point the Society began cooperating with the New World Order. Russell seems to be the likeliest starting point.

UNDERSTANDING CHARLES T. RUSSELL

As with all occult organizations a veil of secrecy is maintained by requiring initiates to take secrecy oaths on penalty of death. As in Witchcraft, Masonry repeatedly demands secrecy oaths at every new level. Charles T. Russell began participating in this secrecy when he took the Entered Apprentice (first Masonic degree) oath on penalty of mayhem and violent death, "I...do hereby and hereon most solemnly and sincerely promise and swear that I will always hail, ever conceal and never reveal any of the arts, parts or points of the secret arts and mysteries of ancient Freemasonry which I received, am about to receive, or may hereafter be instructed in..."

The Knights Templar magazine (9/1988) p. 21 indicates that a few Grand Lodges have recently experimented with doing away with the blood-curdling oaths on penalty of death, and substituting the use of the more moderate oath on penalty of "expulsion from the Fraternity." This was done as an expedient to raise recruiting levels.

Chapter 1.9
A BLANK CHECK

WHICH EYE OF GOD BLESSED C.T. RUSSELL?

Jehovah's Witnesses point to their success as proof of God's approval, in the same way that communists have pointed to various revolutions to show proof that the broad masses support them.

COLOSSAL SPENDING

During the half century before his death C.T. Russell spent vast sums of money. Russell travelled nearly continuously. His trips took him to Europe frequently and around the world. He often had large entourages accompanying him. The Jehovah's Witnesses, then called International Bible Students or simply Bible Students, gave out enormous quantities of FREE books, tracts, and other things. For instance consider some of the following expenses,

In 1881 the WT issued a 164-pg book Food for Thinking Christians. The cost of printing was born by the WT Society, and for some unknown reason several newspapers picked up the cost of distribution. These small books (now extremely rare) were distributed free. Zion's W.T. in 1881 says that their tract Supplement No. 2 is "for free distribution. Order as many as you can use."[1]

In 1882 the WT magazine (then called Zion's Watch Tower) advertises, "We have plenty of tracts and September numbers, which you can have for free distribution by asking for them."[2]

In 1886, Russell had 300 workers distributing Food for Thinking Christians. 300,000 free tracts were distributed in Great Britian alone. WT literature was given free to the colporteurs.

In 1893, the WT Magazine says "A good colporteur can put into the hands of the people 5 to 6 thousand volumes of Dawn in a year. One with little talent ought to dispose of 3,000 a year."[3] The Dawn books were good looking hard back books with about 370 pages apiece. To distribute such vast quantities of books generally free had to have cost the Watchtower Society plenty. The WT Magazine (Z.W.T) published by the Tower Publishing Co., stated under its title "FREE TO THE LORD'S POOR." For instance, the May 1, 1893 issue states under a first page article "ADDRESSES FOR FREE READING MATTER" that "we are glad to send out matter freely to such." Such refers simply to those interested.[4]

In 1897, there was a mass distribution of 300,000 of the free WT booklet the Bible versus Evolution.[5]

In 1899,948, 459 tracts were handed out by people a half block away from churches in each direction as people came out.[6]

In 1910, Russell had 76 workers at headquarters and paid 2,000 different newspapers to carry his articles. How much money would it take for an unknown person without connections to pay 2,000 newspapers to run their articles? Russell wasn't without connections. In 1910, the German branch ran a $7,340.49 deficit, even though they received much of their literature free, and the British branch came up $9,331.41 short that year, all made up by the Brooklyn,NY headquarters.[7]

Had the gigantic literature giveaways ended yet? In 1913, in a Convention Russell states, "Do you know how many copies of free literature have been distributed by the people of Great Britian this year so far? Eight millions of copies....And I am so pleased to see that many of God's people are rejoicing in the privilege of showing forth His praises. Never mind if it is not customary to go about giving out literature. Never mind if it is not popular to give out religious literature. We have a message and work, and this is our way of preaching."[8]

During all this time period of 35 years, the Watchtower Society had managed to rent such hugh building such as Prince Albert Hall—which by the way is famous for many big Masonic events. Renting the Hall would have ranged in the hundreds of dollars. In 1910 they rented it six times.[9]

WHAT WE HAVE BEEN TOLD

Up to now, no one has contested the explanation that has been provided by the WT Society and their official history. Supposedly, Russell sold his clothing store and financed his activities from the proceeds.

Anyone familiar with printing and shipping knows that the large quantities of material Russell distributed free had to cost in just one year alone more than the proceeds from selling his store. On top of that, Russell had legal fees from repeated court battles, exorbant travelling costs, and a full-time staff to house and feed.

His followers were not required to give up their money to become Bible Students. So where did the money come from? The foreign branches received free literature some of which they sold, and came up short even after some sales and donations. Bear in mind, the WT Society was not efficient as it is today. Today they make their own ink and have the latest equipment to typeset and print with. But back then, at least part of the books Russell printed he paid outside printers to print.

Up to now, it has been stated that Russell was a genius with money. That kind of statement simply clouds what really happened. Russell was not Rumplestiltchen. If he was such a man of finance (and he certainly had the reputation then), it seems hard to picture him sending out his people to stand in front of churches to hand out expensive books free to Christians as they left. A man that loose with his own money would hardly makes a fortune in ten years of running a clothing store. Russell wasn't being careless with his money, because he was not having to finance his operation himself. His backers were obviously quite rich and powerful.

The Greek Orthodox church which jealously guards it turf, has repeatedly accused the Jehovah's Witnesses of being financed by the agents of "International Zionism."[10] This topic is discussed more in chapter 6.

RUSSELL'S FINANCES

It will surprise many people to learn that Charles T. and his father Joseph L. were quite poor in 1870. They boarded and their store was rented to them. In 1870, they were not involved in religion yet, and between the two of them they had not a single piece of property. Joseph's personal belongings were $2,000.[11]

Actually, they were doing fine, considering Joseph had left Ireland during the Potato famine, and had left owing his brother-in-law money.[12]

The first good financial break was when Charles T. Russell's uncle by the same name died Dec. 1875. His father inherited $1,000.[13] Because his father and him were in business together, this was a real boost. According to court testimony, Russell had a chain of 5 stores by 1880. Soon Russell invested in oil in Butler Co. and his father and him opened a scrap metal business in 1882.[14] They closed the men's furnishing business in 1883.

Charles bought out his father, and when his father died in 1897, his will reveals that he had 3 houses and lots in Allegheny, PA. a house and 3 lots at Farfron Springs, FL. along with another 25 acres, 160 acres in Polk Co.,FL and stock in the Carlin Co. Besides that he had shares of stock in the Railway and Dock Construction Co. of NYC which C.T. Russell inherited.[15]

Because C.T. Russell's wife divorced him in 1897 Russell hid his money so that his ex-wife would not be able to get any support, in court, C.T. Russell would not honestly state his holdings even under oath. A Reverend J.J. Ross investigated on his own and discovered that Russell had lied under oath. Russell was a stockholder in the Pittsburgh Asphatum Co. which later became the Calif. Asphatum Co. which was the organizer of the Selica Brick Co. Russell also had controlling interest in the Brazilian Turpentine Co. located in Pittsburgh, a cemetary in Pittsburgh. & the U.S. Coal & Coke Co. with capital of $100,000.[16] After having lied in court, Pastor Russell had to make a clean breast of his lies when the Reverend Ross confronted him in court with the facts and the charters of some of Russell's companies.[17]

Russell also had money invested in timber limits. Russell had just secretly purchased silver mines in Nevada, and had gone out to check them out on his western trip when he died.

In 1874, when C.T. Russell began his religious meetings, he also began buying property in Allegheny. He bought again in 1874, 1884, 1885 (two properties), 1889 (four properties), in 1890 (five properties), 1892, 1894, 1896, 1897 (two properties), and four more properties after the turn of the century in that area alone in his own name.[18]

Further, the WT Society which he had control of had ownership of numerous properties.

Russell had control (99% of the snares) of the U.S. Investment Co.,Ltd. which in turn held 38 houses and lots in Binghamton, NY, several lots in Tacoma, WA, a farm near Rochester, NY, a house and lot in Buffalo, NY, a farm in OK, 100 lots in TX, a house and lot near Pittsburgh, and 5,500 acres in KT.[19]

By the way, the original owners of U.S. Investment Co. were John A. Bohnet (5 shares), Ernest C. Henninges (5 shares), and C.T. Russell (990 shares).[20]

The popular story is that Pastor Russell gave all his money to his great crusade and died a poor man, leaving his poor wife (the WT Society claims they were only seperated--the divorce papers say otherwise) with only $200.[21] The court records show a very rich man indeed. And most of Russell's money came in after he started up his Watch Tower Society.

THE ENIGMA REMAINS

Here is a man that starts a religion from scratch. He is busy travelling, writing and talking almost full time. He is well off but not a millionaire. After starting his religion, he spends millions on giving away free literature, and invests perhaps millions in gold, silver mines, government bonds, oil fields, property, and stocks in companies. There has never been a real analysis of C.T. Russell's finances, and his WT Society.

Russell was involved in several financial scams also. He lost in court.

WHOEVER FINANCED RUSSELL HAD BIG PLANS FOR HIS SOCIETY

Russell's WT Society was financed by some heavyweights. The history of the WT Society gives evidence that the power to bring in a one-world-government financed Russell. The WT Society has been a proxy for the One-World New Order to accomplish certain goals. Unfortunately, the JWs "in the trenches", have not known how they have been used. JWs brought upon themselves all kinds of persecution when Rutherford announced to them that the angels had revealed that all national flags were the " devil's banner." On page 44 of Uncovered Rutherford states "Flag saluting is in direct violation of God's law." Individual JWs had to suffer first in order to bring the issue of flag saluting before the Supreme Court. It would have looked bad for the Masonic Lodge to openly support the issue, but the WT Society was accomplishing a goal that they, the Masons had determined in advance. So the populace hated the JWs, and the Masons could continue putting out Patriotic material for public consumption, although in their own literature, they had clearly marked Nationalism for destruction.

J.P.Morgan, the Rothschild's representative in the United States, set up a trust fund to unite the various Christian denominations. Russell praises this in his Jan. 1, 1911 WT, pp.1-4 (WTR p.4735), "Mr. Morgan's well-known business capacity, exhibited in connection with financial trusts, encourages many to believe that he will accomplish the desired end in connection with the movement. More and more all denominations are craving a religious trust or federation and are becoming more and more willing to sacrifice doctrines and principles formerly held dear, in order to accomplish the federation....Evidently this federation is near at hand; the Scriptures have long foretold the Federation, as we have been pointing out therefrom for thirty years. It is to us one of the special signs of our day, one of the special indications marking the end of the Gospel age and the inauguration of Messiah's kingdom."

Here is a trust fund set up to pay denominations to federate, and here is Russell saying this is fulfillment of Scripture.

"Our message was to the Jews as Jews..."

In 1910 and 1911, Jews flocked to hear a Christian preacher. His message at St. Louis (June 11-12, 1911) was "Zionism, the hope of the world."

This fatherly figure of a preacher, the likes of which the Jews had never seen before, was C.T. Russell. And he captured many of the Jews' attention if not their hearts.

They flocked to his meetings. Four thousand Jews listened to this Christian preacher at New York City's Hippodrome on Oct. 9, 1910. Later in London 4,600 went to the Royal Albert Hall (site of many large Masonic gatherings) to hear him, and 800 at the Shoreditch Town Hall. 1,200 Jews came at Manchester, 1,400 Jews turned out at Glasgow, Scotland, and another 5,000 at Cincinnati, OH.

What captured their hearts? Russell sums up his hippodrome message, "We were not preaching Jesus to them. Our message was to the Jews as Jews, from Is. 40:1,2, Comfort ye, comfort ye my people." [22]

Russell's repeated assurances that he wasn't proselytizing the Jews achieved their goal to calm the fears of wary Jews. Further, Russell had a radical message for his time, Zionism. Russell was a Zionist before the word existed.

Russell's Zionism

In 1880, Russell began to predict that the Jews would return to Palestine.

He wrote an article "God's Message of Comfort to the Jews" telling the world that God had promised the Jewish nation would be restored. This article was made into a 32 page Bible Student tract around Sept., 1881, and reprinted again in tract and newspaper-article forms in Dec. 1887. One source also says the booklet was put out in 1912. This Comfort for the Jews is not to be confused with Rutherford's later book in 1925 by the same title.

Russell's third book, Thy Kingdom Come, spends its entire 8th chapter on "The Restoration of Israel."

His prophecy about the Jews returning to Israel are, in this Author's estimation, his most accurate. The others failed. This prophecy goes unmentioned by today's WT because it clashes with their present light that the nation of Israel is not in God's plan.

Russell applauded as he saw his predictions on Zionism starting to happen. Russell advertized Dr. T. Herzl's lauching of Zionism. Russell published a Yiddish paper Di Stimme, which circulated in Europe and Russia. With Jewish help it was circulated worldwide. It was especially popular in Poland.

The WT Society collaborates with Jewish groups

After Russell's death, and while Rutherford, the second WT president was confined in a Federal Penitentiary, the WT headquarter shifted back from Brooklyn to Pittsburg. The Watchtower magazine on Sept. 1, 1918 prints a revealing letter from the men in Pittsburgh who were running the Watchtower Society. The letter equates the Watchtower Society with the Jewish Zionist movement. Whether the two are actually the same or not, it is evident from this article, that the Watchtower leaders were not concerned that the Society and the Zionist movement be identified together.

"On Saturday and Sunday we had the pleasure of hearing our dear Brother Thorn expound the further unfolding of God's plan. He spoke of the restoration of the Jews to their land, called the attention to the significance of their Passover Supper coming the day following ours, and also to the significance of the opening date of the of the recent Zionist Congress in Pittsburgh, June 22nd, the day following a most memorable day in the history of our Society. Note how in this wonderful sequence of events the ceremonial and governmental features of the movements effected have been kept seperate and distinct. This Congress accomplished more than did the former twenty Zionist conventions put together..."(WT 1 Sept '18, p.275)

It has not been a total secret that Jewish groups were associated with C.T. Russell.

"...Russell interviewed a large number of Jewish notables and leaders who came to visit him at the central offices of the Witnesses in Brooklyn."[23]

Some like the Jewish editor of the Boston Jewish Advocate, Jacob de Haas, a Hassidic Jew and prominant member of the Munich Zionist meeting on Aug. 25, 1897, felt Russell had identical religious beliefs to his.
